JAVA AND THE JAVANESE.

A WOMAN OF SUNDA—JAVANESE OF THE LOWER CLASS.

On opening the pages of the Monthly, we ask our readers to forget their actual locality, and, with the help of our engravings to aid their imagination, transport themselves to the far Orient, to that long island which lies in the distant Eastern seas, between six and nine degrees of south latitude, and south of Borneo. Java—for so it is styled—is an important member of that vast island group, to which, latterly, the general name of Malaysia has been given. It extends from east to west, and is 642 miles in length, its greatest breadth 128 miles, and its average breadth 95. To the south and west, its shores are washed by the Southern Indian Ocean; to the northwest lies the island of Sumatra, from which Java is separated by a strait, twenty miles wide in the narrowest part, known by the name of the Straits of Sunda; to the north is Borneo; to the north-east, Celebes; and, on the east, the islands of Bali and Madura, from the former of which it is separated by a narrow passage, called the Straits of Bali. The island is divided nearly in its whole length by a range of mountains, running almost east and west, and rising to their greatest elevation towards the centre; but the range is much broken. In several hills of the great range of mountains are the craters of volcanoes, which formerly raged with fury, and poured forth torrents of lava; but, at present, none are known to be in activity, though many emit smoke after heavy rain. The most considerable rivers are the Joana, and the Sedani, or Tangerang. On the bank or bar before Batavia, the flood rises about six feet, and higher at spring tides. High and low water likewise occur only once in twenty-four hours. The island is traversed from east to west by a great military road, 700 miles in extent, constructed by General Daendels, a governor of the island, before it was taken by the English. The year, as is usual in tropical climates, is divided into the dry and the rainy seasons, or into the east, which is called the good monsoon, and the west, or the bad monsoon. Thunder storms are very frequent, especially towards the conclusion of the monsoons, when they occur almost every evening. The heat of the climate is various. Along the sea-coast it is hot and sultry. At Batavia, from July to November, the thermometer generally stands, in the hottest part of the day, between 84° and 90° , which it rarely exceeds; and, in the greatest degree of coolness in the morning, it is seldom lower than 76° . In some parts, particularly among the hills, and in many of the inland towns, it is often so cold as to make a fire desirable. Java possesses a soil of extraordinary luxuriance and fertility. In the forests, especially in those on the north-east coast, is found an abundance of lofty trees, fit to be converted into masts, while forests of teak supply the place of oak for building ships, adapted to all purposes. Palms and cocoa-trees are found in great variety, and are distinguished by their luxuriant growth, sometimes reaching to the astonishing height of 150 feet. Fruits of all kinds are also abundant, many of them of exquisite delicacy and flavor. In the high ground in the interior, they are found to dwindle and degenerate, in that equinoctial climate. The various kinds of plants and great abundance of herbs found in Java would afford ample scope for the researches of the botanist, as flowers exhale their perfumes at all seasons of the year. Garden-plants are produced in great variety, such as endives, cauliflowers, beans, cabbages, pumpions, melons, patacas or water-melons, yams, potatoes, etc. Maize, or Indian corn, is a favorite article of food with the natives, who eat it roasted. The natural fertility of the soil of Java supersedes the necessity of laborious village. The staple produce of the island is rice. Sugar, to the amount of 10,000,000 of pounds annually, is also made. Pepper is produced in great abundance and perfection; also indigo of a very superior quality. Cotton is cultivated in almost every part of the island; and the coffee plantations are extremely luxuriant. The soil is also very favorable to the growth of tobacco. There are many other herbs and plants, both medicinal and balsamic, that are but imperfectly known to Europeans. Wheat and barley are only grown in small quantities, on the hilly tracts, chiefly in the middle parts of the island. Oats and Bengal grain thrive likewise in those parts of the island, and would be produced in great abundance were due attention given to their culture. The domestic animals in Java are buffaloes, and cattle of every description, and sheep, goats and pigs. Game, however, does not abound here so much as in other countries, though hares and rabbits are pretty common; and deer and antelopes are also plentiful. The horses, which are very numerous throughout the island, are small but active. Wild hogs and monkeys are found in all the jungles. The forests abound with tigers, as powerful and as large as in Bengal. A species of black tiger, which is often found, is very ferocious. The rhinoceros is sometimes met with. Snakes are found here, as in all other hot countries, in great numbers, and of various kinds. Some of these are from twenty-five to thirty feet in length. Lizards of all kinds, from the variable chameleon to the guana tribe, frequent the bushes, trees, and roofs of the houses. Scorpions and mosquitoes abound in the marshes. There are, besides, various other sorts of dangerous and disgusting vermin. Of the numerous feathered tribes found in Java, we may remark the cassowary, a very large and powerful bird. White eagles have been seen here; and every kind of bird of prey is continually on the wing. The aquatic tribe is equally diversified, and the extensive fisheries along this great line of coast are highly productive. At the mouths of the rivers, numbers of alligators, or caymans, are continually lurking for their prey. In the several bays, numerous sharks swim about the ships; and many animals, undescribed in natural history, abound in these seas. There are manufacturers of cotton, leather and saddlery; also of iron, brass, and tin. The principal articles of exportation are rice, sugar, coffee, pepper, indigo, teak timber and planks, spices (which are brought from the Moluccas), tin (from Banca), cotton, yarn, salt, edible birds' nests. The imports are European articles, of every description—chintzes and muslins, silks, hats (which are a favorite dress with the Chinese and native chieftains), boots and shoes, cabinet ware, fire-arms, gunpowder, shot, hardware, hosiery, mathematical and musical instruments, etc. The population of Java is composed almost entirely of natives, of a variety distinct from the Malays and other inhabitants of the neighboring islands. In 1815, it amounted to 5,000,000, of whom one-fortieth part were Chinese, Europeans, Arabs, Malays and Hindoos. The Javanese are small, with a yellow complexion, flattened nose, high cheek bones, and thin beard. Their language is entirely different from the Malay; their religion Mohammedanism. Numerous monuments of antiquity, buildings, statues, etc., prove that they were once in a more flourishing condition than at present. Three quarters of Java are in the power of the Dutch, whose immediate authority extends over three fifths of the inhabitants. The other quarter is divided between two native sovereigns in the southeast part of the island. Java was discovered by the Portuguese in 1510. They made some settlements there, which were taken possession of by the Dutch, towards the end of the sixteenth century. The latter, having conquered the native princes, made the island the centre of their Indian possessions in 1619. In 1811, the English made themselves masters of it, but restored it at the peace of Paris, in 1814.

If, now, we refer to our illustrative engravings, we shall find, in the first representation, a delineation of a woman of Sunda—Javanese of the lower class. She is shown carrying a child according to the manner of the Javanese, that is to say, suspended at her side by the aid of a scarf, selindang. This manner of carrying it gives her room for domestic employments. Her costume consists of a sort of tunic of blue cloth, badjoe, and a long piece of stuff, kayen-pandang, which envelopes the lower part of the body. The Javanese generally wear this last garment very short, that it may not encumber their movements in the incessant labor which they are engaged in. The Javanese who is turned sideways is in the festival costume most commonly adopted in the island. Over the handkerchief with which his head is covered, is a song ko, a kind of hat, and principally used to guard the eyes from the burning rays of the sun. His long vest, katiwo, is of rare stuff. His creasse, passed through his girdle, is placed behind his back, as is the custom in Java. His sarong, of native dye, is fastened round his waist by the girdle, and worn in the most common manner. The third person, seated before him, is a Javanese of the lower class, a kochi, street porter. His vest is thrown over his shoulders, and his legs are covered with a short pair of drawers of light material. He holds in his hands his touden, or large woven hat, which shelters him from the rain and sun.—The illustrations on the second page of this number present us with a group of the warlike arms of the Javanese, including the formidable creasse, and with the scarcely less formidable goloks, knives and arms used in the chase. The blade of the creasse on the left, in the first group of arms, is most peculiar to Java, but that on the right is found in Madura. The handles of the creasses are very different in form; many are curiously wrought, and of very fantastical form. Those of chiefs are often of massive gold, or ornamented with precious stones. The blade varies less. It is generally turned or notched at the point; it is also deeply lined on its whole length, and covered with an acid preparation, for which the juice of the citron is much used. This preparation, which gives the steel a dull color, preserves them from rust. More inferior is the hott lance most in use. In the engraving is also given the different kinds of goloks which the Javanese use to cut wood with, and for hunting; the handles likewise vary, but not essentially from those shown here. Some of the blades are marked; but the greater part are plain. They are extremely sharp; the Javanese are very careful to sharpen them often, and keep them well greased.—That we may do full justice to the belles of Java, we have presented in the third engraving three specimens, representing Javanese women by a full-faced view, a three-quarters presentation, and a profile. To a European eye, accustomed to the pure types of Caucasian beauty, their features present little that is attractive; their eyes are heavy and their expression stupid.—The group of Javanese children next delineated is interesting from the accuracy of the delineation of the Javanese physique and costume.—The last engraving of the series represents a Javanese chief helmed and plumed in his war attire, and two gambous. They call by this name the dancers destined to figure in the ballets or pantomimes which the great Javanese chiefs give among them. The wings, the bracelets, as well as the ornaments which these girls wear upon their breasts, are of buffalo leather, carved for that day, and painted in different colors. The head is decorated with a kind of crown of artificial flowers, fixed in the handkerchief which covers it. Their ears are ornamented with the buds of an orange-colored flower, melati. The creasse of the Madura form is passed through the girdle, and placed behind their backs. The two pieces of stuff which covers their lower part are arranged in a more theatrical manner, resembling, nevertheless, the way the costume is worn by the Madurans. Encircling the ankles are rings called gelang. One of the girls holds in her hand a little shield, the other a demon or fancy, of which there is often mention in Javanese mythology. These they use to accompany their movements in the different dances which they execute. In these ceremonies, all the dancers of a great chief form a troupe which greatly increases his retinue.—The Javanese children, as will be seen in referring to our picture of a group of them, are variously attired. Their costume is suitable to the mildness of the climate; ordinarily, in the lower class, the children are allowed to go entirely naked until five or six years old. This habit gives to their limbs a suppleness, and to their movements an ease, which they often preserve till an advanced age; and, as they live simply, corpulency and bodily deformities are very rare among them. Passed that first age, the dress of the children, although still reduced in general to the most indispensable garments, is very picturesque. The first of these garments is, for both sexes, a piece of cloth of triangular form, oto, which covers the breast and lower stomach. Later, the girls wear a kind of little gathered skirt, sayu, and the boys a little pair of drawers confined around the loins by a simple cord. Sometimes there is a piece of stuff of native make, sarong, which they throw over their shoulders the greater part of the time. On festival days, they add to the dress of the girls a kind of outside tunic, badjoe, and which descends almost to the knees; the boys over all wear a short vest, badjoe-pindak, of light material, and confined at the throat by a little button. The heads of the infants of both sexes are shaved fourteen days after their birth, with the difference, however, that they leave on the heads of the boys two locks of hair, one behind and the other in front, whilst they leave one tress at the top of the girls' heads; but, to make amends, they continue to shave the heads of the boys, allow the girls' hair to grow, and never cut it again save in the case of accident or illness.—A kampung, or Javanese village, presents an interesting aspect, for the thatched houses are almost all surrounded by fruit trees. There is round every thatched roof the banana tree, with its healthy and nourishing fruit, which the inhabitants prepare in a thousand ways; the papaya, whose fruit resembles very much the apricot; the cocca-nat, too well known to require description, and of which the Javanese know the use of each part; the gigantic tamarind, its fruit enclosed in a hard shell, the pulp of which forms such an agreeable dish; the bamboo, the numerous trunks of which, spreading themselves fan-like, throw over the house an always refreshing shade. Not far from there, a little hedge of coffee plants, and some shrubs producing a kind of pepper, are sufficient for the need of the family. Peopling these magnificent shades, are thousands of birds, whose songs serve still more to enliven the place, and you now can understand, that under the influence of such a smiling nature, the happy inhabitants of this Eden perform joyously their easy labors, and preserve until an advanced age all the primitive naivete of their character. The houses are made, for the most part, of rough timber, cut in coarse, square beams, the intervals between the beams being filled with bamboo, split and plaited in different ways, payag. The roof is covered with a kind of thatch made of the leaves of the plant alang-alang, fixed by long pieces of wood, adap, which they fasten one after another to the slips of bamboo which form the body of the roof. This thatching is impenetrable, but has to be often removed. When all the materials are in readiness, the neighbors unite together in order to assist in the building, and by this means the work is accomplished in a few days. When the labor is finished, they construct a long shed, and each, according to his means, brings provisions; the women on their side occupy themselves with the preparation of food, and, in the morning, the men take part in the inaugural repast, sedeka, presided over generally by the priest, hadja, of the village, for whom the place of honor is reserved. The most perfect harmony never ceases to reign in these reunions, and, at a rather late hour, each returns, carrying the surplus of provision which has been divided equally among them.

Dr. B. L. Ball, of this city, in that very clever work of his, "Rambles in Eastern Asia," presents us with some very lively sketches of Java and its inhabitants. While his vessel was lying in the Straits of Sunda, he tells us "the natives were continually coming and going, with their Malay prows laden with various commodities for sale; some with one thing, some with another, and now and then one with a general assortment, among which I noticed fruits, vegetables, tamarinds, cocoa-nuts, fowls, squirrels, birds and monkeys. Some of the natives had on the cast-off garments of Europeans. All wear a piece of cloth around their middle, while some have in addition an old coat, a vest only, a ragged shirt, or a beaver hat with the crown out. The captain says he once saw one with a long-tailed coat on, with the back in front. They appear proud of these garments, and have little idea how they should be worn, how they fit, or why they are worn at all. They put in their arms or their feet, as they can manage best. If the garment does not go well in one way, they try it in another. If, on laying down an old vest and stepping into the arm-holes, they cannot pull it on, they pull it off and put their arms through. One is trying to put on a pair of pants the wrong side before. One of them, having worn a pair of black thick pants for about ten minutes, panting with heat and perspiration, dragged them off, and, holding them in his hands, rested for a few minutes, and then put them on again. They cut very ludicrous figures in their single garments, especially when endeavoring to keep them on for a length of time. The equatorial sun, pouring down, forces them first to draw one arm out of a thick coat or jacket, and then they put it on and change, with the other arm out." Mr. Ball's book gives many amusing details of intercourse with the Javanese, but our limits will not allow us to quote more.

SOMETHING ABOUT CALIFORNIA.

We propose in the present article to glance rapidly at some of the leading features of the land of gold, giving a general description of its features, and illustrating some of its characteristics by means of spirited engravings. The whole history of California, since it came under the flag of the Union, is a romance. The sudden discovery of its immense mines of gold, not ten years since, filled the world with astonishment and, attracting adventurers from all lands, built up, with a celerity almost unparalleled, a vast empire on the shores of the Pacific, crowded with cities, filled with monuments of the highest civilization and luxury, and adding a star of the first magnitude to the glorious galaxy that burns upon our banner. As gold is the magnet that first attracted population to this new El Dorado, we will first pay our attention to the miners, of whose manner of life we have engraved several illustrations. The first picture represents the manner in which the gold diggers of California are accustomed to occupy themselves on a rainy day, viz., in mending their clothes, and repairing their boots and tools—in-door occupation, and a very necessary duty. The second picture is rather a ludicrous one, and represents an interior view of a man's cabin, which has been taken possession of by one of the numerous bears that abound in the diggings, and which seemed to have regaled itself sufficiently on the stores of the cabin is now seen warming itself, after the style of a human being, across a chair. The third picture represents the miners engaged tively engaged over the fire, with the food, the savory smell of which attracts the dog hard by, who eyes it wishfully, while the other miner is pounding up corn with a pestle and mortar, to make a pudding with which to finish the meal. Hunger is said to be the best sauce for supper, and consequently, as these hardy sons of toil have plenty of appetite, we must suppose that their sauce is of the choicest sort. The fourth picture represents the miners washing their clothing on the river's bank, and hanging the clothes to dry on the branches of the trees. Their wants are simple and easily supplied. They require neither starching nor ironing for their coarse under clothes, and they are quickly cleansed and ready for use without the laundress's care. To many this life, aside from the idea of profit by the obtaining of gold, has its charms; and we must confess that we do not wonder that a feeling of this character should possess many a stout heart and gallant spirit. The very flower of New England youth—that is to say, its bone and sinew—have emigrated to the shores of the Pacific, in search of the shining metal and of adventure. As we have before taken occasion to remark, there are very few families, even, who do not count one or more members of their circle as among the gold seekers and California adventurers. The consequence of this immense amount of manual labor devoted to the purpose of mining, is to increase both the yield of gold and the mortality of the country, which, to a vast number of constitutions, proves fatal. And while some return enriched with gold to the scenes of their childhood, a vast number die at a distance from friends and home. Many philosophize and say that the discovery of gold in California is, in reality, a curse rather than a blessing. They adduce all the contingent evils that have resulted from the matter, but forget that they cannot divine the hidden purpose of Divine Providence, that has thus revealed the hidden wealth of the earth to men's eyes. California and Australia have saved the world from commercial crises, and now the wealth that pours in from those favored lands is lifting the burthen that has weighed so heavily on commercial and industrial interests, and bringing back those better times in which all humanity is interested. The next engraving exhibits John Chinaman on his way to the mines—for even the Celestials early heard of the gold discovery and hastened to secure their share of the spoil. The pioneer Celestial miners made their appearance in the mountain gorges and on the river bars of California early in 1849, and ever since that time they have been steadily increasing in numbers, until they have now overrun the whole mining country. They are industrious, frugal, peaceable and temperate; and are willing to take up abandoned claims. They are generally quite inoffensive, and as they molest no one are not looked upon as intruders. While upon this theme we are led to recall the wonderful incentive that has peopled California in an incredibly short period of time with so dense a population—gold, gold. A few words relative to this metal geologically considered, will be perhaps interesting to the reader. Gold is the only metal that has a yellow color—a characteristic by which it is at once distinguished from all other simple metallic bodies. It is the most malleable of the metals.

OCCUPATION FOR RAINY DAYS.

It is exceedingly soft and flexible, but its tenacity is sufficiently great to sustain, in a wire one-tenth of an inch in diameter, 500 pounds weight without breaking. Its specific gravity is 19.3. In hardness it is above lead and tin, but inferior to iron, copper, platina and silver. Its lustre does not equal that of steel, platina or silver, but it surpasses the other metals in this respect. It may be exposed for any length of time to the atmosphere without suffering the least change. It is also equally unalterable in the common fire; but on being exposed to powerful burning mirrors, or to the heat of the oxy-hydrogen blow-pipe, it melts, and even rises in vapor. Gold is not oxidized or dissolved by any of the pure acids. Its only solvents are chlorine and nitro-muriatic acid; and, according to Sir Humphrey Davy, the chlorine is the agent in both cases, since the nitro-muriatic acid does not dissolve gold, except when it gives rise to the formation of chlorine. It is to be inferred, therefore, that the chlorine unites directly with the gold, and that the compound formed is a chloride of gold. There is no inconvenience, however, in regarding it as a muriate, since re-agents act upon it as if it were such. The gold is precipitated from its solvent by a great number of substances. Lime and magnesia precipitate it in the form of a yellowish powder. Alkalies exhibit the same appearance; but an excess of alkali re-dissolves the precipitate. The precipitate of gold obtained by a fixed alkali, appears to be a true oxide, and is soluble in the sulphuric, nitric, and muriatic acids, from which, however, it separates by standing. Gallic acid precipitates gold of a reddish color, and very soluble in nitric acid, to which it communicates a fine blue color. Ammonia precipitates the solution of gold much more readily than fixed alkalis. This precipitate, which is of a yellowish brown color, possesses the property of detonating with a very considerable noise, when greatly heated. It is known by the name of fulminating gold. Most metallic substances precipitate gold from its solution in nitro-muriatic acid. Lead, iron and silver precipitate it of a deep and dull purple color; copper and iron throw it down in its metallic state. A plate of tin immersed in a solution of gold, affords a purple powder, called the purple powder of Cassius, which is used to paint in enamel. Ether, naphtha and essential oils take gold from its solvent, and form liquors, which have been called potable gold. The gold which is precipitated on the evaporation of these fluids, or by the addition of sulphate of iron to the solution of gold, is of the utmost purity. The principal use of gold, as is well known, is in coinage. It has been with mankind, from time immemorial, the representative sign of every species of property. Even before the art of coinage was invented, it passed for money in the condition in which it was found in the earth; and in this form it still enjoys a currency in many parts of Africa. It is rarely employed in a state of perfect purity, but is almost universally alloyed with copper, or with silver, to increase its hardness. The alloy of gold and silver is found already formed in nature, and is that most generally known. It is distinguishable from that of copper, by possessing a paler yellow than pure gold, while the copper alloy has a color bordering upon reddish yellow. A variety of means are employed to judge of the quality of alloys, supposed to consist in part, or principally, of gold, without resorting to a regular analysis. The most common of these consists in the use of the touchstone. A mark is made upon the stone with the alloy, upon which a drop of nitric acid is placed by means of a feather; if the metallic streak disappears, the alloy is destitute of gold; if visible only in little points, at distant intervals, it indicates a small proportion of this metal; whereas, if the continuity and density of the mark remain unbroken, it evinces that the piece on trial is pure gold. This test is obviously founded upon the property possessed by gold of being insoluble in nitric acid, while silver, copper, and their alloys, with zinc, are instantly taken up by this solvent. It requires, however, much practice to determine, with any considerable degree of precision, the amount of gold present in alloys by means of this test. The trial of specific gravity is another mode of ascertaining the proportion of gold in alloys; and it was in this manner that Archimedes detected the amount of silver in a crown which was to have been made of pure gold for Hiero, king of Syracuse. But this method only gives approximations, since certain alloys are more, and others less dense, than the mean density of the metals which compose them. In the coining of gold, where it is necessary to be assured of the purity of the metal, the trials just mentioned are never adopted. If the gold to be made use of appears to contain copper—which is inferred from its reddish tinge—it is made to undergo cupellation with a given quantity of pure lead; by which means the copper quits its union with the gold, and unites with the lead, leaving the former by itself, and in this way, the proportion of gold in the alloy is ascertained. If silver is presumed to be the alloying metal, the operation consists in melting the alloy with three times its weight of silver, rolling the compound into thin sheets, forming these into coils, and plunging them into nitric acid slightly diluted; the silver is promptly dissolved, while the gold remains unaffected. Boyle has observed that a grain of gold, reduced to leaves, will cover a surface of fifty square inches; that each one of these square inches may be divided into 46,656 other little squares, and that, of course, the entire amount of surface derived from one grain of gold is capable of being divided into 2,322,800 parts, each of which is visible to the naked eye. Native gold exists in veins in primitive mountains, but not in the greatest quantity in those which are esteemed to be of the oldest formation. Its immediate gangue is generally quartz; and it is associated with the ores of silver, sulphuret of iron, lead, nickel, copper, etc. It is often so minutely disseminated, that its presence is detected only by pounding and washing the rocks in which it exists. But native gold is more often found in the sand of rivers, in valleys and plains, into which it has been carried, from its original repositories, in the shape of larger or smaller, generally flat pebbles, mingled with quartz. The mountain of Vorospatak, near Abrudbanya, in Transylvania, is a remarkable instance of a rock impregnated throughout with a small portion of gold. It has been worked to a considerable extent since the time of the Romans; it consists of greywacke and porphyry. In a similar rock it is found in many places along the chain of the Alps, and in the Schlangenberg in Siberia. But the greatest quantity of gold is obtained from the alluvial soils of several islands in the Indian Ocean, from the southern, middle and western parts of Africa, and from Brazil, Mexico and Peru. The sands of several European rivers, also, as the Danube, the Rhine, and the Rhone, afford small quantities of gold; and, within a few years, the rivers of California have been found to yield abundantly of the precious metal. The mines of North Carolina have furnished lucrative diggings, chiefly in the counties of Mecklenberg and Cabarras; in the latter, a single lump of gold was found weighing twenty-eight pounds. The gold is not wholly obtained from alluvion in these districts, but is occasionally pursued in the quartz rock, which abounds with cavities, often partly filled with decomposed iron pyrites. Humboldt estimates the average product of gold per year of South America and New Spain at nearly $11,000,000; while Europe furnishes annually about one-twelfth this amount, the greater part of which comes from the mines of Hungary. The largest amount of gold from Georgia and Carolina, coined in any one year, has been about $320,000. The metallurgic treatment of the ores of gold, where the gold is free, consists in submitting them to the contact of mercury after they have been crushed and rendered fine by washing. The levigated ore and the mercury are agitated together, until it is conceived that the amalgamation is perfect, when the compound is exposed to a heat sufficiently intense to volatilize the mercury, which is condensed, and recovered for successive operations. When gold occurs intimately mingled with iron pyrites, the process differs from that described above, only in that it is necessary to roast the ore, in order to pulverize it sufficiently to set it at liberty. Much more might be given while on this subject, but our readers will find abundant information is almost every work that treats of the precious metals. Our next engraving depicts a California senorita, not a very attractive picture of female loveliness, and calculated sadly to damage the romantic visions of day-dreamers and lovers of the beautiful. The next picture we present is a view of the cemetery at Sacramento. The view is taken as it appears from an elevated point on the road to Sutter. This cemetery was laid out in the fall of 1850, and just before the dreadful cholera made its appearance there. Before that time, interments were made on the upper part of J Street, in the immediate vicinity of Sutter's Fort. In fact, this ground had been the receptacle of bodies for a long time prior to the discovery of the gold, as the dates upon the tombstones show. It has since been so far encroached upon by the public road, that many of the graves are now daily trodden under foot by animals and foot passengers going on the Coloma road. The present cemetery is on the highest ground in the vicinity of the city, and commands an unobstructed view of the river, the coast range, the Sierra Nevada and the city itself. The hill is composed of sand, and every portion of it is far above high-water mark, which circumstance renders it a peculiarly favorable location for a cemetery. The friends and relatives of many of the deceased buried in these grounds, have exhibited their love and remembrance for the departed, by adorning and beautifying their graves, by the planting of shrubbery, and the erection of neat and substantial palings. The prominent monument which appears in the centre of the view, was erected to the memory of Mr. Woodland, one of the most efficient officers and esteemed citizens of Sacramento. He was shot while discharging his duties as a civil magistrate during the disgraceful squatter riots. During the prevalence of the cholera, the city of the living emptied a great portion of its population into the city of the dead, until there were scarcely enough left who could be found willing to nurse the sick, or convey the dead to their long home. It is computed that this awful scourge swept off at least one thousand of the residents of Sacramento and vicinity. The city, however, has, since the disappearance of that terrible disease, enjoyed an immunity from sickness which ranks it among the most healthful towns of the continent. Our last engraving is a very expressive one, representing the miners engaged in weighing the dust which has cost them so much labor to procure. The tools of their calling are strewn upon the table before them, eating utensils, fire-arms and scales. One is enjoying his pipe, and another looks on thoughtfully at the operation of weighing which is performed by his comrade. Probably no persons engaged in any business have a more realizing sense of success when it comes than the miners do. Their occupation involves the severest toil—toil to which the work performed by laborers in building the embankments for our railroads is mere pastime. Often are they disappointed, but when the glittering gold meets their eyes, when at the end of a long hard day they sum up their gains, they cannot but feel exultant—for the success is palpable, tangible, and may be exactly measured.

California was visited as early as 1570, by Sir Francis Drake. This great navigator on his return, reported his conviction that there was "no part of the country wherein there is not some special likelihood of gold." Yet though his statement was frequently repeated by subsequent voyagers, no search seems to have been made for the precious metal. Under Spain the history of California is only interesting on account of its missions, and its population consisted mainly of Indians and the priests and servitors attached to these establishments. When Mexico threw off the Spanish authority and became a federal republic, California, not having a sufficient number of inhabitants to form a State, was erected into a territory—and as such, embraced the whole region west of New Mexico and north of California Baja and Sonora. Thus matters stood until minished by the formation of the territories of Utah and New Mexico.

The characteristic features of California are determined by the two great ranges—the Sierra Nevada and the Coast Range—which traverse it northwest and southeast. Between these is the splendid valley of the Sacramento and San Joaquin, to the east wide, sandy plains, and to the west a comparatively narrowed slope to the Pacific, on the south watered by the Salinas and numerous smaller streams, and on the north by Russian, Eel and Klamath rivers. The mountain masses which constitute the peninsula of California Baja, extend undivided into the State of California as far north as the snow-capped peaks of San Bernardino, where they divide into the two great ranges already mentioned. These ranges both run in a northwestern and generally

MINERS WASHING THEIR CLOTHES.

1844 or 1845, when parties from the United States began to move into the territory; and eventually these, on the breaking out of the war between Mexico and the United States, took possession of the country. At the peace of Guadalupe Hidalgo, February 2, 1848, it was ceded to the Union. About this time the opinion of Drake was verified—gold was discovered; and on information of the event reaching the Atlantic, a mighty emigration commenced, not only from the old States, but also from Europe and Asia, which has since continued. The country rapidly filling up, the military government, which had been instituted by the home authorities, was superseded by one based on a constitution, promulgated by a convention on the 13th of October, 1849. Thus California became a State, and as such was admitted into the Union the 9th of September, 1850, but with its original limits di-parallel direction. The eastern range, called the Sierra Nevada, is by far the loftiest, many of its peaks being above the snow-line—Saddle Peak, 7200 feet high, the Table Mountain, 8000, the Butte, 9000, Mount St. Joseph about 10,000, and Mount Shasta, at the northern extremity of the range, 14,390 feet above the sea. This range is opened by few, and those very elevated, passes. The Coast Range runs at a short distance only from the ocean, to which it is generally parallel. The average height varies from 2000 to 3000 feet—its highest peak, Mount Diavolo, at the head of San Francisco Bay, is 3770 feet above the sea. This range is broken near Mount Diavolo by the united Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, decreases in altitude towards the north, and finally re-unites with the Sierra Nevada near Mount Shasta. From this point northward the country is wholly mountainous, the Sierra Nevada, with its offsets and connecting ranges, occupying the entire breadth of Northern California, extending northward till it is lost in the Cascade Range of Oregon. Between the Sierra Nevada and the great valley of the line of lower mountains, and both from the Sierra Nevada and the Coast Range, lesser lateral ranges and offsets diverge, forming numerous narrow valleys and ravines.

The basin included between the two great ranges, though really one great geographical formation, bears the names of the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys, from the rivers which rise respectively at its northern and southern extremities. This fine valley is upward of 500 miles long and 50 miles wide, and has evidently, at some remote period, been the bed of a vast lake, the waters of which have been released from their mountain prison by some convulsion of nature, having broken the Coast Range at San Francisco Bay. At the southern extremity of the valley are the Tulnare lakes, which, during the wet season, extends about 100 miles in length. The soil and climate vary considerably, but a large part of the soil is very fertile. The surface is much diversified, being broken into rugged hills at its northern end, and, in many places along its eastern side, by well-wooded spurs from the Sierra. Toward the south, near the Tulnare lakes, and along the banks of the two great rivers, it is low and level, rising gently into undulating slopes, which break into low hills as they approach the mountains. The richest and most picturesque part of the valley is that central portion of it which encloses San Francisco Bay and the delta. The district west of the Coast Range—almost the only parts of California inhabited previous to American occupation—is full of narrow, fertile valleys. Along a good part of the coast the mountains come close down to the sea; but along a still larger, there extends a tract of low sand-hills, which, in some places, reach many miles inland. The country east of the Sierra Nevada is mostly level, and much of it sandy and barren. Its character, however, is little known, but along the Colorado it is supposed to have a rich alluvial soil.

The most important rivers are the Sacramento and the San Joaquin. The Sacramento rises at the northern extremity of the great valley, its head streams issuing chiefly from Mount Shasta and some of its spurs. Its affluents are mainly from the Sierra Nevada; and though mostly mere mountain torrents, some of them—as the Feather, the American, the Cosumes, the San Joaquin rivers—are of some importance. Near Mount Diavolo the Sacramento receives the San Joaquin, and the united river turns abruptly to the west, and, soon after, expanding, opens into San Francisco Bay. The San Joaquin issues from the Tulnare lakes. Its course is north and northwest, and, like the Sacramento, it receives numerous tributaries from the Sierra. During the wet season, these rivers are subject to great floods, and the San Joaquin frequently floods much of the low lands on the borders. The Sacramento is navigable at all seasons to the city of the same name, 150 miles from its mouth; the San Joaquin, above Stockton, has sufficient depth for only very small craft. The Colorado, the lower part of which drains the south-eastern portion of the State, and which falls into the Rio Gila, is navigable for vessels drawing six or seven feet of water.

California has a dry and wet season, corresponding nearly with the summer and winter seasons of the Atlantic. But there are considerable variations, both in temperature and the amount of moisture. North of latitude 30°, the air during the dry season is much less parched, and rains occur earlier than in the southern districts. Along the coast the climate is much more temperate than in the great valley, while east of the Sierra the atmosphere is necessarily hot and dry. Heavy fogs visit the coast in summer, and a cold wind sets in regularly towards noon from the sea, and continues to blow with increasing force and keenness till late at night. Some few miles inland the cold is modified, and the temperature becomes quite equable and agreeable. Throughout the great valley the mid-day heat is so great, that it renders labor in the open air unpleasant, and often impracticable. The soil along the valley is extremely rich, and needs only judicious irrigation to make it produce almost every variety of crop. Tobacco, rice, maize, and most plants, except cotton, which grow in the warmer parts of the Union, flourish in the sheltered, lateral valleys; while in the main valleys, cereals produce extraordinary crops, and grasses, peaches, etc., thrive admirably. The grasses are luxurious and nutritious, affording excellent pasturage. North of 39° are extensive forests of pine and oak.

The prominent industry of California is gold mining; but this is by no means the only employment of the people. Agriculture has also become a leading pursuit, and great advances have been made in manufactures. Manufacturing industry, however, is as yet chiefly applied to the production of machinery for marine and mining purposes, and hence the general wants of the State in this connection are still supplied from the older States and Europe. It may be said, nevertheless, that few States have so abundantly the resources of a national industry, or so unequivocally the means in power and wealth to develop them; and yet it is evident that so long as riches can be rapidly amassed in one or two pursuits, that others more intricate and costly in their prosecution will not be engaged in; nor is this state of facts to be lamented, since it lays the foundation of a broad connection with the commercial world, and is the prime cause and means of distributing its own peculiar products. The metals principally obtained in California are gold and indirectly silver, and quicksilver. The production of gold since 1848, the year of its first discovery, to the ending of 1853, has been estimated at 1,048,150 pounds troy, valued at $260,000,000; of this amount, $207,316,177 in value has been coined at the United States mint; and the remainder absorbed in direct exports to foreign countries, or retained in the State. The amount of gold exported in 1854, according to the custom-house reports, was valued at $50,434,873, and the total amount obtained at $65,000,000. The gold is chiefly obtained by surface washing, but already a large amount of machinery is employed in quartz mining; and in connection with this industry, at the end of 1854 it was ascertained that 1164 miles of canals and ditches had been constructed at a cost of $2,294,000, and a large number of others were being dug. The amount of quicksilver obtained in 1854 is stated at 20,000 flasks, each weighing 75 pounds, or a total of 1,500,000, valued at $75,000, and the total amount since the discovery of the New Almaden mines is estimated at about 3,000,000 pounds. The other minerals known to exist, with the exception, perhaps, of coal, have not as yet become objects of industry.

Agriculture is no less flourishing than mining. Until the harvest of 1854 the greater portion of breadstuffs were imported from Chili and the United States; but from that period the products have been ample or even more than sufficient for the population. Of wheat, not less than 3,000,000 bushels were raised, and of barley not less than 4,000,000 bushels. Corn and oats were also largely grown, and the potato and other culinary vegetable crops were abundant. In the southern counties the grape and pear crops were exceedingly large. Upwards of half a million head of cattle are found at pasture, and in 1854 the number was increased by the arrival overland of 61,462 head.

The present manufactures of the State do not extend to the textile fabrics, nor yet to the many minor branches so essential to civilization. But its manufacturers, machinists, mechanics and builders find ample employment in supplying the immediate necessities of common and domestic industry. In fact many of the steamers and other vessels navigating the waters of the State, and most of the machinery used by the miners, have been constructed by resident mechanics; nor is progress less marked in the rapid improvement of the cities—in the construction of wharves, warehouses, stores and dwellings, many vieing in extent, architectural beauty and solidity, with those of States numbering centuries of civilized existence.

Commerce, as a necessary consequence of the progress and prosperity of the people in other departments of industry and general wealth, has maintained its legitimate station among the great industrial interests of the State. Dating its organization scarce five years since, the foreign commerce of California, bearing necessities and luxuries from every clime and exchanging them for its gold, stands unrivalled in the history of the past, and presages the proud position it is destined to occupy as a commercial State; and situated as it is on the confines of the continent, midway between the Indies, Asia and Europe, such a State cannot fail to take a lead among the nations of the world. Already California has outstripped many of its sister States in its commercial aggregate. Nor is the State deficient in domestic or internal commerce. Supplies for the mines are carried in hundreds of steamers and sailing craft in the rivers and bays, and the same highways are used chiefly by the people in their movements. Inland travel between all the principal towns is also effected by stages, which run regularly. But these facilities are unequal to the accommodation of the commercial activity of the people, and hence the railroad is being inaugurated, and already the magnetic telegraph is in successful operation.

The constitution provides that the right to vote is granted to every white male citizen 21 years of age, and a resident six months in the State. All elections are by ballot. The legislature consists of senate and assembly, and convenes annually on the first Monday in January. Assemblymen, not fewer than 30, nor more than 80, are chosen for one year; and senators, in number not less than one third nor more than one half of that of assemblymen, for two years, one half annually. The governor is elected by a plurality of votes for two years. The lieutenant-governor is ex-officio president of the senate. The assembly elects its own speaker. Administrative officers, except the secretary of state, who is appointed by the governor, the senate concurring, are also elected for the same period. The judiciary consists of a supreme court, district courts, county courts, and justices of the peace.

On the 20th of December, 1853, the total debt of the State amounted to $4,389,075—viz., civil debt, $2,067,196; debt to school fund for land sold, $463,360; war debt, $924,259; and Indian debt, $934,260. The two latter items have been assumed by the federal treasury. In 1852, the total taxable property of the State was valued at $56,982,320, and the taxes thereon amounted to $170,947, being at the rate of 3 per mill. The poll tax for the same year amounted to $60,744. The total income derived from these and other sources amounted to $366,825, and in the same year the expenditures amounted to $925,694, largely adding to the debt. The civil debt in December, 1854, however, had been reduced to $3,583.

San Francisco, the metropolis of the State, is situated on a narrow neck of land, between the bay of the same name and the Pacific Ocean. It was founded by the Spaniards about the year 1776, and called Yerba Buena; but before the war with Mexico it never contained more than 500 inhabitants. In 1848, on the discovery of gold, it became the rendezvous of the miners and the depot of large commerce, at the same time rapidly increasing in population and wealth. In 1850, it was incorporated as a city, and contained according to estimate, about 20,000 inhabitants.

In 1852, the population of San Francisco was ascertained to be 34,876. In 1850, there were only three brick houses in the city; in June, 1854, it contained 626, many of them substantial edifices of three, four and five stories; and the population was estimated at between 40,000 and 50,000. The principal edifices are the custom-house, mint, marine hospital, several theatres, and the musical fund hall. The business portion of the city is that facing the harbor. In 1854, 1028 vessels (555,794 tons) entered the port, and 1691 (635,484 tons) cleared. The shipping owned in the port amounted to 93,519 tons, of which 46,236 tons was registered shipping. Semi-monthly communication is kept up with the Atlantic ports by steamers. The flux and reflux of population is thus regularly provided for, and an active commerce maintained. The population of the city is singularly hybrid, and consists of representatives of all nations, among which are conspicuous the natives of China, who form a large moiety of the whole. The city is governed by a mayor and court of aldermen, and has an efficient police. It is a wonderful place; in a few years it has risen from an insignificant village to a splendid city of palaces, and to be the centre of a world-wide commerce. There are numerous other towns on the margin of the bay, but of these none require special mention except Benicia and Vallejo, on the north shore, which were successively capitals of the State.

In 1853, the government removed to Sacramento City, on the left bank of the Sacramento River, about 150 miles from San Francisco. It is a substantial place, and as a commercial town is only second in importance to San Francisco, being the interior depot of the mines. Steamboats of large size navigate the river to this point, and boats of less dimensions ascend much further north. The site is low, and a levee has been built to prevent its inundation. In 1852, it contained about 10,000, and by the census in 1855, 20,000 inhabitants. Till within a year or two nearly all the houses were of wood; but recently a more substantial mode of building is coming into use. In Sacramento and its vicinity are perhaps the finest gardens in California. The estimated value of real and personal property in the city is more than $10,000,000. Five or six newspapers are issued here. Sacramento City was founded in the spring of 1849, the central part of the town being about one mile below Sutter's Fort, near the left bank of the American River, belonging to the settlement formerly known as Nueva Helvetia.—Marysville, near the confluence of the Yuba and Feather Rivers, and about 20 miles above the junction of the latter with the Sacramento, is another important mining town. It contains between 8000 and 9000 inhabitants. Steamboats ply regularly between this place and San Francisco, and the main road from Sacramento City passes through it. The other more important places in the northern mining regions are Downieville, Nevada City, Yuba City, Nicolaus, Auburn, Collema, etc. The most northern place in the valley is Shasta City, on the headwaters of the Sacramento. Stockton, on the San Joaquin, near its confluence with the Sacramento, is the chief depot of the southern mines. This is the third place in population in the State, and was settled in 1844, and in two years after abandoned. In 1848, however, another settlement was successfully made, and since that time its growth has been rapid. The channel is navigable for steamboats and vessels of 400 tons burden at all seasons, thus affording a ready communication with the Pacific. In the tributaries of the San Joaquin are several important towns, Moquelumne Hill, Sonora, Mariposa, etc., and a large population is collecting about the Kern River, at the northern extremity of the great valley.

We have thus given a rapid glance at the land of gold, with its various features and characteristics. Its growth and development are among the most extraordinary facts in the history of the world. Had any writer of romance, gifted with a powerful imagination, delineated such a story, his fiction would have been hooted at as violating all probability, as exceeding by far the license accorded to romantic story-tellers. When the tale of the first gold discovery reached the east, it was some time before it obtained credence, being regarded by many much in the light of Locke's great moon hoax. But confirmation speedily followed on the heels of the first statement, and time as it rolled on only developed new sources of wealth in the El Dorado of the Pacific. Then how the new and old world were stirred by the greatness of the event, as the possible consequences of the discovery flashed upon the universal mind. The sons of toil, ill-clad and ill-paid, laboring under the disadvantages of ignorance and lowly station, rushed to embrace the opportunity afforded them of bettering their condition. Some went to the promised land to die—others to enjoy the full fruition of their wildest dreams of golden glitter and wealth.

FAITH.

BY H. POTTER, JR.

Emotions! say, it is no passing thrill,
That lifts the reason from its lofty throne;
Fancie may sway, many bend, may fill
The human heart,—'tis faith alone
That makes us live.

Love breathes a sigh when absence leaves
A shading gloom around the heart;
Love weeps in sorrow, weeps and grieves;
But helping faith bids tears depart,
And checks distrust.

The saint's path no love of earth illumines,
One glorious star irradiates his way,
One beam alone his thirsting soul consumes—
'Tis faith which leads his heart to say,
I worship Thee!

The Pagan, in his wretchedness of mind,
Clings to the crushing car to die in pain—
Clings smilingly, for faith and hope combined
Beats low, soft music, and the heavenly strain
Makes death a bliss.

Not holy faith, most deathless trust,
That humbly bends beneath the heavy rod;
That knows no blight, no cankering rust,
But brings its fullness unto God—
Its fullness without loss.

Faith in my God, and in my fellow-man,
Its preservation is the only gift I crave;
With faith my soul ethereal space may span,
And bless Our Father for the boon he gave—
His precious gift.

THE BATHS OF EL-PENON:

—OR,—

THE SPIRIT-RAPPER.

BY F. C. PRESTON, M. D.

THE baths of El-Penon, situated a few miles from the city of Mexico, are celebrated for their wonderful healing properties—especially in those fevers which the sudden transition from heat and dryness to an immoderate moisture is too apt to engender. At Mexico, there is a church in almost every street; while at El-Penon, one chapel serves for the whole village, and no doubt as earnest invocations to God arise from the altar of this humble house of prayer, as from the more magnificent temples consecrated to the riches of this world, rather than to the eternal and true God. One beautiful morning in spring, the whole population of El-Penon, together with the Mexicans from the hotel of the baths, were assembled in and around the church to witness a procession which was about to pass. The street was strewn with flowers and branches of trees, and the women and children carried in their hands immense bouquets. Suddenly a voice exclaimed, "Behold the saint! behold the saint!" And all assembled, fell upon their knees.

A young girl, of about fourteen years, was the last to leave the church. She was a charming child, with exquisite features and soft, intelligent eyes. Her rich black hair fell in heavy tresses upon her fair shoulders, and was intertwined with golden threads, and adorned with feathers from the most brilliant birds of that country. A beddice of many colors, spangled with silver and gold, a short, striped skirt, ornamented in the same way, gave her the air of one of those dark Mexican beauties seen only in pictures. Radiant and proud (for it was on her account the crowd had assembled), she walked by the side of a lady still young and beautiful, though so pale and sickly-looking, that she seemed scarcely able to support herself.

The young girl's name was Maria; the lady who accompanied her, Madame de Saint Maurice, was her mother. Maria had come to make her first communion. In Mexico, this ceremony holds a peculiar character, from the devotion of its inhabitants. In their eyes, there is not a more august fete—it seems to surround the communicant with a halo; she is a true saint; they pray to her; they ask miracles of her.

As the young girl approached, the women held their bouquets out, so that they might touch her dress and her hair, as they touch the holy sacrament in the solemnities of the Corpus Christi. She received this homage with a charming grace and simplicity, smiling upon all, and even kissing her hand to these honest people. A young boy, sixteen years of age, but large enough to stand for the Apollo Belvidere, with expressive features and eyes full of fire, regarded Maria with an admiration which he could not conceal.

"Madrecita! Madrecita!" cried he, with all the force of eloquence. This word signifies, "She is as beautiful as my mother;" and with Mexicans, whose love for mother is developed in the highest degree, no praise could be more expressive. At the same time he held towards her, with a supplicating air, a bunch of red gillyflowers.

The little saint stopped, and glancing first at the young boy, and then to her mother, said naively: "Mother, how noble he looks! Do you wish to give me your bouquet?"

As the trembling hand of the young boy held it to her, tears of joy glistened in his eyes.

"Thanks! But I wish to give you something in exchange." And unloosing a string of beads, with a medallion attached to it, from her arm, she presented it to him, saying: "Here is something which will remind you of me."

The young Mexican raised it ardently to his lips. Maria was sensible of this movement, and the instinct of the girl developing already in her innocent self-love, she was not indifferent to it.

"What is your name?" asked she, with her usual brusqueness.

"Joseph, mademoiselle."

"Ah, well! Joseph, you must come and see me at the hotel."

"What are you thinking of, foolish child?" inquired a voice which made an attempt to soften its natural rudeness. "And you, cousin, why do you allow Maria to talk thus before everybody, for a quarter of an hour, with this mendicant?"

"Mendicant!" repeated Joseph, in a voice of grief, lowering his head to conceal this time a tear of bitterness. He then darted through the crowd and disappeared.

"Fie, wicked cousin!" said Maria. "You have given pain to that poor boy!"

"Let us go. Take my arm, headstrong girl, and make peace."

"I will not!" said the little girl, with a very resolute pout. And she took her mother's hand.

"Spoiled child!" said her mother, regarding her complacently.

They took the street towards the hotel, in the midst of the crowd which escorted them respectfully, without having understood this incident. One person only had taken interest in it, as a party concerned; this was Joseph, who regarded Maria's cousin with a look full of indignation.

This cousin was a tall, thin young man, with sharp features, a disagreeable expression, and treacherous eyes. Spanish by origin, he was connected to the family of Maria, whose father, a rich Mexican merchant, had married a French lady. Forced to banish himself from Madrid, on account of errors which he had committed, he had come to Mexico to attempt to build up a fortune which his extravagances had dissipated. His relative, M. de Saint Maurice, had consented to interest himself in his house. From that time, his attentions were directed towards his cousin, who would one day realize a large fortune, and whose growing charms excited in his unsatisfied nature a violent passion which he had not thought himself capable of. He was artful enough to conceal from the parents of Maria his bad heart and his immoderate thirst for gold. They took his eagerness for gain, for intelligence in business affairs, and his obsequiousness to his little cousin, for friendship. But childhood is gifted with a rare faculty of penetration. The customs, the prejudices of the world have no influence upon the suddenness of its impressions; it loves or it hates by instinct, and almost always it is right in these two sentiments.

Maria bore with impatience the attentions of her cousin. She took every occasion to avoid him, and notwithstanding her years, the child seemed gifted with a woman's perception, and felt an indescribable uncomfortableness in the contact and the regard of this man. She told her mother of her dislike, but her parents, who had made a spoiled child of her, only sneered at her complaints, which had the effect of increasing her aversion. Her mother was one of those effeminate and listless natures whom contradiction fatigued, and who always needed some one to direct and rule her. She yielded to the influence which her husband's cousin exercised in the house, not perceiving that he seemed in a fair way to become more a master of it than her husband himself. He, absorbed by his affairs, was happy in a partnership which discharged him from a part of his cares, and he saw that his records were well kept, rather than that his house was ruled by an intriguer.

As for M. Juan Hernandez (for so the Spaniard was called), he affected to take the indifference and reproaches of Maria for charming little freaks, never taking offence at them, and maintained at each new injury an imperturbable smile stereotyped upon his face.

The health of Madame de Saint Maurice required the baths of El-Penon, and Juan was no less desirous than her husband to make this visit, who, detained by urgent business, had not been able to be present at the first communion of his daughter, and Juan had come in his stead.

The next day, before his departure, he wished to make his peace with Maria; but she displayed more coldness than usual, reproached him in a childish but very resolute manner for having caused the poor Mexican boy to cry, merely because she thought him handsome.

"Very well," said she, with a fascinating refractoriness, "as you contradict me, I love this boy better than you. He is more noble, and better!"

Juan concealed his chagrin wonderfully, delaying till another occasion his revenge.

Madame de Saint Maurice reproached her daughter; but there was in her little head a firmness of resolution and a justness of ideas perfectly immovable.

The day passed like the others, in a very monotonous manner. At night, the mother and daughter went to the bath, and entering the bathing house, they were surprised at the perfume which they breathed everywhere around them. Maria ran to a table in the middle of the room, and beheld, in a vase of terra-cotta, an enormous bouquet of red gillyflowers. For the first time in her life, perhaps, she stood lost in meditation. This silent homage, and this modest remembrance of her, had touched a chord in her heart—for she did not doubt whose hands had placed them there.

"Ah, what is the matter, my child?" asked her mother. "Does the odor of this bouquet annoy you?" And as she held out her hand to remove it, Maria prevented her by a rapid gesture.

"O no, dear mother! On the contrary, their perfume gives me happiness!" And bending towards them, she deposited a kiss upon them.

The next day she spent behind the blinds, her eyes upon the street, observing all the passengers; but the one for whom she looked did not appear. As for Joseph, he spent his days climbing the rocks to gather flowers, which he came every evening to place upon the table of the hotel. Thus passed fifteen days, till at last Maria desired very much to see him. One night she asked permission of her mother to stay away from the baths. Seated silently in a corner of the apartment, she awaited the arrival of her protégé. He was not long in making his appearance; and walking cautiously to the table, he placed upon it his customary tribute. He was about to place it in the vase, when suddenly a voice saluted him with a "Good evening, Joseph!" which started him so, that he almost dropped upon the floor both the vase and its contents.

"Mademoiselle! mademoiselle!" cried he.

"Are you afraid of me?" said she.

"Do not scold me. You told me that you loved these flowers."

"And you have brought them to please me, and are afraid that I should scold you. On the contrary, I wish to thank you."

"O, I have no need of thanks."

"But why are you so good to me?"

"Because your mother is so good, and has done so much for my mother; and besides, you are so pretty!"

"Who is your father?"

"My father, miss? God has taken him away. You have heard of a poor water-carman, who fell from a precipice? He was my father." Joseph stopped a moment, overcome by this remembrance. He resumed at last: "My mother was left very wretched, till your mother came to her assistance. This is why I love your mother, and why I wish to please you."

Maria took his hand and looked him full in the face. We have already said that she had a charming figure, an agreeable face, and that her mild expression, a little sad, called forth sympathy.

"Joseph," said she, "I wish that we remain friends; and you need not be so secret when you bring me flowers."

The poor boy, overcome at this proposition, took the hand which she held to him, and raised it madly to his lips.

"Ask my soul of me, and it is yours; and if you have need of my life, take that!"

Alas, this innocent friendship, formed under the sole influence of an instinctive tenderness, was to be submitted to a rude proof. The health of Madame de Saint Maurice not experiencing a sufficient amelioration from the baths, the doctors pronounced that the illness from which she suffered would only yield to the influence of her native climate. A long time ago the young wife had obtained from her husband the promise of returning to France, when their fortune should be secure. The time had come; M. de Saint Maurice made no objection; he only asked for time to put his affairs in order.

This news came like a thunder-clap to Maria and Joseph; but the latter soon formed his determination.

"Your cousin will follow you," said he. "Ah well! I shall soon join you also."

"You will follow?" asked Maria, fearfully.

"By the spirit of my poor father, I will do so! Be sure of it."

He said this with such a resolute tone, that it went to the heart of his companion.

"If you keep this promise, Joseph, it is because you love me; if you love me, I shall love you also."

"Holy virgin, listen! If you do love me, Maria, woo to the person who shall dare rob me of your friendship!"

He heard a noise at the door of the hotel.

"Listen!" said Maria. "It is my cousin."

"The Spaniard who called me a mendicant!" said Joseph. "O how I detest him!"

"And I also!" said Maria.

All was ready for the departure of the Saint Maurice family. Juan had persuaded his relations that he was indispensable to them, and they decided that he should act as their secretary. Maria alone made an obstinate opposition to this arrangement; her youthful intelligence had discovered defects in Juan's character which the experience of her parents had failed to do.

The Spaniard was never more insinuating or more obsequious than now. He multiplied his attentions, watched everything, occupied himself with the registers, the receipts and accounts, as though they were his own fortune. It was decided that Juan should go with Monsieur de Saint Maurice to bring his wife and Maria from El-Penon, and conduct them directly to the place of embarkation, where their baggage had already been sent. They were to arrive at the close of day, pass the night at the hotel, and depart at daybreak.

But the sun had set, and no one had yet arrived. Madame de Saint Maurice began to be very uneasy. Her daughter, absorbed in a strange meditation for one of her age, was sitting upon a mat in the corner of the chamber, and held in her hands a large bouquet of gillyflowers and heaths—a parting remembrance from her young friend Joseph!

At last the door opened, and Juan appeared, pale and agitated. His dress was in disorder, and seemed soaked with water.

"Alone!" cried the wife, struck with a fearful presentiment. "Where is my husband?"

The Spaniard replied by those common precautions which announce a misfortune.

"My husband!" "My father!" cried the mother and daughter with one voice.

They would never see him again. Deceived by a secchia, he had fallen and disappeared, notwithstanding the efforts of his companion to save him. The secchia are little stagnant lakes which are confounded with the fields by the covering of turf upon their surface. The traveller often steps upon this deceitful verdure and finds his death in the bottom of a pool. Such had been the fate of M. de Saint Maurice. When Juan had given an account of his frightful misfortune in all its details, he added:

"I feel more than any one can, my dear cousin, how powerless a consolation fortune is, in the midst of such overpowering grief; however, by a wonderful chance, your husband had placed his portmanteau in my charge. Here it is; I return it safely to you."

As he held it to her, he cast a glance at once sinister and triumphant at Maria.

"Mama! dear mama!" cried she, throwing herself upon her mother's breast and mingling her tears with hers. "Dear mama, I am afraid!"

This blow was terrible for the young widow. The doctors pronounced that an immediate departure could alone save her. Juan undertook everything; and eight days after this frightful event, Madame de Saint Maurice, depressed, desolated, incapable of a wish, of a decision, suffered herself to be placed on board "The Pearl," which was to sail for Havre. When they were upon the bridge, Maria, turning her eyes towards the shore, perceived a young man sitting upon a rock, waving an adieu with a branch of pine gathered from the mountain. This sight, for an instant, drew her mind from her grief. In her turn, she took her handkerchief and waved it in the air. But a heavy hand thrust down her arm, and an imperious voice whispered in her ear:

"We are no longer at El-Penon, darling, and you must forget this beggar, whom you will never see again."

"My God," said she, falling upon her knees and sobbing, "have mercy upon the orphan!"

An atrocious smile passed over the lips of the adventurer, and made his sharp teeth glitter like those of a savage beast.

The young girl drew from her bosom a faded bouquet, the first one that she had received from the Mexican boy, and one which reminded her at once of the happiest day of her life, and the first beating of her heart. She pressed it to her lips, and hastened to conceal it—for she kept this treasure as a talisman.

Six weeks after, our three travellers were installed in a hotel in the street Saint George's, at Paris; and the doctors were employed to restore the health of the widow. As for the Spaniard, he had studied the character of Maria, and convinced that he should gain nothing by intimidation, he thought he would try fawning. But his caresses produced upon her the effect of the contact of a reptile.

More easily deceived, and weakened by long suffering, Madame de Saint Maurice with a kind of fascination submitted to the authority of this man, and allowed him to govern her affairs and rule in the house as its master. She was glad to have him take this position, which relieved her from cares which she felt herself unable to bear. This lasted for nearly a year. The perfect unconcern of Madame de Saint Maurice increased every day; but Maria's hatred for her cousin increased also. She called to her assistance the recollection of Joseph; distance and time had strengthened this youthful passion. She had often thought of writing to him; but how should she do it? She resigned herself to pray, to wait; had he not told her that he would come?

The days were very long and very sad to poor Joseph. He went sometimes to Mexico, to hear the news from Europe, for despatches, for letters. But alas! no one ever brought to him a trace of her he had lost.

One day he was sitting sadly at the foot of a palm tree, upon the border of a forest, when he saw coming towards him an old man who was hardly able to support himself. The heat was suffocating; the stranger bewildered in the solitude, was nearly dead of thirst.

"Some drink, my friend," said he, in a supplicating tone; and he fell down exhausted.

The Mexican approached and held to his lips the phial suspended from his neck, which contained the remainder of his provision of water. He was immediately revived.

"You have saved my life, and I wish to thank you for it—but how can I do it? Accept this slight remembrance."

Joseph sighed. The old man sat down beside him in the shade of the palm-trees.

"I have travelled much," said he, "and I have calmed evils greater than yours, without doubt."

"You have travelled?" repeated Joseph. "Have you been to France?"

"I have seen France—its capital; "is it there that your grief lies?"

"It is there that my soul is."

"Ah," said the old man, smiling, "sorrows of love! Listen, child! When I was of your age, and was in love, as you seem to be, nothing gratified me more than to relate my sorrows."

Joseph related everything. The traveller got up, and taking his stick, said seriously:

"Conduct me to the place where your father was killed; if I can do nothing, he can do everything for you."

After walking many hours, they drew near a cavern, situated very high up, among the rocks.

"Sit down and listen," said the old man, in a solemn voice.

At the same time, he placed his hands upon a rock and employed the formulas and signs known to the sect of mediums of which he was a member.

"Listen!" replied the old man, at length. "Your father wishes to speak to you."

"My father!" repeated Joseph, terrified, submitting to the influence of the place, of the hour, the superiority of his companion, and above all, to his superstitious instincts.

The old man raised his voice, as though he was speaking to a third person.

"Thou, to whom I address myself—can you reply to me?"

A heavy blow resounded through the cavern, as though it was caused by one of those volcanic concussions frequent in this place. Joseph fell to the ground.

"Dost thou know the griefs of your son?" inquired the old man.

Another loud blow was the answer.

"Ah, well!" said the old man, with emphasis. "Reply, unknown spirit—I adjure thee, by the happiness of this child; was the death of Maria's father a natural one?"

Joseph started, panting for breath; his forehead was damp with a cold perspiration, for he had a conviction that his destiny was about to be unveiled. The noise did not occur again.

"Was it then the act of a crime?"

A heavy blow shook the cavern.

"My father! my father!" cried Joseph; "tell me the guilty person! Or, rather, I know it—it is it not the Spaniard?"

The answer—that is to say, a very sensible knocking—immediately followed this question. These strange interrogatories lasted for more than an hour, until Joseph had cleared all his doubts. When he ceased, the poor boy knew that the assassin of the unfortunate M. de Saint Maurice was upon the eve of marrying the daughter of his victim!

The traveller stood immovable before Joseph, silently and attentively observing him. At last Joseph started, and clasping the knees of the old man, he cried:

"My father! my father! there is a crime to punish—do not abandon me!"

"Be it so; my child, I will assist you. But you have heard that time presses; follow me."

"Where shall we go?"

"To France!"

The church of Notre Dame de Lorette was adorned with its most magnificent ornaments; the bells pealed out merrily; an eager crowd pressed around the door, as if in expectation of some event. It was only the very common ceremony of a marriage, that was to take place; but so many piquant things had been said of this one—the bride was so beautiful, the bridegroom was so generous, and lavished gold with such bounty—that the church people were all stimulated to curiosity.

The priest was at the altar; the persons to be married, had arrived. Every mouth uttered the exclamation—"Behold them! Behold them!" In short, a string of carriages conducted the elite of the fashionable world, the Spanish aristocrats then in Paris, and the couple who were to swear love and fidelity before God, towards the church. The bride descended first, or rather was lifted from the carriage, pale as death, under her wreath of orange-flowers.

Suddenly, as the crowd dispersed under the portal to make room for them, an arm broke through the close ranks and presented to the bride a bouquet of red gillyflowers, from which hung a medallion, attached by a ribbon. This movement recalled her to herself. She regarded the flowers, and seizing the medallion, she uttered a cry of "Joseph! Joseph!"

They thought her mad.

"Let us go, my child; of what are you dreaming?" said her mother, in a mild tone of voice.

"Of what do I dream?" repeated she, with firmness. "I dream that I have vows to keep, and I shall keep them!"

"What does all this mean?" demanded Juan.

"I will explain to you," replied an old man, stepping out from the crowd. He drew him aside.

"What do you pretend? Have I time to listen to you? I do not even know you."

"But I know you—and I have come from Mexico to speak with you!"

The adventurer felt himself grow pale under the searching look of the stranger, who continued:

"You will not marry this young girl—"

"The reason?"

"Go and demand it from the secchia of El-Penon!"

This formal accusation, at such a moment, terrified the murderer. He stammered:

"The death of my cousin—"

"Is your work. Providence is not a lie; it sends invisible witnesses, who will confound, sooner or later, the most audacious criminal."

Jean did not doubt that the old man, and perhaps the young one, had witnessed the scene which was terminated by the death of his relative. He saw that he was lost; and with quick strides, he walked through the church, in the midst of the crowd, and disappeared. They carried Maria, fainting, into the sacristy, and there surrounded her with attentions. The first face that she saw, upon opening her eyes, was Joseph's.

"I am saved! I am saved!" said she.

She said truly; her cousin never re-appeared. Accompanied by her mother and her new friends, she wished to return to Mexico, re-visit El-Penon, its hotel, its lake, its rocks and its church—in which she gave her hand to him who had so worthily and nobly gained her.

An aged Lady.

Miss Lydia Barnard, of Amherst, N. H., completed her 100th year a short time since. She is a sister of the late Jeremiah Barnard, and of a family noted for longevity. Her mother lived to the age of 101. Miss Barnard is still bright and active for one of her years. Some months since, learning that Spanish coin had depreciated, she expressed her anxiety lest she should outlive the full value of our gold coin, of which she holds a treasured few.

THE YANKEE AND THE QUAKER.

Some years ago, a young New Englander found himself in the back part of Pennsylvania, ashore as to the means of living. In his strait he applied to a wealthy Quaker in the neighborhood for help.

"I will furnish thee with work, and will pay thee for it, friend," said the Quaker, "but it is not my custom to give alms to any one able to labor, like thee."

"Well, that's all I want," said the Yankee: "of course, I am willing to work."

"What can thee do, friend?"

"I will do anything to get a little money to help me out of my difficulties."

"Well, there is an axe. Thee may pound on that log with the head of the axe, and if thee is diligent and faithful I will pay thee a dollar a day."

"Agreed, I'd as soon do that as most anything else."

And so the youth went to work and pounded lustily with the head of the axe upon the log. After a pause he stopped to get breath, then went at it again. But after half an hour he stopped, threw down the axe impatiently, and walked away, saying:

"I'll be hanged if I'd cut wood without seeing the chips fly!"—New York Sun.

THE OLD WOMAN AND THE SAILOR.

A worthy old woman in this city was one day walking along the street, quietly smoking her pipe. A jovial sailor, rendered a little mischievous by liquor, came sawing down, and when opposite the old woman saucily pushed her aside, and, with a pass of his hand, knocked the pipe out of her mouth. He then halted to hear her fret at his trick, and to enjoy a laugh at her expense. But what was his astonishment, when she meekly picked up the pieces of her broken pipe, without the least resentment in her manner; then, giving him a dignified look of mingled sorrow, kindness and pity, said, "God forgive you, my son, as I do." It touched a tender chord in the heart of the rude tar. He felt ashamed, condemned and repentant. The tear started in his eye; he must make reparation. He heartily confessed his error, and, thrusting both his hands into his full pockets of change, he forced all their contents upon her, exclaiming, "God bless you, kind mother! I'll never do so again."

HOLDING THE MIRROR UP TO NATURE.

Mr. Hutchison, who visited the West Coast of Africa in the Niger steamer, contrived, we hope unwittingly, to make a king's daughter ashamed of her own appearance. "With the king two of his daughters came off, who had their teeth stained with the red juice of some species of tobacco leaf, which gave them a very carnivorous appearance. On my leading one of them to contemplate herself in the mirror in the saloon, she at first was puzzled when she looked in; and I observed clearly that she had never seen a looking-glass before. I touched her shoulder, and made signs to her to open her mouth and gaze again, which she did; and the moment she saw the red teeth revealed she jumped back with a scream of horror, and fled from the cabin in terror."

ORA ET LABORA.

BY WILLIE E. PASOR.

Oratio et Labor. Pilgrim,
 Wedding to some sacred shrine,
 Keep thy heart from growing weary,
 And the crown shall yet be thine.
 Pray and labor! sloth in action
 May be fatal to thy hope;
 And an hour of indecision
 Make your steps to error slope.

Oratio et Labor. Student,
 Bending o'er the midnight oil,
 Herve yourself to greater vigor,
 Brace your heart for sterner toil.
 Pray and labor! and the record
 In the after years shall be,
 "After crossing seas of trial
 He did reach Port Victory."

Oratio et Labor. Christian,
 Struggling in this world of sin,
 Keep your heart from growing feeble,
 Faint not from the woe within.
 Pray and labor! You will conquer,
 And the victor's palm will hold
 In the land beyond the Jordan,
 In the city paved with gold.

Oratio et Labor. Pilgrim,
 Student, Christian, ever be Earnest in your prayers and labor,
 And their power your soul shall see.
 Pray and labor! Earnest action
 Ever gains its own demand;
 Pray and labor! and your footsteps
 Soon will tread the Promised Land.

PAUL RANDOLPH:

—OR,—

WILES OF THE HEART.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

"AND is this your final answer, Eleanor?"
 "Yes, Mr. Randolph."

Paul Randolph had asked me to marry him, and I had refused. What of that? you will ask. Why, nothing, only he was my father's friend, a very good, honorable, nice sort of a man, twice my age, whom I respected and liked very much, but had never thought of in the light of a husband. I was a gay, giddy, romantic girl, just entering my seventeenth year, and, like most all young ladies of my age, had an ideal hero in my mind's eye, whose exact counterpart it would be difficult to find among our earthly specimens of manhood. This hero, without fail, was to be tall and slender, with hair as black as a raven's wing (by the way, a raven is something I never saw), large, fathomless black eyes, that could look frantic if the occasion required, and black, heavy, highwaymanish whiskers. I had an indistinct idea that I should some day tumble over a precipice, and this magnificent creature would suddenly spring forward, out of thin air, and catch me. I should faint away, of course, and when I recovered, the stranger would be dashing water in my face, and beseeching me, by a great many endearing titles to come back to life. Then he would take me tenderly in his arms, and springing upon the back of a coal-black charger, which stood by, pawing the earth impatiently, he would carry me quickly to my father's cottage.

After that, there would be the sound of a guitar beneath my window, at midnight, stolen meetings with my preserver, secret vows, an elopement, a private marriage, and a journey across the ocean to escape the vigilance of my incensed parents. I always forgot, in these speculations, that my father was a good-natured, easy, care-for-nothing old soul, who let me have my own way about everything, and that my gentle mother would as soon have thought of rocking a catamount to sleep in a cradle, as of undertaking to dictate who I should, or who I should not marry.

Paul Randolph bore no comparison to my ideal. He was tall enough, to be sure, but he was broad-shouldered and full-chested, with large, strong hands, that could cover both of mine, so that not even the tip of a little finger would be visible. His eyes were clear, and would light up with wonderful fire and brilliancy, when he was excited about anything, or melt into an almost womanly softness of expression, if he was speaking of a subject that lay near his heart; but they were gray, nothing but gray, after all. His hair was plain brown, without a curl or a wave in it to distinguish it from anybody's hair, and his beard was of the same ugly color.

My ideal always boasted a moustache. Paul wouldn't raise one, though I teased him to with all my might. He had a very handsome, proud-looking mouth, however. I used to think that might be the reason. My ideal had a clear, ringing tread, which I could distinguish among a thousand. Paul, though I always knew his step when I did hear it, would go about the house as silently as a woman; and very often, when I thought myself alone in the parlor, I would look up from my book or embroidery frame, to see him not far from me, reading or watching me as I worked, apparently as much at home as though I had known he was there, and when he came in. My ideal was brave, and fearless, and lion-hearted; but he always made my lightest wish a law.

Paul didn't. One day I found him smoking, and told him pettishly that I thought he had formed an odious habit, and I didn't see the use of one's making one's self so disagreeable.

"Ah!" he answered, in just the coolest way imaginable, "is smoke offensive to you? You never told me."

He tossed his cigar out the window, without another word. I supposed, of course, that he would never touch one again, but it wasn't half an hour before I found him smoking away as vigorously as before.

We disagreed, too, on a variety of subjects. For instance, I believed in love at first sight. Paul laughed at me whenever I mentioned the subject.

"Of course," he would say, "there are forms and faces that please us at the first glance, and make us desire to become more nearly acquainted with the mind and heart they accompany. But I believe that to love truly, reverently, passionately, if you will; to love with an affection that will strengthen the soul, while it satisfies the heart, there must be a long, thorough, intimate acquaintanceship. Love at first sight cannot be based on any other than a fickle foundation."

No, no, Paul Randolph would do very well for a friend, a teacher, or a brother; but for a husband, a statue of Washington would have been more suitable. There were three things indispensable to the man whom I should choose for a lover—black hair, black eyes, and a black moustache! Yet when he went away from me that evening, looking sad and grieved, as though his heart were bruised, and he would not have me know it, I could have cried for sorrow. I was not heartless enough to glory in my conquest, since it gave me no satisfaction, and him only pain. I could not account for the feeling of discontent that weighed upon my spirits like a cold cloud. There was an indefinable sensation mingling with my pity for him, as if I had put away something that long afterwards I might wish I had retained, or gone out under a black, pitiless, stormy sky, wilfully shutting the door between myself and a warm sheltering-place. Did pity for another always produce such dissatisfaction with one's self, I wondered? I could not tell, I had never felt so lonely, and unhappy, and low-spirited before.

The mellow light of an autumn sunset came in and filled the room like a mist of thin gold; but I shrank away amidst the shadows, like a guilty thing, for whom it was a sin to sit in the sunshine, after I had wounded so noble a heart as Paul Randolph's. A few late asters and marigolds that he had gathered for me, stood in a little vase upon the table. Their purple and gold blossoms looked like a reproach to me. I could not bear the sight, and hastily took off my black silk apron to throw over them. Then I curled myself up on the sofa, and like a great baby, as I was, cried myself to sleep.

I wish, for the sake of a story, that I could fill up the next year and a half with marvellous incidents and strange experiences. I wish I could tell of countless suitors, of narrow escapes, of treachery, of rivals, of despair ending in bliss. But truth compels me to be prosy. The days had gone by, and left me with the same home, the same friends, the same heart. True, I had had one lover in the time, a lover with black hair, black eyes, and a black moustache! But we quarrelled incessantly, and parted, at last, in high dudgeon. I abominated moustaches from that time forward.

The next morning after I told Paul Randolph that I could not be his wife, he went away, saying, as he held my hand at parting, that since he could not make himself the home he had planned, he must take up his wandering, lonely life again, as it would not be well for him to stay where he should be perpetually reminded of the great blank in his heart.

I told him I was sorry for what had happened, but thought it would be better for him to go; that in my remembrances of him there would be nothing painful save the thought that I could not be to him all he wished; that I was not good, or old, or wise enough to make him happy; and then, pulling a white blossom from my bridal rose-tree on the window, I put it in his hand, and told him that when he could forget what he had said to me, and remember me only as a wicked, silly little girl whom he had honored more than she deserved, he might bring it back to me.

In the eighteen months which followed, I did not hear from him, when, one morning, my father startled me by the announcement that his old friend, Paul Randolph, was coming to spend a few weeks with us, and that a cousin of his, Miss Lucia West, would accompany him. I do not know as I could analyze correctly the feelings with which I received this little piece of news. I wondered if he had quite outgrown his old attachment for me, and if he would not look pale and thin, and sigh when I spoke to him. I thought such a state of things would be terribly disagreeable, and hoped he had found some one else to fill my place. Perhaps that cousin of his was the one. What should she be travelling with him for, if it wasn't so? I was sure I wished it with all my heart.

I shrank from meeting him, with an almost childish dread, and when, one bright June afternoon, the village coach drove up to our door, and I saw him spring to the ground, and then lift out what looked to me like a little bundle of muslin and lace, I felt much more like running away, than like going forward to welcome them.

But he greeted me with such a cordial frankness, that I was ashamed of my weakness, and cast off my embarrassment entirely. There was no trembling in the strong hands that grasped mine so heartily, no quivering in the clear voice which asked after my welfare with such courteous yet earnest politeness; no lingering sadness about the handsome mouth, no shadow of reproach in the serene gray eye; nothing to signify that a single pulse throbbed quicker for his being near me once more. I sighed.

And the bundle of muslin and lace that fluttered up to me, leaning on his arm, what was that like? The bluest of blue eyes, the glossiest and most golden of braided hair, lips the color of a carnation pink, teeth like a row of snow-flakes, cheeks flushed as delicately as apple-blossoms; dainty hands and feet, and a voice that sounded like the echo of sweet laughter; this was my first remembrance of Lucia West. I was certain that the blank in Paul Randolph's life had been filled. Somehow the reflection didn't give me such a wonderful amount of comfort, as I had supposed it would. I sighed again.

Well, a fortnight went by very quickly. Our guests seemed to enjoy themselves, and were almost always together. Paul Randolph's attentions to me had never been so assiduous as those he now paid his cousin. Though I generally joined them in their pleasure excursions, it was at her side he lingered longest and oftenest. It was her he lifted, in his arms when we came to rough places in our walks, carrying her over bogs and rocks, as tenderly as if she had been a baby, while he only offered me his hand. It was in her lap he tossed the rarest wild-flowers, for her ear he spoke in his lowest and tenderest tones. And she would tease him, and pull his ears and hair, and play all manner of mad pranks with him, till I used to wish I could shake her and make her sober a moment. I tried hard to think that she would be a better wife to him than I could have done, and that I was happy in seeing them so devoted to each other. I say I tried hard, but in spite of myself I couldn't do it.

One evening, my father, and Mr. Randolph and I, sat alone in the parlor, mother had gone out to visit a sick neighbor, and Lucia was up stairs dressing for a concert. The conversation turned upon her.

"What a gay, gossamer-like, wee-bit of a thing that cousin of yours is, Randolph," said my father, laughing. "I should think you would be afraid of overlooking her sometime. It would be a pitiful death for her to die, by being crushed under one of your big feet."

Paul smiled, and replied, "She is the only relative I have on earth, and we are all in all to each other. Gay, and gossamer-like, and small she may be, but with a whole woman's heart, for all that. Do you not agree with me, Miss Eleanor?"

"She is rather too childish for my liking," I answered, coldly, for I felt cross and pottish, towards her especially, and my ill-humor manifested itself in my words.

Father looked up at me with a wicked, provoking smile; and said, shaking his head at me, "Envious, eh?"

I could have choked him. Mr. Randolph looked a trifle surprised, I thought, but did not answer.

"You said she was your only relative," continued my father, after a pause. "I was not aware of it. Judging from appearances, I should suppose you intended making your relationship still nearer. How is it?"

I saw a slight flush come over Mr. Randolph's face, as I looked up for his reply; but he answered quietly and readily, as he always answered everything:

"No relationship that any one can ever form with her, however near or dear, will be other than fortunate. I am sure of that."

What was there in the simple words he uttered, that made my heart ache? They were but a confirmation, delicately given, to the very thing I had hoped for so earnestly a few weeks before. Why did they strike me so cruelly? Whence came the sense of utter desolation that overwhelmed me, till I was obliged to turn away, in order to hide the quick tears brimming to my eyes?

Ah! only those who have blinded themselves for years to the secrets of their own hearts, and felt self-deception like a false covering suddenly wrunched away as with a grasp of fire, can answer me. I knew then what I had never known before. Sentimentalism, vanity, romance fell away from me in an instant; a hateful, treacherous mask that had covered my eyes so long. I looked, for the first time, into my naked heart, and saw daguerreotypes in its innermost recesses, a face, grave, serene, noble—the face of Paul Randolph! Too late I had discovered how dear he was to me. After I had put away, blindly, the only hand that could ever truly lead me; after I had cheated myself and him, by refusing a love that would have made me the most blessed of women, I found that I had robbed my own heart of its birthright. And she was to be crowned with the blessedness that I had the first and best right to claim. O, God! how bitterly waged the fierce warfare in my breast.

I went to the window, but my steps were unsteady and tottering, I could hardly realize the startling conviction that forced itself upon me, cutting me off from hope and peace, as I thought, forever. I do not remember how long I sat there, or any of the conversation that followed; nothing but the dull, terrible anguish that stupefied me, and the hum of voices which sounded in my ears like the low mocking of an invisible fiend.

When I looked around, after the first dreary feeling of despair had spent its bitterness, my father had left the room, and Mr. Randolph was standing beside me at the window. It was the first time we had been alone together since he came. In my despair, I prayed it might also be the last.

"Do you remember this, Eleanor?" he asked, taking a folded paper from his vest pocket, and undoing it before my eyes. A little dry, faded flower fell from it into my lap. It was the rose I had given him when we parted. He had brought it back as I had told him to. Could I not have been spared that, at least, of all things?

I forced back the cry of pain that rose to my lips, and compelled myself to say steadily:

"O, yes, Mr. Randolph! You have observed my last charge, faithfully, it seems. Hearts are not such brittle things as we are apt to take them for, after all. They learn new lessons before the old ones are forgotten."

"No, you mistake me, Eleanor, I have not brought this to give it back to you, but only to tell you that I must always keep it, unless you will take it from me on easier terms. Is there no—"

"Paul! Paul! Come here a moment," cried the musical voice of Lucia West from the hall, and without completing the sentence, he left me.

What was that he had said? I leaned my head back against the cool window-panes, and tried to think. I could not tell whether I was miserable or happy; whether I longed for or dreaded the words he had left unsaid. My eye fell on the faded rose that lay where he had left it, in my lap, I caught it up, and pressed it passionately to my lips.

"Eleanor!"

I looked up, Paul Randolph stood in the doorway watching me. He came quickly forward with a rapid, eager step, as I put both my hands over my face to conceal the sudden dash of blood that his impetuous pronouncement of my name, brought to my cheeks.

"Eleanor! Eleanor Hughes! Tell me if I misinterpret your action, or I shall be audacious enough to say more than I meant to," he cried, in a hoarse, passionate whisper, taking my hands away from my face, and pressing them between his own, convulsively. "Tell me, what am I to understand?"

There was that in his tone and words that broke through all the doubt and anguish of my soul, like a flash of sunshine. I lifted my bowed face, that he might read my heart in my crimson cheeks, and wet, tearful eyes.

"Understand anything you choose," I answered, speaking through my tears, "only tell me that you are not going to marry Lucia West."

The next moment he caught me, with a glad cry to his heart.

"Lucia West—my cousin—marry her? God forbid! I love her as I would a dear, younger sister, but she has been engaged to a friend of mine more than a year. He promised to meet her here, and it was to inform me that he had come, and she could dispense with my attendance to the concert to-night, that she just called me away. I have come back to you as I went away, loving you with all the strength of my soul. Are you satisfied?"

Of course I said yes, as quickly as I could between the kisses he sealed my lips with. I shall not tell exactly how long it was that he held me in his arms that night, telling me that after one had come so near losing a bird once, it was best to keep it a close prisoner, until fully assured that it would never try to escape again. Anyway, it was a long time, and when Lucia came in from the concert, I was very busy untangling my curls from his vest-buttons.

There is nothing more for me to add, only that I am happier as Eleanor Randolph, than I ever was as Eleanor Hughes!

GOING IN FOR RADICAL MEASURES.

Edward Paine, at the time of the Boston massacre, March 5, 1770, occupied the house, afterwards the residence of his son William, on the south side of King Street. Standing before his door when the soldiers fired, a ball struck him, on the after part of his thigh. Clapping his hand upon the spot, he went into his parlor. Mrs. Paine seeing the blood falling upon his stocking, exclaimed: "Gracious heaven, my dear, you are wounded!"

"I know it, Mrs. Paine," he replied, "and those soldiers deserve to be talked to."—Boston Post.

THE ELOPEMENT.

BY GIDDINGS H. BALLOU.

MADAME BEAUMONT was now in her eightieth year. In her youth she had been very beautiful, and had enjoyed the pleasures of life without injury to her natural amiability and innocence of character. Insensibly adapting herself to the gradual lapse of time, she had grown old in a manner scarcely perceptible to herself, or to the numerous friends by whom she was surrounded, and of whose brilliant society she formed a chief charm. Having lost, years before, the husband of her choice, she remained possessed of an excellent fortune, devoting her affections to her grandson Lovain and the young Amelia Villars, who both resided with her.

Amelia was an orphan, without fortune. Her dying mother had confided her to the care of Madame Beaumont, who had brought her up with the tenderest solicitude. Madame Beaumont loved Amelia as her own daughter, and already began to consider her as actually such—for she had long since formed the project of uniting her to her grandson. The young people, brought up together with this prospect in view, delivered themselves without restraint to those mutual sentiments which the promised future inspired.

Lovain was but twenty years of age—Amelia sixteen. Nothing had ever occurred to disturb their mutual confidence. But the love which has no inquietude, finishes by becoming a habit, a sentiment, which fills the heart without occupying the imagination. Unfortunately, Lovain's imagination needed to be occupied. He was lively, ardent, and romantic to excess; and it was necessary that he should be separated by some unforeseen and apparently insurmountable obstacle from Amelia, before he could perceive how much he really loved her.

Such was the situation of affairs, when all at once Lovain became restless and dreamy. He absented himself frequently, returning late, with a sadness which he did not seek to dissimulate. He no longer imparted his confidence to Amelia, who mourned in secret his change of manner.

"He no longer loves me," said she to herself, "since he thus conceals everything from me."

As for Madame Beaumont, she was in a continual agitation.

"What does it mean?" said she. "What can he be doing? Where does he go? It is singular, surely, that he absents himself so much of late. Why is he so reserved with Amelia? Does he wish to avoid the match which I have so much at heart? At all events, I must have them married at once; for, if I longer defer the accomplishment of my project, some coquette will turn the head of the young simpleton, and detach him from my dear Amelia—and then adieu to all the happiness which I had promised myself and him."

The following morn, as Lovain was about to leave the house as usual, Madame Beaumont called him aside, saying that she desired a few moments' conversation with him.

"Ah, madame," replied Lovain, with an air of impatience, "I must needs go; a matter of importance—"

"Importance!" interrupted Madame Beaumont, smiling. "It cannot be more important than that which I would suggest to you, and which seems to have departed from your memory. Come, then, my dear boy, I wish to have you married forthwith."

"Ah, madame, do not mention it—I am not twenty years old."

"So much the better. Must one be fifty, before thinking of such a thing? Such language is new in your mouth. To have heard you some time since, one would have supposed you ready at fifteen. Now, monsieur has more important matters on hand. However, Amelia is so gentle, so lovely, so interesting!"

"You are right, madame; I am well aware of her excellent qualities, but—"

"She has no taste, either, for luxury or dissipation. She would manage a household so well! In short, what business have you more pressing than to assure yourself of so loving a companion?"

"I am entirely of your mind, madame. Amelia unites all those virtues which can make a man happy; but—"

"There, I want no more *but*s! I want you to marry her. I have now lived eighty years. I am eager to see about me little ones who will amuse me with their prattle, play tricks, break my spectacles, make me laugh and scold all at the same time. Come, then, you shall marry her—you shall marry Amelia!"

"How impatient you are!"

"Good! Patience is not the virtue of old people. They have no time to spare in waiting."

This last argument appeared to touch Lovain.

"I would comply," he said, "I would comply with your desire, this very day; but, since I must avow the fact, I am desperately in love with another person."

"With another person? Charming! And what is her name?"

"I know not."

"Where does she live?"

"I am not acquainted with her residence."

"What is her family—her fortune?"

"I am as ignorant of that, as of the rest."

"Where, then, have you seen her?"

"I have not seen her."

"You have heard her spoken of, then, without doubt?"

"Never."

"Somebody has treated you to a high-flown discourse on the excellences of her person and character?"

"Not at all. No one has said anything to me about her."

"Grandson, grandson, I will urge the marriage no longer. It is not a wife you need, but a situation in a mad-house. There! I must quit you; for indeed your nonsense makes me angry."

With these words, she left him; and Lovain could not avoid acknowledging to himself that her reproaches were in some measure deserved.

"Alas," he exclaimed, "she is right! I am, indeed, a foolish fellow. Here I can marry a girl endowed with a thousand virtues, whom I have loved from my childhood, and who loves me; and yet I sacrifice my good fortune to a woman I know not—whose existence, even, may be a mere fantasy. Yes; but if she does exist, what charms she must possess! What a face!" he continued, regarding with eager looks a miniature he pressed repeatedly to his lips. "What spirit, what refinement, what sensibility are visible here. How gracious and delicate the outlines of her figure! Ah, I would give all my fortune—yes, half my existence, to find the original of this picture."

Lovain ceased, perceiving the approach of his valet Oliver—a man of intelligence, whose services Madame Beaumont had gladly secured to her grandson. Full of zeal and fidelity, he was allowed to speak his mind: and he sometimes gave very useful counsels. He had perceived the inquietude and sadness of his young master, and had seen, with chagrin, the youth's coldness towards Amelia, and the disappointment which afflicted Madame Beaumont. He desired to draw from Lovain the secret which threatened the peace of the whole family. But how to do it, was the question. To solicit a confidence of this kind, is to remove ourselves still further from it. However, at twenty, the secret of our passions is ever at the end of our tongue. Lovain had need of a confidant, and, after several days of hesitation, determined to open the matter to Oliver. He told him that, on a certain day, walking in the Champs Elysees with Madame Beaumont, Amelia, and several other friends, he had perceived on the turf before him something shining in the rays of the sun.

"I approached," said he, "the object which had attracted my curiosity, and discovered a beautiful miniature. I cannot express the sensation which that angelic face and form produced on me. From the moment of discovery, nothing else has occupied my imagination. The more I gaze, the more charms I behold. I have been every day to the place where I found it. I have frequented all the public resorts, all the public walks, in hope of meeting the adorable woman whom this portrait represents. But my hopes have been all in vain; and I am the most unhappy of men."

Oliver was too well acquainted with his young master to oppose his mood. He affected a mournful air; and, after having expressed his admiration of the mysterious portrait, promised to employ every means to discover the original. His first step was to confide the whole matter to Madame Beaumont. He did not intend to betray his master, but only to promote his true interests—for who, so well as Madame Beaumont, could keep guard over the heart and head of young Lovain? Annoying as was the discovery thus made to her, Madame Beaumont could not help laughing.

"So then our young simpleton has fallen in love with a portrait! Tell me, Oliver—is the picture so very handsome?"

"Handsome, madame? Ah, it is too much so! I have never seen so charming a face. Mademoiselle Amelia approaches it, perhaps; but nevertheless—"

Here Amelia, who had entered the chamber without being perceived, and who had heard all, could not refrain from sighing. Madame Beaumont had no more desire to laugh. She dismissed Oliver, after having charged him to procure the miniature from Lovain, if it were only for a few moments. The undertaking was a difficult one, but the zeal of the old servant at length suggested to him an expedient.

The next morning, he entered Lovain's chamber with an air of the most lively emotion.

"Ah, sir," he cried, "I bring you joyful news?"

"What is it? What say you? Have you found the original?"

"Yes, sir, I know—I know all. Quick! rouse yourself, sir!"

Lovain sat upright in bed.

"Speak! speak, my dear Oliver!" he cried.

"I am dying with impatience."

"Wait—I am half suffocated! I ran all the way here."

"You will kill me!"

"She was in a splendid carriage, drawn by four horses. I followed it till it entered the court of a magnificent mansion. Ah, sir! what a beautiful figure! She is a brunette—and such lovely eyes!"

"Ah!" exclaimed Lovain, in a delirium of joy. "What is her name?"

"Her name is—is—Romainville. "Yes, I am quite sure that it is the person."

"What! are you not certain?"

"Not exactly, sir; but it is your own fault, for if you had lent me the miniature, I could have compared the two together."

"Lend you the miniature? No, no! Here, look at it carefully. You can remember."

"I remember? Ah, I have no memory at all! I sometimes even forget my own name."

"Well, then, I will dictate a description to you, and you can learn it by heart."

On this, Lovain commenced an accurate inventory of the beauties of the picture, which Oliver repeated after him, word by word, after the following fashion:

"A lofty forehead, white as ivory and smooth as glass. Eyebrows dark, and beautifully arched. The finest hair in the world. Black eyes, full of spirit and sensibility. A handsome little nose. Lips the color of rose. A little hollow in each cheek. A well-rounded chin, with a dimple in the middle."

"See now," exclaimed Lovain, "you have repeated your lesson very well indeed."

"Yes, sir," replied Oliver. "My memory is better than I thought. Let me see, now; I will repeat it once more, to be certain that I have it right."

Oliver re-commenced; but, through design or inadvertence, he mixed everything together. Eyes became blue—hair, brown; the forehead, lofty as ivory and white as glass; the chin, small and handsome, with a little dimple full of spirit and sensibility. Lovain was in a rage; but Oliver very sensibly observed that he was not to be blamed for the deficiency of his memory.

"Without the picture," said he, "I shall certainly make some blunder, and can never be positive to whom I lead you."

Lovain, notwithstanding his reluctance, was obliged to yield. He delivered the picture to Oliver, who promised shortly to bring him good news.

That very evening, Oliver, faithful to his engagement, informed his master that he had, without any doubt, been able to compare the picture with its original. He related how, by means of a waiting-maid whom he had known in times past, he got himself placed near Made-moiselle Romainville. He gave the most brilliant description of her charms—informing Lovain that the young lady was dependent on a guardian, one of the most ill-tempered and jealous men in existence. His name was Hardstone—a name which perfectly described his character. He desired to marry his fair pupil; and in order to bring about his purpose, kept her in absolute solitude, and treated her with a rigor which would certainly be her death. During this recital, Lovain by turns wept, smiled and raged. Oliver continued to say that, by the good offices of the waiting-maid, he succeeded in introducing himself to this Hardstone, and that he had gained the confidence of the pitiless man by cunningly flattering his dominant passion, jealousy.

"I made him understand," said Oliver, "that the quarter where he dwelt was too noisy, too much frequented. I represented that the street where we lived was a veritable desert, and so worked upon him, that he has really determined to remove hither. And, most incredible as it is, he is coming at once to hire the house whose windows overlook our court."

Lovain was in raptures. He embraced Oliver.

"Oliver," he said, "I can no longer regard you as a servant. Henceforth you are my friend."

"Just so," replied Oliver; "henceforth I am your friend. But permit me to continue my story."

What were the emotions of Lovain, when he heard that the mistress of his fancy was no less in love with him, than he with her? She it was, who had first seen the young man as he walked with his friends in the Champs Elysees. She had been in despair at his failing to regard her; and she it was, who, in passing near him, had dropped the miniature, hoping that the man she loved would be brought to notice it, and through its possession, become the means of rescuing her from her wretched confinement. Oliver concluded with the information that mademoiselle and her guardian were to change their habitation on the morrow, and with the entreaty that his young master would curb his impatience till the proper time should arrive.

It is very easy to advise a youth of twenty to restrain his impatience; but it is not quite so easy to follow the advice. A hundred times Lovain regarded the mansion which was about to enclose the object of his desire. All night long he lay awake, revolving a thousand schemes within his mind, by which he might rescue the unfortunate fair one—for he was fully resolved to snatch her from the grasp of her pitiless guardian. He reckoned all the ready money which he possessed, viz., a hundred louis which Madame Beaumont had just given him. With this sum, nothing appeared too difficult of execution. Having passed a sleepless night, he rose early in the morning and prepared a rope ladder. He ordered Oliver to have a post-chaise, ready at the minute, stationed at a certain distance from the house. He was on needles' points all the day, and lost not a moment from watching the window of the apartment which his mistress was to occupy. At last, Oliver came to tell him that the hitherto deserted mansion had received its expected tenants. Lovain lent an attentive ear. He heard a noise, and believed the window about to open. Another hour of watchfulness, and the window opened in very truth. A letter fell at the feet of the young lover, who seized it eagerly and opened it with a trembling hand. Hastily his eyes devoured its contents. They were all that one could wish. This delicate missive began by entreating excuse for the apparent imprudence of its writer—a step to which she was compelled by the cruelty of her situation. She owned that she had, at first sight, been attracted towards him. She hinted that she could have no strong objection to escape from her irksome confinement—especially, could it happen by the assistance of the only person whom in any possibility she would be able to love. The billet finished with the following words:

"My tyrant is obliged to quit us this evening, at ten. My chambermaid and myself have permission to walk in the garden belonging to our house. But the garden walls are high. The gate is close locked, and my tyrant alone holds possession of the key. O that some inspiration might enable you to aid my escape!"

"What a beautiful letter!" exclaimed Lovain, enthusiastically. "Even if I did not love her so deeply, pity alone would make me attempt her rescue. I tell you, no obstacles shall prevent me."

"Eh!" replied Oliver, shaking his head; "the walls are very high."

"We will scale them, my friend."

"Yes—you might do so, indeed! But your mistress will have to go out by the gate—and the rascally gate is close locked."

"We will break it open."

"Yes; but the noise will reach the guardian's ears. A little reflection will show us that we must employ other means. We must procure the key of the garden. You will say it is impossible; but I think not. I have a capital plan to accomplish the thing."

Oliver proceeded to explain. It was necessary to his plan that Lovain should be personally introduced to Monsieur Hardstone. It was quite as necessary that the graceful figure of the youth should not be seen in its own proper proportions, but rather in a disguise that would effectually conceal them. There was in the house a suit of clothes which Lovain's grandfather, Monsieur de Beaumont, had worn at his wedding. These would be just the thing. Lovain was to cover his head with one of the old gentleman's monstrous wigs; to bend his back, arch his legs, lean on a long gold-headed cane, and to cough at every word.

"Monsieur Hardstone is rather short sighted," continued Oliver; "and I promise you possession of the key, if you will but follow my directions."

Lovain hesitated for some time. He would make such a ridiculous appearance in the eyes of his mistress! Oliver assured him, on the contrary, that Mademoiselle Romainville was a person of too much sense to attach importance to the caprices of fashion. Furthermore, she had often laughed at the dress of the young, and had declared the bygone styles much more noble and decent than the present. This decided Lovain; and he forthwith made choice of the most old-fashioned dress that his grandfather's wardrobe contained. Oliver, presiding over his toilet, praised the grace with which he wore the habit of brodered crimson velvet, the long ruffles, and the monstrous peruke.

"Indeed, sir," he continued, "one would think that he beheld the very ghost of your grandfather. Excellent! You cough, too, with such an easy grace! One would suppose you had in your chest at least a dozen catarrhs."

The moment of the meditated visit arrived. Lovain, announced beforehand by Oliver, allowed himself to be conducted to Monsieur Hardstone. Meanwhile he was not fully at his ease, fearing that, in spite of his costume, either his figure or his voice might betray him. However, Monsieur Hardstone appeared to see nothing out of the way, and received the rash youth with all the respect due to an old gentleman of eighty.

"You have a bad cough," he remarked, with an air of interest.

"Very bad, sir—very bad. At my age, the catarrh is so constant! But I forget all my ills, in thinking of the pleasure I shall have in cultivating your acquaintance."

"Sir, the pleasure will be reciprocal. I admire neighbors of your character."

"Ah, sir, you do me too much honor! Nevertheless, your flattering reception emboldens me to prefer a little request, if I do not intrude in so doing."

"Intrude? Assuredly not, dear sir. Anything in which I can oblige a person of your respectability—"

"I have formerly had the privilege," continued Lovain, "of walking in the garden adjoining your mansion. I have need of exercise, on account of my health; and at my age, one cannot go far. Could you permit me an enjoyment which has become, I may say, a necessity?"

Monsieur Hardstone hesitated.

"Sir," continued Lovain, "not a single cabbage will I disturb."

"Eh, monsieur!" replied Hardstone. "It is not about my cabbages that I am uneasy, but—"

"I will not pluck a flower."

"Flowers? Good heavens, sir, they are at your service, every one of them, but—"

"I will shut the gate close, every time that I enter."

"Ah, sir, while you are there, I shall have no fear; but it is when you depart. One may forget—may be incautious!"

"Monsieur," replied Lovain, "will remember that I am eighty years old. At that age, a person is not apt to be incautious."

"Eighty! Indeed—indeed you are right. At such an age, one is indeed apt to be cautious. Here, monsieur, is the key. I have the most entire confidence in the prudence of a man of your age."

Lovain eagerly seized the key. Forgetful of his part, he was about to descend the stairs four at a time; and if Hardstone had not politely offered his arm, begging him to be careful how he placed his feet, our hot-head would have thrown off his eighty years altogether. A moment more, and Lovain gained the street. He threw himself into the arms of his trusty attendant.

"Ah, my dear Oliver, how neatly I have deceived the jealous old fellow! So credulous as he was, too! But then I played my part so capitally, that the most cunning of men might have been taken in."

In a few moments after, a noise was heard. The two conspirators concealed themselves, and saw Hardstone go out of his house, casting careful looks on every side.

"Good!" cried Oliver. "The enemy has gone; he yields to us the fort. I hear the clock strike ten. Everything is ready for your departure, sir. The horses are put to; the carriage stands waiting, two hundred paces distant."

"We will make the most of the opportunity," said Lovain. "Put yourself on the watch, my dear Oliver, while I enter the garden."

Oliver obeyed. Lovain approached the gate. He thought that some one moved within the garden.

"Is it you, my dear friend?" he asked, in a low voice.

"Yes, it is I, Lovain; enter quickly."

At the sound of this gentle voice, Lovain could scarce contain himself. He thrust the key into the lock, and was about to open the gate, when the intrusion of two quarrelsome fellows prevented him. These were a tragic and a comic poet, who, returning from the theatre, disputed strenuously on the comparative excellence of their separate pursuits.

"I tell you, sir, it is tragedy that moves the world!" exclaimed the one.

"Nonsense!" retorted the other. "It is comedy, the art of the great Moliere, which can most employ the powers of genius."

"Tragedy!" cried the one.

"Comedy!" cried the other.

And so saying, they both at once fell upon poor Lovain, resolved to make him the arbitrator of their claims, for said they:

"Here is an old man, who ought to decide the matter in question—since, if he be as ancient as his dress declares him, he must have seen an abundance of tragedy and comedy outside, as well as inside of the theatre."

Lovain was angry.

"Away with you!" he cried. "I care nothing about such trifles."

"Trifles!" exclaimed both poets at once.

"Monsieur, it is the greatest question in all literature."

"I care nothing about your literature."

They persisted in their arguments. Lovain grew excited. He menaced them with voice and gesture. Tragedy was solemnly indignant. He extended his arm in an impressive manner.

"Avant! Were not your hair so white,
This hand should punish you to-night!"

Lovain gave way to his fury. Casting himself on the two poets, he shook them with a vigor which astonished them exceedingly.

"Come, come!" exclaimed Comedy; "let us go. For a dry old fellow like him, he seems wonderfully green in the fingers."

Lovain was relieved of their importunities; but he had no more than placed his hand on the lock, when his attention was distracted by some person close at hand, launching out into a bravura air, capitally executed—although rather out of place, under the circumstances. The singer executed the most difficult trills, running over the notes with a marvellous volubility, interrupting himself now and then, in order to praise his own efforts.

"Delicious! ravishing! divine! O that I could meet with some amateur to whom I could sing my air! The thing is enough to make a man's fortune, of itself. Ah, behold the very man I want!"

Lovain had not yet succeeded in slipping back the rusty bolt; and all at once he found himself assailed by the musician, who, with a prodigious flourish, informed the unfortunate auditor that he had just returned from Italy with five operas of his own composing, some few specimens of which he was desirous that Lovain should hear forthwith. They excelled everything past, present, and future. His audience would be in ecstasies.

"Go along!" cried Lovain, in a voice of thunder. "I am deaf."

"Deaf or not, I'll wager that you'll hear me."

So saying, the composer struck up a prelude, when Lovain, with a kick altogether too vigorous for a man of eighty, put him effectually to flight. But fate had not yet finished her counter-tricks, for, at the instant when the gate had sprang ajar, a tipsy fellow tumbled against Lovain, sneering at the latter for attempting to intrude upon his palace grounds.

"Hold your tongue!" he cried; "or I'll break your head. I am the Grand Turk! What are you prying around my seraglio for? Where is my grand vizier? I'll have you bowstrung."

"What shall I do with the sot?" exclaimed Lovain in despair, as he struggled to prevent the tipsy fellow from entering the garden. "I shall have the police about my ears, presently."

Luckily, Oliver was hovering near. He heard the disturbance, and ran to the assistance of his young master. The drunken intruder saw him approaching.

"Here, my vizier," he cried, "seize this impudent fellow; haul him away to execution."

Oliver's ready wit instantly suggested the proper means. He dropped on his knees before the self-constituted sultan.

"Your royal highness mistakes," he said. "It is the grand mufti, whom you assault. Let me inform your royal highness that the feast which you ordered is ready spread at the next restorator's. I have succeeded in procuring an abundance of good wine."

"Wine? Ah, 'pon my soul, I feel awfully thirsty just now! Come on! You're the vizier for my money. Hang me, but you know how to govern a kingdom nearly as well as I."

Off he reeled. Nothing further hindered. Lovain was in the garden. He beheld his mistress; he threw himself at her feet, and seized her beautiful hand. Who can paint his felicity? They hastened from the garden; they entered the street; they were safe.

"Come, charming unknown," said Lovain, in a low and tremulous voice. "My carriage is scarce, two steps from here. We will fly to Lyons."

"To Lyons!" answered his companion, lifting the long veil which enveloped her. "Not so; it is too great a distance for one of my age."

Astonished at this language, Lovain hastily turned his eyes on the young person whom he was carrying off, and by the light of a street lamp he beheld—his grandmother! He started back, and stood motionless with astonishment. Suddenly, bursts of laughter assailed him on every side. Amelia had arrived, with five friends of Madame Beaumont.

"What, madame!" cried Lovain, awaking from his stupor. "Is this you?"

"Certainly, my dear; it is me whom you have carried off. The affair has given you a great deal of trouble, I know; but you will be well recompensed."

"But the portrait?"

"Is mine."

"Yours!"

"Mine, I say. To tell the truth, I dropped it as I was bringing it home from the jeweller's, where I had carried it to be re-set in the modern style. I did not know, at the time, that it had fallen into so good hands. Do you doubt me? Give it me, then—I will soon convince you."

With these words, the good lady, smiling, pressed a secret spring at the back of the miniature. The case separated at once from the ivory, revealing the following inscription:

"Madame Beaumont. Painted at the age of twenty years."

The poor fellow was now assailed with raillery on every side.

"In love with his grandmother!" cried one.

"They seem made for each other!" exclaimed a second.

"The very image of his grandfather on his wedding-day!" added a third, laughing.

"Spare me, my friends—spare me!" exclaimed Lovain, covered with confusion.

"There, my dear," continued the old lady, "do not be so bashful about it! I have turned many a head in my day. But come, Amelia! my friend seems a little downcast, for some reason or other; do, I pray you, console him and bring him back to a better humor."

"I am a fool!" exclaimed Lovain.

"Tut, tut! don't talk so, grandson. Not but that you may be a little in the right, with regard to the matter. But I had like to have forgotten. Allow me to introduce you to my very good friends, the two poets, the musician, and the Sultan of Turkey. Still, you ought to know their faces pretty well; for they have dined at my table every day for this week past. And Monsieur Hardstone?"

"Yes, a fool—and blind as a bat, into the bargain!" exclaimed Lovain, who began to recover in some measure from his confusion. "Can you forgive my folly, my friends? Dear Amelia, can you forgive my foolish freak?"

"Hear him, Amelia," said the old lady. "Take mercy on the poor fellow—for I perceive that I must yield up my conquest to you, after all."

Amelia smiled, and extended her hand. Her eyes were dewy with moisture.

"All's well that end's well!" exclaimed the old lady. "Come, my friends; the play is up."

On the very next day, Lovain became the husband of Amelia. Discovering in her a masterpiece of grace, spirit and virtue, his lively imagination incessantly accommodated itself with pleasure to the every-day realities of life; nor did he ever find reason within himself to regret the fortune which had overtaken his prettily contrived scheme of THE ELOPEMENT.

A DISTINCTION.

Our holy religion was designed to regulate the everyday life of those who profess to be its subjects. But in how many instances does the "fruit" of Christianity, as exemplified in the ordinary duties of man, utterly fail to commend the gospel to those who have never felt its power?

"Is Mr. — good?" asked a bank officer of a director, the other day, in the hearing of a friend of ours.

"That depends on whether you mean God-ward or man-ward," was the answer. "God-ward," continued the director, "Mr. — is good. No man in our church is sounder in the faith, or prays oftener in our meetings, or is more benevolent, according to his means. But man-ward, I am sorry to say that Mr. — is rather tricky."

We wish we could believe that Mr. — is not the representative of a class of men somewhat prominent in the churches.—New York Examiner.

ANGRE.

Then flashed the livid lightning from her eyes,
And screams of horror rend'd the affrighted skies.
But louder shrieks to pitying Heaven are cast,
When husbands, or when lap-dogs, breathe their last;
Or when rich china vessels, fallen from high,
In glittering dust and painted fragments lie.—Pope.

THE REJECTED POEM:

—OR,—

HOW HORACE LORING WON HIS BRIDE.

BY MARY W. JANVRIN.

POOR Nina Barrows! All alone she knelt at her mother's death-bed. All alone she lingered, after the dark death-angel Arael had closed the eyes that ever smiled tenderly upon her. Since those days of earlier youth, when they had lain away her father in the village church-yard; since those days, when, in that village home, they three, father, mother and child, had been so very happy together, Poverty had scowled fiercely upon them, and Consumption had woven his icy fingers among the mother's heart-strings; and though, year by year and month by month, the poor woman had striven against its grasp, that she might not leave her only one an orphan, yet all in vain! And now death had conquered—all was over—Nina was alone!

Alone, and an orphan, in a great city! God help her! The lips that had ever spoken love-words, mute for aye on earth; the eyes that had beamed with a mother's love, closed and rayless; the hands that had been folded over the fair young head in blessing, cold and white, and O, so still! folded now over a heart whose throbs were hushed forever. Poor orphan! God help her!

It was a bitter cold winter's night. Round the old, dilapidated wooden house swept the piercing wind, penetrating through every nook and crevice of the attic chamber where the young girl knelt beside the dead; yet Nina felt not the biting air, though no fire burned in the little grate; she had no thought for cold or hunger, or the desolation which stared from every side of that comfortless room; she only knew that her mother, her gentle, loving mother, lay dead before her.

But she might not linger there; upon the pine table lay a bundle of clothing, just finished, and ready to be taken home to her employer, for the widow and the orphan had gone to the crowded city, as thousands go, thinking to gain a subsistence by their needles, and but a meagre, scanty pittance had been the fruit of that toil, scarce enough to keep hunger from their hearth; there lay the bundle upon the table, all finished, and with the money she would receive for long days' and nights' toil, Nina Barrows was to buy her mother's shroud and coffin.

No wonder that she started up with a shudder, and her slender hands could scarce hold the bundle she grasped; no wonder she grew faint and heart-sick as she drew her thin shawl closer about her delicate figure, and, kissing the sleeper's cold lips, turned away and sought the crowded street; no wonder that with brain almost bursting, she thought how, with the grief of orphanhood fresh upon her, she must carry back that work, and obtain more to keep herself from starvation. Ah, the orphan has no time to waste in sorrow! She may not stop to weep, but crushing back her tears, toil on, though her heart be breaking!

Nina went out into the street. All was bright and pleasant there. The white moon flung down strips of light between the tall blocks, the gas-light burned with intense brilliancy, and, though it was bitter cold, the pedestrians who passed her on the pavement were warmly muffled in cloaks and furs, and dashing sleighs were laden with a merry freight of youth and beauty. All were glad and gay, save poor Nina. How the hurrying crowd jostled past her! how discordantly their laughter smote her ear! how the bright glare dazzled and blinded her aching eyes! She ran, she almost flew, for every moment was stolen from the few hours her mother would be left her ere they laid her in the tomb; and scarce five minutes had elapsed ere she stood in the presence of her employer.

The work was minutely inspected, the money counted out, a miserable remuneration for the nicely-stitched garments, and then the merchant tailor said coolly:

"I can give you no more work now. I have too many hands engaged, and am obliged to turn off some. Am sorry, miss, but you see it's unavoidable with me."

At any other time, Nina would have heard this announcement with feelings of keenest disappointment; she would have entreated for work, even at reduced prices; but now she received it without any such manifestations, and turned away. She could not tarry to beg of the rich man before whose counter she stood, the means of subsistence; but bent her steps rapidly homeward, if that might be called a home, where no mother's voice would welcome her.

Quickly her feet sped on; nor paused she but once, and then for a moment only, when, in turning the corner of a street, she was encountered by a trio of young men, upon one of whom her eye fell, in passing. Could it be he—Horace Loring—the companion of her childhood? the rich man's son, who had dwelt in the great house adjoining her father's in their distant native village? the playmate who had led her to school, gathered flowers to weave among her sunny curls, and called her his "little wife," promising that in after years that title should be fully redeemed?

Yes, she could not be mistaken, for he wore yet the short, crisp, black curls that had shaded his brow in boyhood; she caught the sparkle of his dark eye, she heard, in passing, a voice scarce changed, save to fuller and deeper tones, and then she knew that again she had met Horace Loring.

And then, too, crushing back a tear, and struggling to repress a sigh which involuntarily accompanied the words, she murmured, "he has forgotten me long ago!" And then she knew that there was one being on earth whom she really loved, and that love was closely allied to despair. That was a bright, brief moment amid the gloom, when Nina paused upon the pavement to listen to the echoes of a voice whose tones had been unheard for years; and the few words he uttered in reply to his companion were gathered up and put away as some hoarded treasure. But he had gone, for Horace Loring knew not that, scarce two rods distant, stood the sweet girl whose memory had never faded from his heart—he had gone; and, drawing her shawl still closer about her shivering form, Nina hastened on, murmuring, "Mother, thou art dead, and he has forgotten me! I am very lonely now!"

Three days after, the orphan sat in her little room. There was a fire in the grate, and the little closet shelf was laden with food, for the kind Irish washwoman who rented a room below, had sent up fuel and victuals from her own stores; but Nina knew that this could not last always—nor would her independent spirit suffer her to remain a burden upon others. Now she sat gazing into the grate, thinking how she might best gain a livelihood. Again had she solicited work at the shop of her former employer, but unsuccessfully. Others had been applied to, but in vain; no way seemed open, no hand stretched forth to succor.

A light tap came at the door. "Come in," she said, and her kind friend entered, bearing a tea-tray.

"Here, Miss Nina, the tea is hot and nice, and ye must not put it by without the drinking!" she said, in a pleasant, cheerful voice.

"O, Mrs. Riley, you are too kind!" And the tears stood in the orphan's eyes.

"Ah, no indade, miss! Sure, and wouldn't I be a haythen to let the likes of ye want while I can earn a dollar? So jist be a drinkin' of it, dear, while I sit down and chat a bit wid ye. Yer poor mother—heaven rest her swate soul—is gone; and I jist wanted to ask ye how ye were to get along now, for maybe it's Bridget Riley can help ye a bit. And now, don't be down-hearted, Miss, but cheer up! Ye're young and pretty, and maybe some fine gentleman will take ye for his wife, then ye'd be high as the best o' 'em, for ye're a born laddy, every inch o' ye!"

The good woman spoke kindly, but Nina had no heart to reply, for the tears were crowding thick and fast, and sobs were choking her.

"Come, cheer up, cheer up a bit, Miss Nina," continued the good woman. "Don't be after miffin' on so! Tell me if ye can get anything to do—else ye'll worry yerself to death wid grief."

"I know of nothing, of no place where I can procure work," she exclaimed, bursting into tears. "And I will not be a burden to you longer. I will go into the street and beg first!"

By! and is it ye would be a beggin' for bread, while Bridget Riley has a morsel to share wid ye? Now don't iver let me hear the likes o' that again!" said the woman, sharply, her generous heart filled with grief. "Is it ye would be a beggin', wid yer blue eyes and curling hair, and yer little hands whiter than many a rich laddy's! Sure! and I'll find some nice sewing for ye—for the leddies will pay ye better than the old miser ye worked fur—and ye'll support yerself like a queen!" And Mrs. Riley's hand stroked the young girl's head caressingly, as she left the attic chamber.

For a half hour Nina sat over the fire, silent and calmer, for the words of her humble friend had not been uttered in vain. Hope once more sang a sweet song, and though she still wept when she thought of her dead mother, yet the tears were far less bitter than in her first paroxysms of grief. Upon the table beside her lay a newspaper. She had bought it because it contained the notice of her mother's death, which she had read over and over between her tears. Again she took it up, lingering over her mother's beloved name; then her eye fell upon a poem, a sweet, touching thing, entitled "The Orphan." She read and re-read it; it seemed a transcript of her own lonely lot; it seemed written on purpose for her, and surely, none but one orphaned, like her, could have so touchingly embodied the feelings of the bereaved!

"Why should not I write thus?" eagerly exclaimed Nina, with flushed cheeks. "I have felt all this, ay more! And my dreams have oftentimes brought me visions of all things glad and beautiful; in dreams I have wandered from this bleak, cold life, into a fairer, brighter; why can I not embody them in song?"

Speedily pen and paper were before her; and in delicate chirography and faultless construction of rhythm, she traced verse after verse upon the sheet; and while the long night waned, still she wrote on, forgetting all her grief and loneliness in the new world of life and beauty that unfolded to her vision. It was her first effort at authorship; and a fairyland, in very truth, was it, wherein her young feet went timidly straying, and her young hand culling the first spring blossoms. The inexperienced girl stood upon the threshold of Fame's temple; yet in after years she wandered further up its aisles, till at length she knelt before its altar shrine. The night waned, and the cold, gray winter's morning found her with a long poem finished before her. Into that poem she had woven the beautiful visions of her dreams; dreamland, with its fairy people and delicate imaginings, was portrayed in sweet, musical numbers; "Dreamland" was the theme she had chosen.

The morning deepened fair and sunny, the city grew glad and gay; busy feet trod the streets; gay, laughing maidens, warmly clad in velvets and furs, went by; sleighs freighted with youth and beauty dashed past, with jingling bells and shouts of outriders ringing joyously on the clear, frosty air; but I doubt if deeper happiness made its home in the heart of any dweller of that crowded city, than in that of the poor young girl, who, grasping the manuscript of her precious poem, gilded along the pavement.

And why, you ask, reader, why was she so happy? Because a new light, teeming with beauty, had been opened to the humble seamstress; she had found the pen a fitter instrument for her hand than the needle. Imagination, a long sleeper, had awakened at the call of genius; and for the first time she realized that:

"Tis to create, and in creating live
A being more intense, that we endow
With form and fancy."

And where, you ask, where was she going with that first poem?

Nina had heard of those who gain a livelihood by the pen; she had heard how many coin their brain-fancies into gold; and she, too, would try her chance on the great sea of public favor; would sell her first born, her bantling poem, for bread. So, grasping her precious manuscript, she was going to the office of the paper she had read the preceding evening—going to offer that poem for sale.

Unknown, and an humble orphan, in all the simplicity of her young heart, venturing among a set of merciless literary critics to dispose of a poem their sharp, caustic criticisms would tear in pieces! Poor child! she had yet to learn that bitter lesson, that the unknown seldom find encouragement or kindness; that the words which seemed so beautiful to her in the stillness of her little room, would be passed over idly by careless eyes, or rejected by the publisher who paid liberally for far inferior productions, because they came from authors of note!

Nina entered a large building, ascended a long flight of stairs, and knocked timidly at a door on the first landing.

"Come in!" said a voice.

She obeyed, hesitatingly. Several men and boys were busy in folding papers fresh from the press. In a low voice she inquired for the publisher, and was directed to an adjoining room. He sat before a desk strewn with books, and papers, and manuscripts; his face looked fresh and genial, and Nina thought her poem was sure to meet a favorable reception.

"Good morning, madam," he said in a bland voice, rising and passing a chair.

Nina's heart was full, and she came at once to her errand.

"I have a poem, Mr. Rivers, which I would like to sell you." And she drew forth the white roll, neatly tied with a blue ribbon.

The publisher drew back, and his manner changed. From the polite, affable, gentlemanly man, he grew frigid, haughty, almost stern.

"A poem? Ah! hum!—who are you?" he abruptly exclaimed, gazing under his beetling eyebrows, and not taking the proffered manuscript.

"My name is Nina Barrows," replied the girl, timidly, awed by his forbidding manner.

"Nina Barrows? hum—hum—I really don't recollect the name, madam. But perhaps—Ah, what nom de plume have you?" he asked, his demeanor changing.

But Nina was silent. In her simplicity, she knew nothing of nom de plumes, or what the words signified, even. Thus she had not thought to adopt a "taking," fictitious signature, under which so many, from the days of "Fanny Forester" downward, have sailed so rapidly into public favor.

"Have you ever written before?" inquired the publisher, impatiently.

"No, sir," she answered, in a low voice, reading in his cold gray eye that she, so poor and unknown, need not hope further.

"Then I shall be obliged to refuse. Writers employed on my papers must have reputation. It's the making of a paper or magazine to engage such; and I don't want any others. Am sorry, madam, but you see how it is." And settling in his comfortable office-chair, he again took up his pen.

Heart-sick, Nina rose. "But you have not read it, sir," she ventured, timidly, still lingering.

The publisher looked up with an annoyed expression, and took the proffered paper somewhat rudely from her hand.

"Some sentimental stuff, I'll warrant," he muttered, glancing at the title of the poem. "Dreamland"—pooh, young girls are always weaving dreams now-a-days; but they don't look just right on paper. Your poem rhymes well, young lady," he continued, after the perusal, "but it lacks energy, fire and spirit; such a thing won't 'take' with my subscribers. The public taste demands something more exciting." He returned it.

"But, sir—if you pay me ever so little—I write for my bread," persisted Nina, conquering pride and wounded feeling at the thought of her need.

"Madam, I cannot buy it! I rarely pay for poems, save from authors of acknowledged merit, only for stories. Try your hand at romance writing, and I might employ you. Your remuneration would not be great at first; you must get a reputation, then the pay is an object with you. Get me up some exciting sketches—none of your love-sick, boarding-school nonsense, but something that will stir up the blood and 'take' with the people—and then come to me. Good morning!" And the wealthy publisher, whose papers had brought him a fortune, turned coldly from the poor orphan beside him.

Nina turned away, descended the stairs, and went forth into the thronged street, and that white roll was still clasped tightly in her hand; but ah, how heavy and hopeless the heart so light and glad but a few moments before! Her first dream had faded.

Let us linger a few moments in the office the young girl had left. Scarce had she closed the door behind her, when a young man emerged from a deep window in a little recess, where he had been reading, and crossed the apartment, exclaiming:

"Rivers, you're too bad, by Jove! How could you refuse to purchase a manuscript from a young girl, who, judging from her form, for I couldn't get a glimpse of her features for her veil, must be beautiful? Now, were I a publisher, I'd only buy poems and tales of young and handsome authoresses, and the old and ugly ones might dispose of their manuscripts elsewhere!"

"Then let me tell you, my dear fellow, that your paper would be sadly minus original contributions, I fear, for everybody knows that blues of acknowledged merit verge on the 'old and ugly' order! But, in this case, I don't think I was at all to blame, for the poem was a first effort, and not at all adapted to my paper. But how the deuce did you get in here, and when, for I didn't know of your presence, Loring?"

"O," returned the young man, laughing, "I am no spirit who visits editors' sanctuaries by creeping in at keyholes, for I just walked in a half hour ago while you were out, and, finding a fascinating novel on your table, with 'please notice,' on the title page, took upon myself the duty of critic, and ensconced in the shadows of your window-seat, became so intently absorbed in its perusal, that I had neither eye nor ear for aught, until I heard the closing words of your conversation with your fair visitor, and saw her depart with the rejected MS. But come, Rivers, who is she? give me a few facts of the case, name, age, and the color of her eyes, and I'll turn scribbler and dish up your readers a capital romance under the title of the 'Beautiful Unknown.' By Horace Loring, Esq." Come, Rivers, she is none; young and handsome, et cetera!" And he drew forth a gold pencil and memorandum book.

"I believe the girl's name was Nina—Nina Barrows or Barrows; something like it, at any rate!" returned the publisher, smiling complacently on his rich young friend. "I've no doubt you'll make a capital thing of it! Pretty girl—blue eyes, golden hair—looked interesting in mourning—young widow, perhaps—but what's the matter, Horace? you're pale as a ghost! Eh, eh?" And he rose to approach him.

But Horace Loring vouchsafed no reply, staggered to his feet, and in another moment had gained the staircase.

"Ah, I see! Some old flame. Well, the girl was pretty—sorry I refused her poem, if it turns out so! Loring's a fine young fellow, whose friendship I can't afford to lose!" Then the publisher turned to his pen and papers again.

Again it was evening, and Nina Barrows sat beside her fire, but not sad or lonely now. Upon her lap lay a gorgeous bouquet of hot-house flowers; round her white finger she was twining a short, close, raven curl which had fallen from an open letter in her hand, upon which the tears dropped silently—warm, happy, gushing tears. That letter ran thus:

"DEAR NINA:—Will not these flowers, this lock of hair, remind you of the olden times? Have you forgotten the pledges we gave each other down by the little brook in the valley, ere you left your cottage home for the far off city, and I went back to my student toils again? No, you cannot have forgotten! I will still believe you the same Nina whose blue eyes made the sunshine of my heart. But, may I not come to you? To-day I followed you through the crowded street; I found your abode, and to-night may I not seek you there? Wear but a single rosebud, from the gift I send, among your sunny curls, for a token that you still remember, HORACE LORING."

O, how happy was Nina Barrows that night, sitting beside the fire in her humble home! how bright the sparkle of those violet eyes; and lips and cheeks were red as the scarlet rose she had taken from the bouquet to twine amid her curls.

Hark! was that a footstep on the stairs? How her heart beat! A tap came on the door; Mrs. Riley's smiling face peered in a moment as she ushered in a tall gentleman, then retired. Nina sprang forward.

"O, Horace! at last!"

"Yes, Nina, darling, at last I have found you, still beautiful, still true as ever, as I know by this token," and he stooped down and tenderly kissed the tresses where the flower nestled. "At last you are found, no more to remain alone, unloved! Nina, I know all! Your poor mother is at rest now, and who will be your protector, if not he who has always loved you? Give me that right—a husband's right! What says my sweet Nina?" And he drew her caressingly towards him.

Ah, what could the orphan say? There was small need of words, but she shed sweet tears of joy upon the strong heart beating for her solely, clasped by the strong arm which henceforth was to shield her from life's ills.

Many days had not passed ere Nina Barrows was taken to a luxurious home, to be blessed henceforth with the love of a noble, generous heart. Very fair, for her, grew life from that blest hour. Nor was the good Bridget Riley forgotten; but, in her station as landlady in her "swate young leddy's" household, she never wearied of recounting to her fellow-domestics stories of those days when she had befriended her mistress.

"I told her, sure," she would exclaim, "that some fine gentleman would be after marryin' her, and faith, it came true enough!"

Blest with her husband's love; sitting beside him in his study, and listening to his gentle teachings, Nina Loring grew to be an accomplished and learned woman. In her after life she wrote much and well, and her songs are on the lips of thousands; yet the sweetest poem she ever wrote, was that which the publisher, Mr. Rivers, rejected, but by which he won his bride, so says Horace Loring.

Selfishness has no soul. It is a heart of stone encased in iron.

OUR DAILY DUTY.

BY DR. J. HAYNES.

Is it for the things that perish,
 Man should only slave and toil?
 And his daily wants replenish,
 By the tillage of the soil?
 Is the clattering of the mill
 Voices only that may call?
 Is it at the loom and anvil
 Graver duties daily fall?

No! there's something sweet and softy
 Speaking to the soul of man;
 Prompting him to things more lofty
 In life's concentrated plan!
 Daily duties, high and holy,
 Far above all other kind,
 Are the acquisition solely
 Of the heart, and soul, and mind!

Truth and friendship are the beauties,
 Beauties that adorn the heart;
 Love and goodness—these are duties,
 Duties of a higher art!
 Riches great and peerless beauty,
 Thousands covet while they live;
 But ambition's noble duty
 Is the learning to forgive!

Well to heed our daily calling,
 And for present wants provide;
 Never as the sluggard falling
 Into filth and folly's pride!
 Heart and soul (while hands are plying)
 Should some good for others plan;
 Minds magnanimous are trying
 To improve their fellow-man!

MYRA THE GIPSEY.

BY ANNA M. CARTER.

Cross my palm with shining gold,
 Show your white, veined hand to me,
 And I your future will unfold,
 Reveal to you its mystery.

"HIST!"

The low but deep, earnest exclamation was uttered by a handsome, swarthy man, and he laid his hand warningly upon the shoulder of his companion. The speaker was Morelos, chief of a band of gipsies who always hovered round in the extensive eastern valley of the Sierra Madre. His companion by his dress and manners showed himself to be a Mexican grandee. A moment's pause, then Morelos began to move forward with rapid steps, his companion followed him silently. Among giant trees, through tangled underbrush, and across streams, the two men went for nearly a mile. Don Pedraza followed, but his eye expressed distrust, and he kept one hand upon his rapier. Arrived at last in a dense thicket, Morelos stopped and turned to face his companion. Quick as a flash Don Pedraza's sword flew from its scabbard and he put himself on the defensive.

"Diablo! put up your plaything. You wished to speak with me on an important subject, I thought; here we are free from all prying ears." And so saying Morelos threw himself carelessly on the grass, while his handsome lip curled scornfully, and his dark eyes flashed.

"Ah, well, one cannot be too careful. You are sure you are free from intrusion here, then. Have you a mind to make a little lump of gold?"

"I don't object, provided there is excitement in the making it. What am I to do?"

"Only kill a woman."

"Sacra! I don't like to kill them. Never mind, if you pay enough, I will do it."

"I will give you as much silver and gold as your mule's panniers will hold, one side full of gold, the other of silver."

"That's generous. I will do it. Now, who must I kill?"

"In your trip there is an artful gipsy girl called Myra, I think. Do you know her?"

The chief's eyes flashed fire, but he nodded his head.

"My son Hubert has seen her, pretends he loves her and wishes to marry her. It shall not be. She must be poisoned, assassinated, drowned, I don't care what, provided she is got out of this world, and you must do it."

"I promised blindly, Don Pedraza. It is forbidden for any of the tribe to kill another, especially a woman, unless in revenge, or to wipe away dishonor. I have no revenge to gratify by killing Myra, and I cannot do it. She is the favorite of the tribe, and must not receive foul play!"

"How now, scoundrel!" said Don Pedraza, his rage making him forget his conciliatory tone. "Will you dare refuse to get her out of the way? I will hire a rascal less honorable than yourself."

"You will find it very hard, nay, impossible to find one in my tribe willing to kill the beautiful Myra. I said I would not kill her, but I will give you my promise that your son shall never marry her; she shall be hid from him, he may think her dead, and that will answer the same purpose. Have no fears, Don Pedraza, that I shall fail in my words, for it is to my own advantage to keep one of our tribe from wedding one not of our race. Go, and be sure I will keep my word, as a gipsy only knows how to," he muttered, in a deep tone; and at the same time he pushed aside the bushes, pointed to a beaten track, and telling Don Pedraza to follow it closely and he would reach home.

With many a fearful glance behind, Don Pedraza went on his way. The keen, dark eyes of the gipsy chief followed him till he was out of sight, then uttering a low, clear whistle, he again threw himself on the grass. The sounds had scarcely died away, when a rustling was heard in the bushes and another man made his appearance.

"How did you relish the old man's proposition, Morelos?" asked the new comer, with a grin on his wide mouth.

"Diablo! I could scarcely keep my fingers from the old heave's throat! How well I should have relished to have given that proud windpipe a friendly squeeze, and seen those great, suspicious eyes start from their sockets, and that wicked, lying tongue hanging out of his foul mouth. Enough. So he thought I would kill Myra, beautiful Myra whom I love like my soul who is my sun, moon, everything to me. Out upon the old fool. I'd sooner kill that baby-faced son of his, whom I hate, for he has won the love of Myra from me. Already I see her eyes flash, and the color mount in her fair cheek when he approaches. Curse upon him for a false man, my rival and deadly enemy."

"Well, what is the end of all this prating and ranting? What plan have you in your head?"

"Listen, I promised the old don, fool that he is! that I would prevent his son from marrying the girl, that he should never see her more, and I will keep my word to the letter." And Morelos clenched his fist and showed his white teeth like a wolf at bay. For a moment he seemed to give himself up to feelings of deadly hate, then resumed in a hard tone, "The young don comes to our camp; I will drag his wine and when insensible he will easily fall a prey to the assassin's steel. When he is dead, Myra will forget him, and become mine. You understand, the wine must be given to him in the silver charm-cup; as an honored guest, he must have the most precious goblet. Precious it will be, to both himself and me; he will gain a heavenly kingdom, a seat in Paradise, and I my revenge! The cups must be filled beforehand; Myra shall give the fatal drink to her lover. We must now away." So saying, the two gipsies arose and left the grove.

When the sound of their footsteps had died away, the branches were again parted and a girl of almost fairy lightness and beauty appeared. The figure was of the medium height, slender, though exquisitely rounded, and full of activity; the face was rather dark, not as dark as the gipsies usually are, but with the southern tinge. Her large, dark eyes flashed brightly, and, as she stood, her lips were parted with horror, just showing the white teeth. Her dress was a dark blue skirt, edged with silver embroidery, and scarlet waist trimmed with black and gold. Her long, dark hair was braided with coins and ribbons of red and blue. This was Myra, the gipsy belle. She listened awhile, with her hands parting the luxuriant green boughs. All was still, and with one bound she stood in the centre of the clearing.

"Holy virgin! Don Carlos threatened with assassination because he loves me! Yee he loves me, and I bless him for that, but I hate the chief, and Morelos shall feel that my hate is as deadly as his own." And she clasped her hands while her beautiful face assumed an expression of deadly determination. "I will save Don Carlos, or perish. I am to be cup-bearer, Morelos beware!"

The glorious western sun was just setting, throwing a gorgeous, crimson light over a scene calculated for a painter's pencil. In the little shaded dell, almost hid by rocks and trees was seated a band of swarthy gipsies. Their attitudes were varied, easy and careless. Men, women and children in knots were scattered over the green plain. One group in the shadow of a rock was conspicuous. Several men, and some of the prettiest girls of the tribe were sitting upon a little knoll, and among them sat young Don Carlos Pedraza and the beautiful Myra. They laughed, chatted and sung; at last Morelos gave orders for wine.

"Myra, you may bring the goblets, and I beg Signor Pedraza will take a cup of wine with us for friendship's sake!"

"Thanks, sir chief, with such an invitation and beautiful cup-bearer, I will accept with pleasure." And he smiled as Myra tripped by him.

She soon returned, bearing two goblets, one of silver, richly chased and studded with gems, the other of rich, scarlet glass. She was about offering the glass goblet to Don Carlos, but Morelos spoke.

"Not so. Give Don Carlos the silver goblet, and may he find the pleasure and remedy for all ills in it, that I have always found. Here's to the health and increased beauty of the cup-bearer!"

As Myra handed the goblet to Carlos she whispered hurriedly:

"Feign sleepiness when you have drank, but as you value your life do not sleep—watch and be ready."

Myra then laughed and began to dance and play on her guitar as they drank. Carelessly though she acted, her eye watched every change. She saw, as the chief yawned, so did Don Carlos, and when, after a few attempts at wakefulness, be called for a blanket and rolled himself in it, she knew he had heeded her words. Unsuspected, Myra had drugged all the wine, except that of Don Carlos, and one by one the gipsies fell into a heavy slumber. One hour she watched till all was safe, then rose and touched Don Carlos.

"Arouse thee! not one moment is to be lost. Give me your cap and mantle; this night you were to have been killed, stabbed while lost in the torpor induced by drugged wine. You must fly, and your cap and cloak will deceive the murderers, and Morelos will be slain by his own hirelings. Up and fly, and when safe, give one thought to the poor gipsy girl Myra, who loved you only too well. Farewell—fly!"

"Not one step will I go without you, dearest Myra."

"That is folly! Go! I am happy in knowing that I saved you from an ignoble death. Go, I implore you."

"It is no use, I will not stir till you go with me; if you refuse to accompany me, I will stay her and await my coming fate."

"If you stay, both are lost!"

"If you go, Myra, both are saved. I implore you, dearest Myra, to fly with me."

"I'll follow, but you go now, for to be found here would be death. Go, and I will put your mantle and sombrero on Morelos—that done, I will meet you in the glen beside the brook."

"If you are not there, Myra, in fifteen minutes, I will return." So saying, Don Carlos left the place.

"What can you do, child?" asked a tall, elegant lady, of a young girl who stood before her. The lady was very handsome, though her face told of a grief always present, shedding a gentle sadness over her whole life. She was elegantly dressed, and reclined in a richly cushioned chair.

"Alas, lady, it is not much I can do. I can dance, sing, tell fortunes and embroider. My former life, as you know, has not fitted me for a lady's maid." The young girl spoke very sadly, but her rich, sweet voice seemed to wake a chord in the lady's heart, for she motioned the girl to sit on a stool by her side.

"No, Don Carlos told me of your life, and though I gave him a promise to do what I could for you, I scarcely expected to find such a person. Truly, child, I expected to see a wild, elf-like being, who scarcely knew how to enter a door. Tell me your name."

"My name is Myra."

"It's a pretty name. Who were your parents?"

"I cannot tell you that, lady. The chief of the tribe told me I was brought to them one dark night by one of the tribe and given to old Stella, and in a few days the man died. Old Stella was ever kind to me, but she died long ago—over a year—since then I've been my own mistress, going where I pleased, doing as I pleased, if not against the rules of the tribe. A few days before old Stella died, when she laid sick, I came into the tent angry with some coarseness of my companions, and exclaimed against them; Stella raised herself from her blanket and said, 'Myra, my child, be careful, your blood will show itself one day.' I never knew what she meant, and when I asked any of my companions they only laughed and mocked, saying she meant I'd fly into a rage some day about nothing. I don't think that is what she meant, but I can't tell. When I asked Stella what her meaning was, she only shook her head. That is all I can tell you of myself. How I came here, how I came to leave the tribe, you know from Don Carlos."

"Were you sorry to leave, Myra? Would you have remained with the tribe if you could with safety?"

"O no, lady, no, if I can only become good and useful. I have always hated the life I led. I never would lie and steal as the other girls did. I could not do it, and Stella never made me. When my companions teased me, Stella would send them away. Do you think, lady, I will ever grow like you, so good?"

"Yes, child, and better far. I will teach you as I would my own child. Go now with Jeanette and she will give you other clothes, and when you have rested you may come to me again."

Myra kissed the lady's hand, and followed the old nurse from the room, wondering if she would ever be so graceful and lovely as Donna Lina Hermosa.

Don Hermosa entered the room smiling.

"What freak now, Lina? Are you going to undertake to tame a real wild Zingari girl?"

"Yes, but she doesn't seem so wild, and, Rodrigo, there is something in her large, dark eyes, and rich voice, which reminds me of our lost child. Had she lived she would have been just the age of this young girl, and could not be more beautiful surely. Already I feel as if this gipsy girl were sent me as a blessing from Heaven. Then, too, your young friend Don Carlos loves her, and I will try and make her worthy of him, for you know I am not one to thwart a loving heart."

So it was settled that Myra was to become an inmate of Don Rodrigo's palace. She soon became Donna Lina's especial charge, and by her docility, intelligence and gentle temper, endeared herself to all around her.

One day Donna Lina was reclining on her couch, and Myra sitting on her low seat beside her, when she asked her if she would sing and dance for her, as she did in the days of her roving life. Myra smiled, though her face was mantled with a rich blush, and she rather reluctantly took her guitar, for the memory of her gipsy life filled her with feelings of shame now. And one who had seen her in her former life would scarcely recognize him now. Her face had lost much of the darkness incident to an exposed life, her luxuriant black hair was no longer ornamented with coins and gay ribbons, but braided neatly and wound round her small, well-shaped head. The limbs, full form was set off by a closely fitting dress of blue silk, and her small hands shaded by lace ruffles.

"Go, dear Myra, and put on your quaint dress, and all, that I may see you as you looked when timid and blushing you came to me."

Myra obeyed and went out of the room. She soon returned, and after a little hesitation began to dance with all her former abandon and life. Backwards, forwards, on her toes, on one foot, like some creature of air she bounded. In one of her bounds, a little chain which she always wore round her neck became unfastened, and a glittering trinket fell at the feet of Donna Lina, who stooped and picked it up. No sooner did she see it, than she screamed and fainted away. A moment and Myra and old Jeanette were by her side, endeavoring to revive her. Jeanette pushed Myra away.

"Go, you wild, good-for-nothing girl. Did you know no better than when my dear lady is so weak, to put on your disgraceful toggery and make such a noise in her room?"

"She told me to."

Just then Donna Lina opened her eyes and sat up. Opening her hands she showed an elegant gold locket, studded with emeralds and pearls.

"Where, Myra, did you get this?" she asked, in a low voice.

"Dear lady, I have always worn that night and day. One day I wished to take it off, but Stella told me not to for it was a charm, and would one day bring me great good fortune. When I asked who gave it to me, she bade me hold my tongue."

"Do you know what it contains?"

"Contains? No, I did not know it could open."

Donna Lina then touched a spring, and it opened, disclosing two miniatures, one of herself, the other a portrait of Don Rodrigo. At sight of these pictures she clasped the wondering girl in her arms, covering her with passionate kisses.

"My child! my child! My heart told me you were not drowned, as was supposed. All is clear now, you were stolen from me by the gipsies. I always thought so, for your body never could be found. When Don Carlos brought you to me, my heart felt a strange thrill. I longed then to clasp you to my heart so long desolate. How can I thank Don Carlos?"

"For what?" and the handsome figure of Don Rodrigo accompanied by Don Carlos appeared at the door.

The story was soon told, and the happy Myra was folded in the arms of her father.

"For this you were wondering how you should pay Don Carlos, was it?" asked Don Hermosa, when his feelings would let him speak.

"Yes, I asked the question, but it was an idle one, for I know. His eyes speak for him. Yes, Carlos, my friend," said Lina Hermosa, turning with a bright smile to the young man, "I know what you wish, and I know, too, that it would give my child happiness. She is yours, but you must spare her to us for a long while yet." And rising, Donna Lina took her husband's arm, and walked from the room, leaving the lovers to their new-found happiness.

Just a year from that time, Don Carlos Pedraza wedded Myra Hermosa. It was her father and mother's wish that she should retain the pretty name given her by the gipsies. The wedding was a splendid one, and when in the midst of the festivities an old, withered gipsy made her appearance, begging to tell the fortune of the bride, she was permitted to do so, and went away loaded with gold, rejoicing but never suspecting that the delicate jewelled hand of the blushing bride was the hand of her old pupil, MYRA THE GIPSEY.

FRENCH MORALS.

Drunkenness (in the towns in the south of France) is rarely seen, street brawling cannot exist, and all public immoralities so offensive to decency are rigidly suppressed. The absurd scandals retailed against private conduct in French society, are grossly exaggerated; nothing can be more devoid of truth than the wholesale assertions of many writers, who have taken their tone from a dissipated capital, and applied their deductions to the whole nation. It is a conclusion highly creditable to the whole of the south, at least, that, among the numerous visitors, there are few who do not reside in the country with pleasure, and leave it with regret.—French Sketches.

NATIONAL ROSES.

Written for a Young Lady's Album, Washington, D. C.

BY RICHARD WRIGHT.

Though fine is this book, golden-bound and with flowers,
To frame into wreaths or convert into posies;
Yet it lacks the chief glory and pride of earth's bowers,
The all-glowing, beautiful, sweet-scented roses.

Let us gather a few, and devote them a place
In the album, wherever the lady disposes;
Above all they will give it a grandeur and grace,
The delicate, rich-hued and beautiful roses.

For the rose is the jewel of nature's parterre, Though the leaves may decay, yet its own perfume
never;
And nations have each some bright rose they hold dear,
Fondly cherished in life and in memory forever.

In chivalry's famed realms of old,
Which launched Columbus on the main,
A flower displayed its leaves of gold—
The ISABELLA-Rose of Spain.

When tyrants ruled the vine-clad land,
And terror overshadowed all,
CHARLOTTE CORDAY stood, steel in hand,
The glorious red, red Rose of Gaul.

In that fair isle of arts and trade,
Where truth and freedom, beauty glows,
'Mongst thousand flowers in bloom arrayed,
VICTORIA, Queen, is England's Rose.

The Scandinavian region, north,
'Midst winter's lee and drifting snows,
Claims a pure vocalist of worth,
For JENNY LIND is Sweden's Rose.

When Smith, on old Virginia's ground,
Lay destined victim by his foe;
Saved—he beheld, with mercy crowned,
A POCAHONTAS—Indian Rose.

Columbia's Rose! is she who gave Good early lessons to her son,
And formed him virtuous, wise and brave—
The MORNINGS of our Washington!

We have gathered our roses from various climes,
And, as favorites, strung them together in metre;
And may they, like Sabbath bells, peal forth the chimes
Of musical roses, still sweeter and sweeter.

JACQUELINE OF HOLLAND.

BY WILLIAM B. OLIVER.

In a small and insignificant Dutch town, scarcely equal in importance to the meanest English hamlet, there was one house which seemed to be hastily fitted up for the temporary residence of some one, at least, of more consequence than the ordinary range of the inhabitants of that secluded place. The house stood alone, high up on the brow of the only hill that relieved the eye in that vicinity, from the broad, flat marshes and low-lying fields which characterize the uninteresting scenery of Holland.

The alterations and improvements were more particularly confined to the inside of the house, while the external preserved mostly the air of antiquity that had hung around it for years. Still even in the inside, one would hardly have thought that it was prepared only for the residence of some common private family, except for some few rich and rare articles which could not exactly be classed as furniture. A cabinet inlaid with mother of pearl, a jewel case of costly material, splendid work-boxes, together with a magnificent writing desk, and an odor case which was filled with the rarest oriental scents, were scattered here and there about the apartments; and in the best bed chamber, there was some appearance of state in the surroundings of the bed and toilet.

In this room, sat two ladies of nearly the same apparent age. One of them was of a high order of beauty, with an intellectual cast of countenance, and a quiet yet regal demeanor which would have marked her anywhere, as a distinguished personage. Her dress was a white satin under garment, of a rich, heavy texture; and outside of this was one equally magnificent, of a pale gold color. It was entirely open in front, and confined round the waist by a heavy gold cord and tassels. The sleeves were slashed, and puffed out with white satin; and the bosom was surrounded by a fall of the richest Valenciennes, forming a splendid bertha. Her hair, which was a bright auburn, soft and flexible, waving in thick masses from a pure white brow, was partially concealed by a head-dress of the Marie Stuart pattern, of rich Genoa velvet. Its color was an imperial purple, relieved by a few small white flowers formed of pearls. The wearer of this superb dress was Jacqueline of Holland.

Her companion was dressed simply in a plain white silk, made rather low, with a narrow edging of lace, and short sleeves edged with the same. The only approach to ornament was a gold cord wound round the soft braids of dark, shining hair, and its superb tassels falling over an ear that looked pure and white as any pearl. Her cheek lacked the color that predominated in that of the other lady; but her soft blue eye had none of the languor of illness, and the delicacy of her skin had no trace of unhealthiness. Not so dazzling nor so brilliant as Jacqueline, Mathilde d'Escaillon was yet most purely beautiful. The queen-pearls in the rich head gear of Jacqueline had their typical beauty carried out in the person and character of Mathilde.

"Sorry accommodations for the 'Countess of Hainault, Holland, Zealand and Ostrevant," said Jacqueline, gaily running over the list of her titles; "Duchess of Touraine, Brabant and Gloucester. Why, look, Mathilde, do you know that our forefathers were better lodged than I am?"

"Doubtless, dear lady; but while it grieves me on your account, that you cannot enjoy the ease which your birth, education and connections so amply deserve, it seems to me that in this secluded spot, far from the bustle of courts, and the thousand cares and cabals of a life like that to which you have been accustomed heretofore, there is a charm which no other place ever had before. Tranquillity and repose seem to inhabit here, and peace broods gently over these low fields and the silvery streams which flow by so softly. It is as if nature held a grand and beautiful rest, and invited as two favored ones to enjoy the sweet repose."

"True, Mathilde. We are generally too closely bound to externals; and surely none are more guilty of these sins against nature than we who have inhabited courts. Standing as I do now, on the verge of middle life, after so many reverses of fortune, so many strange circumstances, I look back with a shudder, and think that after all, I should have been so much happier to have been born and reared in a less elevated sphere. But the force of habit and the pride of birth, and the ties of connection to royalty, have all had their influence upon me, against my better principles. After thirty-three years of nursing ambitious hopes, I suppose that to come down to ordinary life, such as I take it is the only kind of life that can flourish in a poor tenement like this, Mathilde, will be a tremendous fall for my pride. Say what you will about simplicity, there is some charm in grandeur also."

Mathilde sighed. "Have you not had sad experience of these charms, dear lady?"

"I have indeed, Mathilde. Think what my life has been, and you will believe that more than most women, I have been subject to strange vicissitudes. Married at fifteen, to the Duke of Touraine, who, as you know was the son of the king of France, I enjoyed in the two succeeding years, more than has ever fallen to my lot since. At seventeen I lost my husband, and shortly afterwards my good father died. Then came the terrible struggle in which I was involved with my uncle, the Bishop of Liège, who insisted that his father, Duke Albert of Bavaria, had not divided his dominions as he ought; and he now claimed Holland as his right. Then, contrary to the rules of the church, he married the widow of my Uncle Anthony, Duke of Brabant; and my poor mother, weak in this as well as in a" matters, believed that she had found a remedy for the quarrel between my uncle, the bishop, and myself.

"I do not know to this day, Mathilde, what could have induced me to comply with my mother's insane and absurd proposal. My Uncle Anthony had left two sons. Philip was a free, frank, bold youth, and could I have forgotten the memory of my husband, and had not Philip been my own cousin, I could perhaps have married him. I liked his character and principles, his upright, open bearing, and there was a romance that appealed to my heart, in his orphaned state; for you know, Mathilde, that his father was killed on the battle-field of Agincourt.

"I knew that Philip loved me too. I was the only being with whom he would have united his fate. So he often told me; and I believed him. But Philip was wearing away like a snow wreath; and while he was declaring his love for me, the words were followed by the stain of blood upon his lips. He lived only a few days. Only the death of Touraine had ever inflicted upon me such severe pain as to see Philip die. No one knew how tender was the tie between us; and even I, myself, had only a vague idea that I might some day have consented to marry him. But my mother approached me the very next day with a subject which filled me with horror and dismay.

"'Jacqueline,' she commenced, 'I know of but one mode by which to conciliate the bishop.'

"'Tell me then, good mother, for I would be glad enough to have this mean and cruel persecution cease; tell me any honorable way of getting rid of such an enemy.'

"'Not only honorable,' she continued, 'but highly proper, and the probable means of happiness to two, at least. It is that you marry the Duke of Brabant.'

"I declare to you, Mathilde, I did not know for some minutes who she meant. Philip had borne this title, of course, since his father's death—but that John, the younger son of my Uncle Anthony, the poor imbecile—a child in years, repulsive in person and manners, almost an idiot in intellect—should be selected to fill the place of my departed husband, was too abominable to be thought of. He the Duke of Brabant! I had not thought of it before. But of course, it was so, because there was no other inheritor of the honors of the family. But to be my husband!

"My mother was a great stickler for titles and grandeur, and thought little of peace and happiness. Herself a daughter of the house of Burgundy—for Philip, Duke of Burgundy, was, as perhaps you know, my grandfather—she believed that to marry any one without a title, would involve the degradation of any individual of a noble family. She worked her cards well. I will not tell you—because I am unwilling to throw so much blame upon a parent—what arts she resorted to, to make me sacrifice myself to this weak boy. John of Brabant was only fifteen when I married him—an act for which I thought myself poorly repaid by the reconciliation of the bishop to me and to my claim to Holland.

"Disgusted with his low principles, his free association with people below him in station, and his utter neglect of myself, added to my former dislike of him, I resolved to leave him. I raved at my mother for chaining me to such a being, and declared that I would obtain a divorce from him and marry some person who would pay me the attentions due to me in society.

"In vain my mother and my Uncle Philip, Duke of Burgundy, urged my return to him. I refused, and again took up my abode in the palace of my mother, whom I would not permit to name John of Brabant as my husband. Soon after, I went with her to Valenciennes, and left her while I went to my own town of Bouchain. While at Valenciennes, I had several times conversed with the Lord d'Escaillon, your father. He had promised to put me safely under the protection of Henry of England, to whose cause he was devoted.

"At Bouchain, I left the town early in the morning to meet your father outside the walls. It was then, Mathilde, that he told me of his daughter. I little thought then that circumstances so sad as his death and your mother's insanity would ever place you in my sole protection. I rejoice that, since these things are inevitable, I have had it in my power to discharge a part of my obligation to your father.

"Under his care, accompanied by a body of lancers, I took the road to Calais, riding on the first day nearly to Saint Pol. I was received cordially in England by King Henry, and resided at his court for some time. His son, Henry VI., was born while I was there, and I was god-mother to the future king. I was then just twenty-two years old. Henry did nothing for me in the way of the divorce which I solicited; probably being unwilling to offend my Uncle Philip; and indeed he had little time, for his death occurred soon after.

"Now comes a stranger part of my history than all the rest. As I have begun to tell it to you, Mathilde, I will not cover up this part of it. The Duke of Gloucester held the office of Protector in England, when I applied to the pope for a divorce. I asked it on the ground of too near relationship, and on another ground which may make you smile at its absurdity. I was myself one of the god-mothers of John of Brabant; and the Romish church forbids a marriage between two persons who hold that relation towards each other. At any rate, I was determined to avail myself of every possible advantage which might be accorded me.

"I was awaiting the decision of the pope, when I was surprised by an offer of marriage from the Duke of Gloucester! If I looked only to the release of my hated bonds, might I not be forgiven if I consented? Consented, while before God and man, I was the wife of another! Mathilde, do you hear me? do you not shrink from one who could do this?"

"Ah, dearest lady, your temptation was great, doubtless; and it is not for me to judge you."

Jacqueline sat silent for a few moments. She felt sure that Mathilde did not exonerate her from blame, and she knew not how to proceed with her history. She had tried to justify her conduct to herself; but it was impossible, she thought, to impress Mathilde with all the motives which drove her to disregard the laws that bound her to her marriage contract. Both felt the restraint that was closing about them, and Jacqueline, sensitively alive to censure, drooped her head, and wept the bitter tears that only self-blame can cause to flow from mortal eyes. She looked so genuinely miserable, that Mathilde pitied and caressed her back to self-control again.

"We know not, dear lady, how well we can resist the tempter until he comes before us. I will not insult your good sense by saying that you did right; but believe me, I have both charity and excuse for your error. I can well conceive how you would catch at every prospect of release from the cruel bonds of your former marriage."

Jacqueline thanked her fervently, and then resumed:

"I will not say one word to justify myself in your eyes. Gloucester was an old man, and I, the wife of two husbands, was yet a young girl. I was scarcely twenty-three when I married him. He persuaded me that I was not legally bound to the Duke of Brabant—that I was as free as if he were dead; but he knew and I knew that we were transgressing—I cannot dwell upon this, my Mathilde; it is too painful.

"The Duke of Gloucester claimed all my possessions, which John of Brabant had seized upon. We crossed over to Calais; and, although Bedford, the duke's brother, then regent in France, prepared a treaty in conjunction with the Duke of Burgundy, still Gloucester refused to accept his terms. Many persons blamed the duke, and called him rapacious for claiming my possessions. I, alone, knew that it was only for love of me.

"We went to Hainault, where every town opened its gates and hailed us as their sovereigns. The duke was obliged to return to England early in 1435; and left me behind him at the request of the nobles. I was at Mons, where the people had sworn to guard and defend me against all who might wish to harm me. Alas! you must spare me, Mathilde, the relation of the wrongs I endured. Suffice it to say that every promise was broken, and that even my own mother forsook me in my extremity!"

Jacqueline could not tell her faithful friend all. She could not tell her of the pope's decree, which pronounced her marriage with Gloucester of no effect. She could not relate that, when her estates were entirely out of his power, he deserted her wholly and married another woman. Yet all this did Jacqueline of Holland endure, and yet—with all her experience of man's perfidy, her young and loving heart gave its sincere and earnest affection to another. John of Brabant was dead! It was the first news that stirred the pulses within her! She was free—and there was no one to bind the broken chain.

What wonder then, if her impressible heart gave way under the affection of Francis de Borselle, a nobleman whom the Duke of Burgundy had left as his lieutenant? Again she violated a promise—not one of marriage, however—but one given to Burgundy that she would unite herself to no one without his consent. The ceremony was performed; and the duke entered the country, seized the husband of Jacqueline and confined him in the tower of Rapelmonde. Then it was, that, to save her husband's life, she surrendered all her estates to Philip of Burgundy; resigned all her titles save that of Countess of Ostrevant, and retired to the estate of that name.

A few years of peace were now the lot of Jacqueline. There was no more for others to envy her, of riches or honors; and, she passed out of the eventful life she had always lived, with a sensation of tranquillity such as she had never known before.

In October, 1436, her faithful friend, Mathilde, was called to her bedside. The latter had never forsaken her, and next to her husband, Jacqueline loved the good and amiable daughter of d'Escaillon who, dying, left his child to her friendship and protection. Francis de Borselle was hanging over his dying wife, in an agony of grief which admitted of no consolation. Jacqueline had broken a blood-vessel, and never spoke again.

THE HASTY UNION.

BY CLARA AUGUSTA.

At eighteen, I, Helen Winthrop, was betrothed to Amory Meredith, with the full consent and approbation of our parents.

We had been children and schoolmates together, and our formal engagement was only a closing of the bands which had long united us. Our love was without passion—calm, and on my side earnest—the fraternal regard which exists instinctively between brother and sister. There was no breaking up of the great deep of my affections to flow forth on Amory Meredith; my cheek did not crimson at his approach, or my heart grow warmer in his presence.

My betrothed belonged to a highly respectable though reduced family, and from his English father he inherited the pride which any one less interested in him than I, might readily have seen he possessed. In our daily intercourse this spirit of arrogance did not often manifest itself, and when it did, I must have appeared so much surprised and grieved, that it was checked immediately; and thus I failed to notice this trait in his character as I should.

My father was very wealthy, and I had been reared in the midst of all that taste could suggest and gold procure; but I do not think I cared so much for these things as many do. I know that when the C—— Bank failed, and with it was swept away my father's whole property, I did not weep over it, as many would have done, but went about my daily duties calmly, and without emotion, other than sympathy for my parent in his distress.

I never thought that our loss of wealth would drive away the hundreds we had known as friends; I never doubted that Amory would take to his bosom as willingly the portionless Helen Winthrop, as Helen Winthrop the heiress. Ah, sometimes I think it is well that we see "as through a glass, darkly," in this life, otherwise we might be less happy than now.

With full confidence in Amory's truth, I went down to meet him the morning after the failure of Winthrop and Giles had been announced in the daily papers. He appeared ill at ease as I entered the parlor, and to my cordial greeting he returned a cool "good morning."

"What is it, Amory? What is the matter?" I thought he was ill.

"Nothing—it is nothing—I—" His brow crimsoned and he hesitated.

"What have I done to offend you? Why this coolness unless you are angry?"

"You have not offended me, Helen; you are not to blame—I have told my father so over and over again, but he is firm—so, no, Helen, I am not offended."

"Pray explain yourself," I said proudly. "Your words are not so expressive as your looks, or the disagreeable something which you are striving to keep a secret, would even now be known to me."

He arose to his feet, as if preparing for some desperate revelation.

"I might as well speak it, Helen—though it gives me great pain to do so—we can never be married!"

I controlled myself sufficiently to inquire:

"And why?"

"My father objects to my union now that you will be as poor as I; you know that he is proud, and seeks wealth rather than worth in the wife of his son."

In the calm indifference of Amory's tones, I learned what might have been evident to me long before had I not looked upon my betrothed as little below divinity. He did not love me as he had professed, and with the gilded bumble, wealth, had shewn all the pure affection he had so often told me dwelt in his heart for me. It roused my pride, this change in him, and I answered as calmly as he had spoken.

"Yes, Mr. Meredith, I know your father's character in a measure. I know that he is proud, I shall not be straying from the truth to add, arrogant, and sooner than enter his family now that I have not wealth to purchase my entrance—the only thing which seems to be necessary—I would work my way through the world by my own efforts!"

Amory was very much disturbed. He had, perhaps, thought me possessed of too little discernment to penetrate his flimsy regrets, and was astonished at my temerity in hinting at the discovery. It was some time before he replied, and then the words came forth slowly and with embarrassment, as if the man was in a quandary.

"But, Helen, I wish it were otherwise. Really—I—ah—that is, I wish I were a rich man, but it is vain! The world has dealt very cruelly with me!"

"Amory Meredith"—I arose from my chair and stood up before him—"you have said enough! You sought me for the gold you deemed was mine, and when the brazen idol was torn away you cast aside as worthless the altar where it had once been enshrined! 'Tis well. I am only too thankful that I have seen your falseness in time to save myself. Mr. Meredith, you are free, now and henceforth! Good morning."

I gathered up the book of engravings with which I had purposed to amuse him, and before he could stay me, left the room. Looking back now, I know that I could not have loved Amory Meredith as I was capable of loving, or I should have felt the pang of separation more keenly. As it was, I suffered, much from wounded affection, more from wounded pride; and, as I sat in my chamber till long after noon, brooding on his cold-hearted selfishness, and his father's family pride, I determined to be the wife of one whose wealth and station as far outshone even the pristine glory of the Merediths, as the sun outshines the moon.

My beauty would attract, as it had ever done, admirers and flatterers, and for the wealthiest one I would use all my fascinations. I thought then nothing of the deep and holy love which should live in a wife's heart for her husband. I thought nothing of the unhappiness of ill-starred marriages; I would only let Amory see that his falseness had not cost me a single pang.

So with this reckless resolve in my heart I went into society at every opportunity, and the patient reader shall know with what results, if he will follow me through my story.

It was at a gay party that I first met Arthur Stone, the millionaire senator. My first impressions of him were that he was like his name—stone; but his rich voice, and easy, polite bearing disarmed any awe which I might otherwise have felt in his presence.

Mr. Stone was a man past the morning of life. His age was thirty-three, and his person that of one born to stand pre-eminent among his fellows. He was of medium height, rather slender; his hair black and wavy; his forehead broad, full, and white as the depths of a snow-drift. His eyes were deep gray, such a gray as mirrors forth a matchless soul; and his features were strong and self-reliant. There was something about the small fine mouth which made one fear to offend him, and yet his smile was sweetness itself.

From the first, I resolved that Arthur Stone should be my husband; wealthy, talented, high in his country's places of honor, and I poor and neglected, yet he should be mine. I exerted every faculty—I talked to him as I had never talked before—thoughts which had never before formed themselves in my mind, came forth clothed in the fair garb of language, and Mr. Stone listened, and my success was at length certain.

One October evening, when the sun had gone to his bed in garments of crimson and purple, Arthur Stone poured out the story of his love in my ear. With all the impetuosity of a strong man's first love, he went on until he asked me to be his life—his hope! I put my cold hand in his and promised to be his wife. Then I submitted with patience to the burning kisses which he showered upon my lips and forehead, and heard all his passionate exclamations of fondness with calm stoicism. Mr. Stone did not seem surprised that I returned nothing of his demonstrations—perhaps he thought me shy and timid—but Heaven knows that at the moment I promised to be his, I cared no more for him than for the countless emigrant that brought our wood and drew our water.

Before he left, the permission of my parents had been sought and given, and our wedding day was fixed—just two months from that very evening.

The preparations were magnificent. Silks, lace, velvets and jewelry in the most lavish profusion were showered upon me by my infatuated fiancé. Why the wealthy, handsome and talented senator should love me so well I could not imagine, and at times I felt really sad that I could not return in some measure the wealth of affection he gave me. I joined in the arrangements for the wedding with great zeal, for I wished to show the Merediths, as well as other of my false friends, that the poor Helen Winthrop had won a prize after all.

The morning of the day set apart for our marriage, I went into the garden to superintend the removal of some choice plants for the decoration of the parlors, and when it was done, I threw myself down on a bench by the little pond at the foot of the garden. I thought over my life more seriously than I had ever done before. I realized the depth of my error in consenting to become the wife of one whom I did not love—one to whom I was totally and unexceptionably indifferent. For all my recklessness I had a heart, though it lay very far down, and the waters of folly and vanity had encrusted it, yet I could feel for the disappointment which my husband would suffer when he learned to understand fully that I had no love to give him.

The reader must not censure me too severely, for my situation in life must plead in extenuation of my many sins. I was the child of parents that never crossed me in my wishes, never thwarted my inclinations, never corrected my evil tendencies. They loved me, and deemed me too perfect to do aught amiss. Thus I came to regard my own will as first in all cases, and my pleasure paramount to everything else. No master spirit had ever awakened and called forth the better impulses of my nature; no gentle voice had ever taught me of the green path which leads upward to the land of perfect peace.

Buried in thought I sat on this, my wedding day, in the garden shadowy, when I was aroused by a slight rustling, and looking up, I saw standing before me, Amory Meredith. There was a shade of real suffering on his face, and his voice was tremulous as he bade me good morning. Perhaps, after all, he might have loved me as well as a selfish nature like his was capable of loving.

I replied calmly to his greeting, and was about leaving him to return to the house, but he caught my hand, and detained me.

"Stay a moment, Miss Winthrop—Helen—I wish to tell you how painful the thought of this eternal separation is to me. Can it not be avoided? I am willing to make any sacrifice for you, Helen; that is, if you still love me!"

"Mr. Meredith," I replied, "it would be impossible to change the course of events even if I loved you, which I take this opportunity of assuring you I do not; and my respect of Mr. Stone's high and noble qualities will make me very happy as his wife. When I am settled at Washington, I shall be happy to receive Mr. Meredith and his rich wife, among my visitors. Allow me to bid you good-by."

Meredith inclined his head, and turning, walked slowly away. I felt no pang of regret as I gazed on his retreating form, and knew that ere the sun set there would be an eternal barrier set up between us.

In all the splendor of white satin and orange flowers we were married, Arthur Stone and I. The wedding, people said, was a magnificent affair, with its eight bridesmaids and like number of groomsmen. I know that through it all my face was one flush of gratified vanity, and when the ceremony was over, and the rich peals of the lofty organ swelled through the wide old church, I thought I was happy, and that my heart beat a jubilant measure to the gorgeous music.

There was a gay party at my father's house that evening, in honor of my marriage, and I was the gayest of them all. Men praised the sparkling beauty of the bride, and envied Mr. Stone the possession of so rich a prize. Fair ladies were envious of my happiness, and thought with sighs upon the grand panoply of wealth and fashion which would surround me. Ah, if they had looked into my heart they would have found it empty.

My husband took me, with him directly to Washington, where he had a fine town house, and there I was installed as mistress. Very proud was I in rambling through the splendid rooms, and noting the exquisite taste which had chosen every object. Then did I think Arthur Stone worthy of a better woman than I.

"My dear Helen," said my husband, fondly encircling my waist with his arm, "this is the room I have fitted up expressly for your use. Your boudoir if it pleases you, dear. I have selected the furniture with especial reference to your taste as far as it was known to me. Tell me, Helen, if it meets your approbation?"

We were standing in a small oval apartment in the western part of the building, the windows of which were overhung with the luxuriant branches of two giant locust trees, about whose stalwart limbs still clung the tendrils of red honeysuckle, that in summer would make the air a great breath of fragrance. Through the faintly stained glass, the setting sun cast his light blood red upon the velvet carpet, and the pale pink roses there seemed to glow and burst into living light. The covers of the lounges and fauteuils were of the faint rose color which I have always loved, and in a rosewood bookcase I found arranged the every volume of my favorite authors—the pages over which the nobler part of my nature had risen and cried for liberty. I wondered how Mr. Stone, in our short acquaintanceship, had discovered so much of my likes and dislikes. There was a harp rich in antique gilding, and as I bent over it I saw upon the scroll across it the engraven name of "Madeline Stone, from her husband." The harp had been Arthur's mother's, and to me he had given the treasure of her who had slept in the tomb since first his infant eyes had unclosed on life? I felt the sacred tenderness of my husband's love for me, but the knowledge that I deserved none of it gave to my reply an indifference which must have chilled him.

"O, yes, Mr. Stone, I admire the effect of your furnishing very much; it does credit to your exquisite taste."

It was not the loving response which a true-hearted wife would have given him for all his careful kindness, but he seemed satisfied, and began to speak of the window view. It was magnificent beyond cavil. The domes and spires of the city at our feet, and far in the distance the calm Potomac, gliding like a blue ribbon band across the green velvet of earth's robes. Mr. Stone was an ardent admirer of nature, and probably he had chosen this site for his house as much for its charming locality as for its contiguity to his place of business, for aside from his political office, he was a lawyer of fine talents.

We saw a great deal of company as the season advanced; my husband had many friends, and it was his pleasure that they should be entertained at his own house, rather than in a public banqueting hall. Amid the gorgeous company that thronged our spacious parlors, I moved, people said, the reigning queen in grace and beauty. So long a time has passed since then, stealing one by one the charms I once possessed, that I feel no vanity in saying I was beautiful—it is necessary to my story, for it was a part of myself. It is not strange that I grew to love flattery; the incense of the great crowd was sweet to me; the excitement pleased my restless spirit; and so night after night, bespangled with flashing jewels—my husband's gifts—I went to reception, party or ball, as the case might be. Mr. Stone never hinted that my course displeased him, but continued towards me the same kind, forbearing manner as at first. Sometimes his expressions of tenderness almost overwhelmed me, and realizing the irreparable wrong I had done him, I would go to my chamber and weep—it was all I could do. I respected him more highly than any one breathing; I was proud of his eminence, and would have gone barefoot to the world's end to have saved his stainless honor, but I did not love him.

My affections had been rudely torn from the place where I had thought they were to rest forever, and it required time for the still bleeding fibres to heal and cling around another support. I needed time to weigh and balance my heart on the side of right and truth. I am no hypocrite, else I should have dissimulated, and thus deceived him. But such is not my nature, and where I felt no regard I scorned to affect it.

Mr. Stone received papers, about the middle of March, which required his immediate presence in New York; and a week's absence from home was the least time he would venture to mention. The morning of his departure as we rose from the breakfast table, he came over to my side, and wrapping his arms around me, drew my head down on his bosom.

"Dearest Helen," he said, as one grieved, "I am going away for a little while, and I shall miss your beloved face very much. Wont you kiss me just once before I go? You have never done so in all our intercourse."

I smiled gaily as I replied, forcing myself from his embrace:

"Nonsense, Mr. Stone, you don't care for such childish folly! I will bid you god-speed, and a quick and safe return."

He looked sadly in my face—it was not an offended expression, only sorrow—as he said:

"Helen, darling, you have misunderstood me. You have seen me cold to others; you deemed me wanting in tenderness. Heaven knows that never was wife loved more fondly than mine. Helen, a sister I never had, but all my life long I have yearned for the love of a pure woman. My only brother, he whom I idolized, met with a terrible death on board the ill fated steamer Atlantic; my mother died in giving me life, and my father survived her but a few brief years. I am all alone in the world without you, Helen; I have much need of your love. The wants of my being require it. Now, when I am going away, O, wont you kiss me? It's a little thing to ask of a wife."

It seemed very strange that this man, so cold and self-possessed to others, should plead with me, a weak woman, for so small a favor—that which was his right.

"Don't ask me, Mr. Stone, it is not my nature to fawn upon any one."

"Why always Mr. Stone? Why not call me Arthur? I like the name better from your lips, dear Helen."

I held out my hand and took his:

"Good-by, Arthur—" I believe my very forehead crimsoned as I spoke the name—"may God bless you!"

He caught me in his arms, my lips were close to his face. I know not what impulse moved me, but I kissed his forehead. A flush of happiness bright and radiant flashed over his face, but ere he had time to utter a syllable, I sprang from him and sought my chamber. What had I done? Had I deceived him; had I indeed been guilty of that blackest of all sins, hypocrisy? I asked myself the question in nervous haste, and my fluttering heart and burning cheek answered them. Slowly but surely stole over me the knowledge that day by day my husband had been growing dearer to me—that I was no longer indifferent towards him—that I was learning to love him with a love that never had been awakened in my breast before! The conviction brought me happiness; such deep and absorbing happiness as I had never felt. O, how I wished that Arthur had only remained at home until I had decided to reveal to him everything concerning my early engagement—yes, even to my motive in accepting him. I know that his proud spirit would be galled by the confession, but never would I profess the affection which had grown up for him in my heart, until he knew the whole. So, in anxious hope, I had nothing to do but await Arthur's return.

One morning when my husband had been gone two days, my dressing maid, Agnes, handed me a card, and said the gentleman was awaiting me, below. I glanced at the address—Amory Meredith.

Carelessly arranging my dressing gown, I went down to meet him. He greeted me most warmly—I received him as became the wife of Arthur Stone—and we conversed of our friends at Wheatwold, but nothing of the old love. He had been on a tour through the Southern States, and returning, was to stop in Washington a couple of months for his health as well as pleasure. He said, looking at me meaningly, that his health had suffered much for a few months past, owing to the unsettled state of his mind. After a long call, he bade me good morning, saying he would call again the next evening.

He came, evening after evening, prolonging his visits far beyond the time required by etiquette for a fashionable call. At length, I gave him to understand that it was my pleasure to receive him no more until my husband returned. At this, he burst into a violent tirade of reproach, accusing me of having wrecked his peace, and destroyed his happiness forever, ending by entreating me to leave my cold-hearted, selfish husband—these were his very words—and fly with him to some land where we could be happy with each other. I heard him calmly through, and then rising, I opened the room door, and pointed silently in that direction. He understood me, and almost bursting with rage, he rushed out, but not before I had caught his muttered exclamation:

"Your husband shall know the whole extent of your baseness!"

I did not fear him, because I would tell Arthur everything myself, so soon as he arrived. I would acquaint him with all, and then throw myself upon his mercy for pardon and forgiveness. So I thought nothing of my former lover, except to be thankful that I was rid of his presence, for the contrast between him and Arthur was so very great that I wondered how I could ever have thought I loved him.

My husband came home two days sooner than he had expected. Sitting in my boudoir I heard his well known step upon the stairs, and in blushing haste I rose up to meet him, for I loved him now. But no, contrary to his usual custom, he did not come directly to me to inquire after my health, but instead, he went into the library opposite, and closed the door. A fearful misgiving shot through my heart. I sank down on a chair and awaited his coming, for I thought he must come before retiring.

One hour, two passed away, and hearing nothing of him, I began to be alarmed. I went out into the passage, and tried the library door; it was locked. I tapped; there was no reply. I called softly: "Mr. Stone!"

The bolt flew back, and my husband stood in the doorway, but so pale and haggard that I scarcely recognised him. He did not speak, only stared at me with a cold, ghastly look.

"For the love of Heaven, Arthur, tell me what is the matter?" I caught his arm frantically, and tried to look into his face for the cause of all this strange outburst.

He gave me a chair, and taking one himself, sat down before me. Then I met the full gaze of his eyes, hard—hard, stony and immovable! His lips were compressed firmly, and there was not a particle of color in his face. I sat still before him, never moving or speaking, his appearance awed and horrified me. We sat there, perhaps, the space of five minutes, and then my husband spoke:

"Helen, you ask me what is the matter; it is a fair question, and I will tell you, though it seems your own guilty heart might tell you as well. When I married you, Helen, I did not think you loved me as you might love, but I trusted to time and unvarying tenderness to win for me your affections. I know that you did not love me, but I did not know that you loved another. I thought you proud in heart and truthful in soul, and I felt very happy that you were to be mine to fashion after my own spirit. All the time since our marriage, I have striven vainly to win from you one word of regard—the exquisite regard my heart craved—or one loving caress such as a devoted wife would bestow. But I excused it all, because I thought you were timid and retiring in your disposition, and shrank from contact with my sterner self. In loving you, Helen, I gave you my whole heart, fresh, strong, and undivided—a heart that never belonged, in the slightest degree, to another. You were my first love, you will be my last! Being deceived in one woman, whom I thought an angel, is enough—I ask for no further experience."

I had not once attempted to interrupt my husband's rapid utterance, but now that he had paused, I gained courage to ask:

"Why all this strange language, sir? You speak in riddles. Explain fully!"

He drew a note from his pocket, and as he gave it into my hand, said bitterly:

"Were other proof wanting, this in itself would be sufficient to explain all!"

I took the billet, and immediately recognised the handwriting as that of Amory Meredith. It ran thus:

"Hon. Arthur Stone, Washington:—

"DEAR SIR,—It is my painful duty to inform you that your wife—the woman you deem faultless—is unworthy of your slightest thought! She is not only false to you, but she loves another! She was betrothed in childhood to that other, and she has never ceased to love him. In a lover's quarrel, some three months from the time you married Helen Winthrop, this lover said something to her which made her angry, and in pure spite (which she has long since deeply repented) she dismissed him from her forever, and as soon as the opportunity presented itself, accepted you in his stead. Your love was favored only because you were wealthy and influential, and she knew that as the wife of such a man the admiration of that world she loved so well, would be freely lavished upon her. You have been the dupe of an artful woman, and I have deemed it my duty to acquaint you with the fact. During your absence she has regularly received the visits of this former lover—dare her to deny anything of the charges made in this note: your servants will tell you that Amory Meredith, the paramour, has been with your Helen daily since you have been away. And if she herself denies it she stains her soul with a falsehood!"

A FRIEND."

I read the missive through, folded it, and gave it back to my husband.

"And on such evidence you would convict me? Let me explain—"

"Not a word, Helen; it is all useless, all you could say would only make your crime blacker. I seek no further proof of your duplicity than the confession of Meredith himself, who this very morning told me the whole. He is a man of truth, and I rely on his word."

"But—Arthur, only one word—only let me tell you—"

"Hush! I cannot listen to it!" I cannot permit you to commit more sin by offering the flimsy excuses which may suggest themselves! I could have forgiven any other crime in my wife, but infidelity—that, never! Helen, you married me for my gold, the cursed stuff which has been my ruin! Would to God I had been born a beggar rather than the heir of a million, for then I might have been loved for myself. No, no," he added, seeing I was about to interrupt him, "I will not hear it—you can say nothing which will extenuate. And now about the future. We can be nothing to each other henceforth; I could place no confidence in you, and you would not wish to be afflicted with my hated presence. I will settle upon you one half my fortune—it has been a curse to me—and I will go away to some far off land where I can forget all. You can remain in this home, Helen; or wherever you choose—think it over to-night, and inform me of your decision in the morning. For the present, good night!"

With all his usual politeness, he escorted me to the door of my boudoir, and as he was opening the door he bent his large, serious eyes searchingly upon me, and asked :

"Does the proposal satisfy you?"

I bowed my head mutely, for I could not speak for the burning tears which rose like great mountains in my parched throat, and filled my eyes almost to bursting. Once within my room, I closed the door, locked it upon the inside, and sank down upon the sofa in a miserable swoon. How long I had lain there, I do not know; but I was awakened by the loud tones of the hall clock striking eleven. I sprang up, and tried to think it was all a dream; but no! there was the terrible reality standing up gaunt and definite before me! I went to the window, and looked out into the night. All was cheerless gloom save the white spot which encircled the half-obscured moon, and here and there a pale, straggling star. A few great black clouds were hanging over the heavens like death-winged birds of prey, and a dull, thick wind, blew down from the river, in a suffocating breath.

I sat down where the dismal air could fan my temples, and thought calmly over the whole. An hour passed, and my resolution was taken. I, not he, would renounce home, and go forth a wanderer. I arrayed myself in a mourning dress and coarse straw bonnet; and counting the contents of my purse, I found that I possessed about thirty-five dollars. I took none of my jewelry, except my husband's miniature, attached to a plain black cord, and the simple pearl ring he had given me on our wedding-day. When all was ready, I sat down to the little rosewood desk—his gift—and wrote these words :

"ARTHUR :—When you read this, I shall be away—as effectually separated from you as though the ocean rolled between us. I am innocent of the charge of infidelity—innocent as an infant child. Should I explain to you, you would only scorn and despise me, and so I go forth from you forever, without one word to repel the terrible accusation. May God bless you now and forever!"

HELEN."

I sealed and directed the note, and with a bursting heart went forth from my splendid home, out into the chilly March night—an alien, and a wretched outcast!

It is unnecessary to trace out particularly the course of my wanderings, but suffice it to say that I found a home in the family of a Virginia planter. I had seen his advertisement in one of the city papers; and for the situation of teacher to his children I immediately applied, and after a brief examination, was accepted. There were two girls, of the ages of ten and twelve, and a boy of thirteen, all kind and obedient as I could wish. Mr. and Mrs. Walsingham both treated me with the most respectful kindness, and if I could have blotted out the records of memory, I should have been content. I gave them Mrs. Merrifield as my name; and when they asked me if I were a widow, I told them I had no husband! So there the matter ended.

Ever before me, sleeping or waking, the image of Arthur Stone was present. I read daily the Washington papers for the sake of seeing his beloved name mentioned always in terms of the highest respect. Lost to me as he was, I gloried in his virtues, and took delight in his talents! I saw my continued absence noticed in the same papers; it was said that I had gone North on a visit of indefinite length to my friends. There was much regret expressed at the "loss of so brilliant a star," and many hopes expressed that Senator S.'s beautiful lady would return in season for the summer festivities! Ah, they did not imagine that she would never return!

As time passed on, I followed the course of my husband with the most intense interest. Nothing of his actions was lost to me; I read and rejoiced over all. Till now I had never realized the height and depth of my love for him—the broad flame of affection which had brightened and brightened until it consumed my very heart-strings. Night after night I tossed about on my bed till day dawned, thinking ever of him, and weeping over my fatal error.

Perhaps most women would have gone to their parents in such a case as mine, but I had too much pride to be willing to encounter the scoffs and sneers of my early companions. The neighborhood would institute the strictest inquiry into everything I did, and my life would be one of torture. My proud spirit could never brook this, and so I chose the happier alternative of earning my own bread. My parents were poor, and if I had not shrunk from the talk of the world, I should have hesitated in burdening them with an additional encumbrance; and it was better that I should go out among strangers, who, caring nothing for me, would take less interest and feel less curiosity in whatever concerned me.

Towards the close of the July following the March which had seen me installed as governess in Mr. Walsingham's family, Edward, my employer's eldest child, arrived home from a year's tour through the Northern States and the Canadas. There were great rejoicings at the house, and every one, from black Pompey down to Phillis the cook, kissed, or shook hands with "Massa Edward." I was presented to him as Mrs. Merrifield, his brother's and sisters' governess, and he received me with the most cheerful kindness; indeed, it was not in Edward Walsingham's heart to treat any one with indifference.

Young Walsingham was but twenty-five years of age, and in form and feature would have formed a fine model of Adonis. His figure was perfection, his features regularly classic, his hair of a rich brown, his eyes the clear, sparkling hazel, and his voice like low music. His manners were vivacious, and at times, gay; but through and beneath—permeating the whole—rose a pure, deep current of feeling, whose action could flow forth in life's soothing stream upon the children of sorrow or affliction.

As we became acquainted, Edward and I grew to be very good friends—for I respected his noble qualities and esteemed him for his noble scorn of all that was mean and contemptible. He was possessed of all a Southerner's warm enthusiasm for the beauties of nature and art; and to the soul of an enthusiast, he added the fervid fire of a poet. He came often to sit with the children in the garden parlor, and while there, he talked much to me of books and the great world; but I was too deeply occupied in the contemplation of my ever-present misery to think of the end of all this. But alas! too soon came the breaking up of the calm quietude of my existence—in a way, too, which I had not anticipated.

One evening Edward asked me to ride with him; he was going over to The Oaks, a village some three miles off, and it would be a good opportunity, he said, for me to get a breath of the pure October air.

I kindly but firmly refused his invitation, and was going into my room for the night, when Mrs. Walsingham added her entreaties to her son's, and between them both, I was fain to consent. I threw on my bonnet and shawl, and permitted him to lead me to the carriage. It was a splendid evening; blue, gold and purple bespangled the crimson sky, and we rode slowly along for some time in silence, impressed with the glowing beauty of the scene. At length, my companion roused himself and turned toward me.

"Mrs. Merrifield!" His voice was low and quivering.

"Mr. Walsingham!"

"I ask your pardon for what I am going to say—I am doubtful if it meets your approbation—" He hesitated, colored, and seemed deeply agitated.

Supposing he wished to say something regarding my system with the children, I said, encouragingly: "Well, go on; I am listening."

He seized my hand in his.

"Madam, I love you! Without knowing aught of your antecedents, I would make you my wife! Since I first saw you, you have filled my heart entirely—I have cared for nothing else, and have loved nothing else! O, Mrs. Merrifield, say that you will give me room to hope!"

A cold shudder ran through my frame as he commenced speaking, and when he had finished, I shrank back from him in fright and horror.

"Edward Walsingham, you know not what you ask!" I gasped, while my voice trembled and my whole form quivered with emotion.

He looked at me speechless with astonishment, and as soon as I could command my voice, I went on.

"Mr. Walsingham, it is due to you that I make some explanation, although I cannot do so fully. I am the wife of another—"

"Yes, yes, I know," he answered, eagerly; "but that other is—"

"Is still living!"

Edward covered his face, and leaned back silently in the carriage. I proceeded:

"In early life, I committed a great error—married a man I did not love. I married him to pique another, and jealousy on my husband's part separated us. I came here assuming a false name, that my real condition might remain unknown, and for a few brief months I have enjoyed a partial quiet. I have had my punishment; I have deserved all that I have suffered, but to inflict pain upon you grieves me to the heart. Mr. Walsingham, I esteem you very highly; you profess to regard me sincerely—prove it, then, by never mentioning this subject to me again!"

He uncovered his face, and looked long and lingeringly over my countenance.

"Ah, Helen! and must the blessedness of this dream pass away forever? God aid me!" Then after a pause, he said: "One question, madam. and then I will be silent while life lasts; do you love this husband now?"

I answered him solemnly: "As my own soul do I love him, Edward Walsingham! He is dearer to me than life itself—but we are separated forever in this world! God only knows if we shall be re-united in heaven!"

Edward pressed my hand, thanked me for my frankness, and drove on silently. Scarce a word was uttered between us during the ride; he despatched his business at The Oaks, and at early twilight we were at home again.

The next morning, when I came down, Edward stood in the hall with a couple of strapped trunks, marked "New Orleans," lying on the steps, as if ready for a journey.

"Are you going to leave us?" I asked.

"Yes, this morning," he said, hoarsely; "I cannot live here now!"

Breakfast passed silently on the part of all; I think Edward must have told his mother the whole, for there was an unusual sadness in Mrs. Walsingham's eyes when they encountered mine, and ever afterwards, as long as I remained with them, she treated me more as if I had been her daughter than her children's humble governess.

After breakfast, Edward came to our school-room to say farewell to his sisters and brother. The children were at that moment playing in the garden, and I stood alone in the room. He came up to me, and I extended my hand; the respect I had for his character made me wish to part in friendliness. He did not regard my outstretched hand, but caught me madly to his breast, and leaving a burning kiss upon my brow, he rushed from the room—and I never saw him again!

Fifteen months afterward, when war between this country and Mexico was declared, I read his name among those of the earliest volunteers, then his promotion to the rank of captain, his glorious deeds and achievements—all of which are recorded in his country's annals—his gallant charge at the storming of Vera Cruz, and lastly his name among the noble slain! God rest his ashes in peace—he needs no other monument than his own bright deeds have given him!

I remained with the Walsinghams something more than a year, and by that time the children were fitted to enter a seminary; therefore my services were no longer required, though Mrs. Walsingham urged me to remain as her companion and friend. But I had begun to weary of the sameness of my life; and besides, I felt a yearning to see my kindred once more. Since leaving my husband's home, I had heard nothing of my parents; and as I rallied from my grief to a sense of my ingratitude towards them, my heart smote me, and I formed the resolution to go back to them at once and brave all.

Three days afterward saw me on board a Northern steamer from Norfolk to Boston, and after a quick passage, I was set down in the great New England metropolis; thence by railway to Wheatwold; and one evening, just at sunset, I stole in upon my parents. They lived in a humble white cottage now, and my father was a merchant's clerk with a salary of eight hundred dollars a year.

Imagine, if you can, the meeting! There was one place, at least, where I could find rest—in the unchanged hearts of my parents; and I thanked Heaven that I had at last remembered the home and friends of my youth.

Before I permitted them even to embrace me, I told them the whole story of my life since my marriage—adding now and then a brief episode of my maiden follies—and when I had finished, I felt relieved of a heavy burden. Other hearts knew of my sins, my short-comings, my sufferings and final repentance! I was happier.

My parents forgave me all; they were too happy in seeing their once idolized child again, to dwell harshly on my errors. Mr. Stone, they said, had visited them several times since my desertion; he had helped them from his purse, and soothed them by his consolations, but never could he give them the slightest clue to my refuge. He still believed me guilty of the crime of infidelity; all else, he said, could he forgive, but this—never! My mother said he was pale and altered—that there were gray hairs threading the brown of his locks,—and that a solemn melancholy pervaded his whole manner. And I went up to my little room in the attic of the one-story cottage and wept the night away, thinking of him in his loneliness and sorrow! O how my hungry soul cried out after the rich affection I had once neglected, and treated with carelessness!—how my heart would have risen and shouted in gladness at but one word of tenderness from his sealed lips! But it was vain to wish—vain to grieve; and when morning came, I rose with the determination to be very brave and cheerful for my parents' sake.

My appearance at Wheatwold excited much curiosity among the people, and our little cottage was overrun with visitors for a week. I received them all calmly, but coldly, and never asked them to repeat their calls; so in a couple of months, we were as isolated as I could wish.

That I might be able to assist my parents, I did fancy needlework and fine embroidery for the Boston fancy stores, receiving and transmitting the various parcels by express. In this way I made quite a respectable living, and thus became a help instead of a drawback to my kindred.

Of Amory Meredith I heard little. The family still resided at The Lodge, as poor and proud as ever. The son was travelling in England, it was believed; and report said he was dissolute and reckless. The money, of which he had always an ample supply, it was thought was gained at the gaming-table. O how much better it was to be the suspected and discarded wife of a man like Arthur Stone, than the acknowledged companion of a miserable roué! How fervently I thanked God that he had spared me from the agony of such a union!

Zealously as ever did I continue to read the Washington papers, lest the name I loved so well might be there and I not see it. His course was, as it should be, glowing and still upward! How I rejoiced and triumphed over myself in thinking of it!

Late in January, as the papers were brought in, I took them up to my chamber, and in the first one I opened, I saw a paragraph which instantly transfixed my every faculty. With straining eyes, I managed to read it through understandingly. It was headed in capitals—the way some people have of announcing any great calamity:

"HORRIBLE OCCURRENCE—A United States Senator mortally wounded.—One of the most diabolical acts which has ever startled the citizens of our city, took place last night near the National Hotel. Hon. Arthur Stone, the Pennsylvania candidate for governor, was passing along the street, on his way to his residence, when he was met by a dissolute fellow who has for some time frequented our city, figuring under various names—but it has since been ascertained that his true appellation is Meredith—and some conversation took place between them, the import of which is not known. Mr. Stone appeared exasperated, and called for a policeman, who was passing, to arrest the fellow on a charge which he was ready to prefer. Before the officer could reach the spot, Meredith drew forth a pistol and shot Mr. Stone in the side. The wounded man was taken immediately to his residence, and his wound dressed by Drs. Stone and Hurd. It is thought that his death must ensue from the shot, as the ball penetrated the body near the heart."

Then followed a long string of lamentations and condolence for the injured man, winding up with the bitterest vituperation against the scoundrel Meredith; but I passed all this by, and flew down to the sitting-room to seek my parents.

In a few brief words I made them acquainted with the whole occurrence, and before they could offer one single dissent from my rapidly expressed determination, I was ready for my journey. Fifteen minutes later I was on board the express train for Boston, and by nightfall my name was booked and I on my way to Washington. I was desperate, and come life or come death, I would see him now! Three days of agonizing suspense I passed—the fourth, I trod the streets of the Nation's Capital.

At last I stood in the presence of my husband! I had beaten down all opposition, bribed the nurses, had melted the hearts of the two surgeons by my frantic entreaties, and now I was alone with him! O the blessedness of this thought! I wept and smiled by turns, and then over all my joy swept the sickening apprehension that it was probable he would be spared to me only a little period. They said it was a critical case—he might die at any moment, and he might—but only the greatest and most infinite care could save him—he might recover! The bare possibility was enough to nerve me with superhuman strength. Care? I would watch over him as never watched mortal before! I would enfold him with my tenderness so closely, that Death would pity, and pass by!

By the orders of the physicians, I attired myself in the loose garb of an old woman; I covered my luxuriant hair with a gray wig, and shaded my youthful eyes with blue spectacles. This was done that no recognition of his lost wife should agitate or in any way affect the patient, if he should by God's mercy recover his consciousness.

Meredith, the miserable assassin, was confined in jail to await his trial, though public indignation would have lynched him without judge or jury.

Arthur lay in a sort of stupor, only opening his lips to ask for water. One day when I was leaning over him, smoothing back the rich hair from his cold forehead, he murmured very faintly, like one in a dream:

"Give me water, Helen. O let me have it cool!"

I could have died then, I was so happy in knowing that I had not gone quite out of his memory.

Weeks rolled on, and my husband was better; they said he would be saved. I was in a delirium of fear, hope and anxiety. I knew not how he would receive me—how he would regard my coming to him without permission. But I strove to put away from me all thoughts of the future, and dwell only in the present.

As he grew better, he talked with me sometimes—more from the wish of relieving the tedium of his confinement, evidently, than from any desire of conversation. He often thanked me as only he could for my unremitting attention, and affirmed over and over again that he owed his life to my care. Ah, how happy all this made me! When my patient was disposed to listen, I read to him such works as a woman of my pretended age would be supposed to select—always being careful to lose never the stiff, precise tone of voice which I had assumed from the first. Once, when I had been betrayed into a warmer expression in reading than usual, he looked up at me suddenly: then turning away with a sigh, I heard him say—"How much like Helen!"

Early one morning, the physicians brought the intelligence that Meredith had been found suspended by a handkerchief from a bar in his cell, stone dead; and that on his table was a packet directed to Mr. Stone. Dr. Hurd produced the document, and gave it to my husband. He took it, glanced at the superscription, and turned deadly pale. I sprang forward to his assistance, but he rallied shortly, and breaking the seal, commenced the perusal. He had not read more than a dozen lines, when his countenance underwent a terrible change—the veins in his white forehead became swollen and rigid—his lips were set together like iron—and he sprang to his feet like a maddened lion.

"Great Heaven, she was innocent! O Helen! why did I not hear thee? Accursed destroyer! but 'tis well the grave has claimed thee—otherwise this hand should be dyed in thy traitor blood!"

Dr. Hurd attempted to take the mysterious letter from his clenched hand, but he waved him off.

"It is doing me good," he said, presently; "let me go on."

He read to the last word, and then placing it in the doctor's hand, bade him read aloud. He did so, and O joy ineffable! it was a full exposition and confession of Amory Meredith's whole life, coupled with his foul schemes to ruin me. All was written out by the hand of the miserable suicide, and my character was revealed to my husband in its true light. At last, Meredith had done me justice. Dr. Hurd finished the letter, and with much emotion returned it to my husband. For a moment, both were silent; then Arthur arose with the air of one who had made a great determination.

"Doctor," he said, "I must find her—the cruelly wronged—my injured wife! If she is this side heaven, I will yet win her back! She must hear me—she must forgive me! O God—if she should be dead! But no, no—it is not so! I'll not think of it. Doctor, I must leave for home this moment—"

"No need of that!" I said calmly, stepping before him and divesting myself of my wig and spectacles; "no need of seeking her—no need of winning her love—it has been yours for many months already!"

At the first sound of my natural voice, Arthur sprang towards me eagerly, and before I had half finished speaking, he had seized me in his arms.

"My own! my restored!"

The doctor went silently out, and closed the door behind him. For two blessed hours my husband and I communed together—hours of such happiness as we had never before known. All was explained, all was forgiven, and at last our hearts found rest.

* * * * *

In the beautiful home of my husband and myself—our home—my aged parents are passing quietly and peacefully to the eternal land, blessed with all that can make life pleasant.

As for my precious Arthur and myself, our lives are one great round of psalmody—one psalm of everlasting praise to the Giver of all good. Through much suffering, we have come up purified and strengthened, and the angel of love has folded his wings over us forever!

STRAIGHTENING THE CUCUMBERS.

He took much pride in his growth of cucumbers. He raised them very fine and large, but he could not make them grow straight. Place them as he would, notwithstanding all his propping of them and humoring them by modifying the application of heat and the admission of light for the purpose of effecting his object, they would still insist on growing crooked in their way. At last he had a number of glass cylinders made, into which the growing cucumbers were inserted, and then he succeeded in growing them perfectly straight. Carrying one of the new products into his house one day, and exhibiting it to a party of visitors, he told them of the expedient he had adopted, and added gleefully: "I think I have bothered them noo."—Smiles's Life of George Stephenson.

AN ECLIPSE IN PERSIA.

A traveller in Persia says: "One night there was an eclipse of the moon, and all the pots, pans, and other sonorous instruments that could be found in Gheelaun, were in requisition to frighten away the beast which was supposed to be devouring the planet. A great deal of gunpowder was also expended, and one might easily have imagined that the town was attacked. Presently our cook began a tremendous assault upon a large saucepan, and the other servants discharged their pistols and rifles, much to the assistance of the good cause. At last the inhabitants retired to rest triumphant, as the beast was effectually alarmed, and had left the moon precisely as he had found it, and round and bright as ever."—New York Journal of Commerce.

A POET'S EXPERIENCE.

Such was the boy; but for the growing youth
What soul was his, when, from the naked top
Of some bold headland he beheld the sun Rise up and bathe the world in light. He looked—Ocean and earth, the solid frame of earth
And ocean's liquid mass, beneath him lay
In gladness and deep joy. The clouds were touched,
And in their silent faces did he read
Unutterable love. Sound needed none,
Nor any voice of joy; his spirit drank
The spectacle. Sensation, soul, and form,
All melted into him. They swallowed up
His animal being. In them did he live
And by them did he live. They were his life.

THE LOVERS' STRATAGEM.

BY FRANCIS W. BÜTMANN.

It is the year eighteen hundred and fifty-five, and there is a picture in the academical gallery, Casa della Vittoria, in Rome, the design of which might have been conceived by Hogarth, but whose execution is such as hardly to entitle it to a place in the exhibition. It is styled the "Happy Pair." In a spacious, gaudily arranged room, a lady in morning costume is represented as sitting negligently on a fauteuil. She is certainly extremely lovely; the proportions of her face are faultless; but an air of ennui and discontent gives them a languid, indifferent aspect which is rather painful than otherwise. Her eye rests scornfully on one who is probably her husband, an insipid-looking gentleman, at a small breakfast-table. There is one other figure, a portrait painter, who is engaged on the gentleman's likeness; as yet no face or limbs adorn his sketch, he has only succeeded in depicting a highly correct copy of the uniform of the "Garde Noble." The studied aversion of the Happy Pair is admirably portrayed. The minor details are rather hurried, the only thing which is accurately finished being a ring of opals upon the lady's finger. The face of the painter strikes you as familiar, you have seen those calm, hazel eyes, that brown hair, golden where the sunbeam falls across it, the noble turn of the head, the whole expression of serene certainty and vigilance. While you pause to reflect, your eye falls on a person standing easily beside the frame; he observes you and smiles, the likeness is correct, it is he. It is probable then that all the faces are portraits, and that the picture has some hidden meaning; you move aside to see if events throw any light on it. The person who stands so near by, is of tall and rather slender frame; his dress, neither studiously elaborate nor careless, indicates ease, perhaps wealth; his air is that of a gentleman; he is the artist.

It being yet early in the day, the hall is by no means full, and one by one pass listlessly by. Now, a portly monsignore, an arch cardinal with his confessor and lackey, pauses patronizingly, but quickly contracting his benignant smile to a scowl, glances at the artist, and before long retires to his coach. A member of the Garde Noble, in gorgeous uniform, Marquis de Vologni, a nephew of the arch cardinal, starred and gartered, tall and handsome, saunters by and seems attracted. Indeed the room is marvellously like one in the palace Vologni, and the lady like her to whom the marquis is paying his addresses, the Princess Reggioso. Strange to say, he does not recognize the other portrait which is not so faithful as the one he every day sees in his mirror, and by-and-by he also wanders out. This time the artist's serenity is for a moment clouded.

Another group have just entered, but one only of their number draws near, a tall young woman in a rustling black silk; proud, if one were to judge by the erect form and haughty step, beautiful if those Italian skies ever saw perfection. By the quick changes of her brow, it is evident she perceives the design of the artist. The eyes of the lady in the picture are of the same rich darkness as hers who stands before it, there is the same soft texture of skin, the same look of ennui and discontent; it is, in short, the Princess Reggioso; everything perfect but her hand which wears no jewels. She regards the picture as if lost in silent thought for a few moments; looking up then with an air of determination, you perceive that the first expression is entirely gone, and a radiant smile bathes the face in its pristine beauty. She looks steadily at the artist.

"Correct save in one particular, Signor Cheaviv," she says, melodiously, "my arm is not so long as you have painted."

"True, madam. But it is daily lengthening, you will acknowledge."

"How so?"

"In order to grasp that of the Marquis de Vologni, whom Nature has placed at such a distance from your highness."

As the painter illustrates his words by pointing at the picture, it is observable that he himself wears the ring of opals.

"Ah! But a hundred accessories were palling it forward," she returns. "See, I annihilate their influence entirely; the arm is contracting!"

"But what will the marquis in that case do?"

"Who cares?" she answers, with a slur.

"But, signor, you have been long about this picture!"

"Seven years since we met, I think, but not seven years since I have seen you."

"One's hair grows gray in such absence. Seven years," she repeats, half sadly, "yes all that."

It is singular to observe how familiarly they address each other, and you wonder on what relation they stand. But since little can be gathered from their conversation, suffer me to relate the circumstances of their acquaintance.

The family of Reggioso, though very ancient and noble, were much impoverished, and to mend their fortunes, it had long been contemplated to unite their house with that of the less noble, but extremely wealthy Vologni, by the marriage of their daughter Victoria to the nephew of the cardinal, whenever the two should be of age, since the nephew had never evinced any inclination for the church as his uncle would have preferred, and was destined, when he had completed his growth, for the Garde Noble.

But Victoria, though accustomed to play with her handsome fiance from childhood, though constantly told that one day he was to be her husband, never manifested any desire for the union, and at the age of seventeen, stoutly refused the honor, and the subsequent years have been spent by both families in worrying the beautiful princess into the match, until now at the age of twenty-five, she seems on the verge of consenting. It is these facts that have given her face its languid, bitter look, it is the sudden resolution to thwart them, that has changed it into an incarnate smile.

Seven years previous to this time, she was eighteen; it was then the year of the Revolution in '48. All Rome, all Italy had long been in a ferment, secret meetings of the patriots had been held underground in the old excavations and catacombs, without the city, among the ruins of the ancient aqueducts, in broad daylight, at last on the open squares, till the whole vast impulse of a crushed nation rose in terrible strength to sweep oppression from the earth and substitute free government for the insolent Austrian rule. There had been in those days a young English nobleman sojourning in Rome, and following art in the great galleries. His true rank was unknown, but Signor Chenevix, if sprung from lords or peasants, could not be more popular with those Romans who wished to throw off their yoke, than he already was. In all their struggles he assisted, and in all their deliberations gave valuable advice, while the even balance of his character imposed a necessary discretion on the fiery counsel of this rash southern blood.

It was the day when the double-headed Austrian eagle was torn down from the Palazzo di Venezia and burned, with other hated insignia, in the streets. News came hourly of the revolt of sister cities, the highest excitement prevailed, the people were wild with joy, spontaneous processions formed themselves through the streets, and the popular outbreak was swelled by hundreds frantic with the new wine of liberty. The bonfire in the Piazza del Popolo brightened and increased with the accumulations brought by one and another. Chenevix had stood with folded arms, taking in the scene, when he saw a young girl steal from an arched gateway, look cautiously round, run quickly and throw a small bundle of parchment into the flames. They were the commissions of Austrian officers to govern Rome.

It was the Princess Victoria. How she obtained them was no matter of wonder when he remembered having already seen her in the theatre with those to whose distribution they were sent, and he knew that this great-hearted act would, if revealed, bring down some certain vengeance on her head.

No sooner was the thing done than a great shout rose from those around, although perceiving she did not wish to be known, none mentioned her name, but delighted they hailed another friend. She had turned to run back, when, catching sight of a carriage coming down the street, she lost her color, and looked uncertainly up and down, as if for shelter. Within the carriage were sitting the Countess Andelli, her scandalized aunt, and the arch-cardinal, the marquis's scandalized uncle. Chenevix perceived her embarrassment, and stepping forward, shielded her from their sight, while he offered his cloak which was long and hooded; she accepted it with a smile, and wrapping it round her, stood beside him till the aristocratic coach had rolled by. She would then have returned the garment and left him, but the crowd rushing from behind, filled up the square and bore everything before it to the Colosseum, where the youths were flocking to enroll themselves in the Roman Republic.

For a time he strove to protect her, but soon in the enthusiasm of the moment, and the pressure of the impelling multitude, they became separated, and he lost her. But in the vast area of the Colosseum when they arrived, there would have been ample room for a larger mass than this. It was but a short time before, looking up, he saw the princess standing on an upper tier at some distance, and so completely interested in the proceedings of the enlistment below, as to have suffered her cloak to drop down, while eager and erect, with one hand on an adjacent altar, she proudly watched this crisis in her country's fate.

Chenevix, in all his studies, had never seen so charming an one as this. It did not last long, though before another had joined her, and the feeble contemptuousness on his face told how little the young Marquis de Vologni sympathized with the citizens. He whispered a word or two in her ear. Starting suddenly, she gathered up her cloak, threw on him a glance of concentrated scorn, and swept away without his assistance.

A year passed, and during this time Chenevix, who had suddenly remembered Roman acquaintances in the city, immediately renewed his old, English habits, and plunged into a whirl of that society where he was frequently sure to meet the princess. Known always by his family name, and never by his title, he was not, of course, on any equality with her highness but that of politeness, although many suspected him to be some mildred Inglesa; the absurdly insolent manner of the marquis, her frequent attendant, he did not deem worthy of notice; and at last, as daily he was more and more in her society, it attracted the angry attention of the arch cardinal, who, in turn, directed her aunt's to the same point. Severely reprimanded by the latter, Victoria was, for a few days, sufficiently cold to deter any one less clear sighted than Chenevix; but waiting a while, he again, when her caprice of obedience had worn off, became her partner in the dance and her companion in the walk, while the boyish marquis stood indignantly by in stifled jealousy till he could again find pretext for his uncle's interference. Still their intercourse was almost commonplace, if it had not been for a secret understanding of each other's sentiments, which found expression now and then in the glance of an eye, the answering smile, the heightened color, but very seldom in words.

Although strictly forbidden to continue an acquaintance with so plebeian a person as an unknown English artist, she boldly did as she pleased, despite father, aunt, or the whole net of Volognis, and was accordingly one evening detected by the vigilant eyes of the marquis, monsignore the arch cardinal, and her aunt, at the masked opera ball, promenading arm-in-arm with Signor Chenevix! Nothing could exceed the impropriety of the action! There could be no greater breach of Roman etiquette. Without a chaperone, young, alone, and in such a place, not even her exalted station could have protected her from scandal had it been known. To do her justice, however, it was the first time she had ever spoken freely to Chenevix, and now she rather revelled in it, not so much from any penchant for the Englishman, as because it was an emancipation from the strict rules of ceremony, and because it had been vetoed, while at the same time she knew there was nothing to be feared when beneath the respectful protection of Signor Chenevix.

They had lifted their masks for air, and were gaily talking, when Victoria observed the dreadful trio unmasked, and terrible in intention, bearing down towards them. An instant she turned pale and held her breath, while her heart beat in in her throat. "Courage!" whispered Chenevix, as he saw her downcast eyes. The word sent the blood back to its proper channel, the eyes were raised, the suspended laugh finished, and she appeared, as the Countess Andelli afterwards remarked, unconcerned as any hardened criminal.

Monsignore had ferocious designs glaring under his brows, but they were forestalled by Victoria's crying in affected horror, "Your excellency at a masked opera ball! And with my aunt?"

His excellency had nothing to observe. Her aunt seized her arm and pronounced some awful threat in her ear.

"Indeed, madam," returned the princess, with a shrug, "he will oblige me extremely by taking the initiatory proceeding in breaking the contract. For if he waits for my consent, the marquis will be a bachelor till doomsday."

"Then he will not wait for your consent!" said monsignore.

"Yours will be sufficient?" she asked him, with her arm still in Chenevix's.

"Assuredly!"

"Ha! I flatter myself that my own consent is the primary object, so at least you will find it, and believe me, I shall never give it to your nephew!" The house of Reggioso boasts, if of no more, of untainted blood!"

"Niece! niece!" whispered the terrified aunt. But monsignore had it not in his power to take any exception at this affront, although he resolved at some time to take revenge. The young marquis was better provided, and with every evil passion marking his crafty face, he drew his sword and struck Chenevix across the head an awkward blow, which he had meant should be a wound. There was a difference of some ten years between them, a difference also in rank which the younger did not know, a difference of spirit he could not comprehend. He wished a challenge should ensue, and hissed exultingly between his teeth, "Now, signor, you will demand reparation!"

"No!" exclaimed Chenevix, with flashing eyes. "On the contrary, I shall take it!" And grasping both hands of the little marquis in one of his own, with the other he boxed his ears on both sides of his head, and then shook him by the shoulder with such vigor as to send him dancing into the middle of a neighboring set.

"Now my princess," said he, as if nothing had happened, "shall we continue our walk?"

The astonished cardinal moved aside to suffer them to pass, and then hurried away, and from that time it was tacitly considered best in both families to allow the Princess Victoria her own way till she should grow weary of it. A determination exceedingly pleasant to her, if it had been long maintained, but unfortunately subsequent events induced both her father and the marquis's uncle to alter this plan of behaviour.

All this time the spirit of revolution had never once ceased or hesitated. The great Mazzini's influence was omnipotent in the city, and the republic seemed to be rising fast in fresh, white lustre on the ashes of the French and Austrian power. Nevertheless, the steady, and in reality immense force of these old kingdoms, with their armies, their wealth and their prestige, was in the opposition, and the resistance, long open, was now flashing forth in street skirmish and outside assault. Victoria had never restored Chenevix his cloak, nor indeed alluded to it, and therefore on the day of the great battle, more than a year having elapsed from the first outbreaks, when he saw this cloak climb the wall and look out on the scene of carnage, he had no hesitation in identifying her within it. He would at once have joined her and led her out of danger could he have left his own post; but at the moment the gunner by his side was shot down into the ditch, and she sprang forward to fill the place, performing his work faithfully, and with more sang-froid than if at her embroidery on a shady terrace. Not far distant the majestic boom of the guns of St. Angelo sounded in the intervals of their own; the crash of falling escalades, the rattling of mucketry, filled the air with awful clamor, and the groans of the dying, the trumpet peals of rallying squadrons, were sufficient to appall stouter hearts. But steadily she rivalled the ancient fame of the Roman women, in her heroism.

A dreadful hour, vacant of words between them, passed like a century over his head, as Chenevix thought what might befall her, as ball after ball whizzed by her, shell after shell burst beneath, a wall of flames opened and closed in front. At last he could endure it no longer, he left his gun for her side, and implored her to leave. As he spoke, a cannon ball dashed by, sweeping with electrical velocity within half an inch of her lips, and she fell on his arm completely stunned with the fearful collapse of air which it occasioned. Hardly had he time to grasp her ere another terrible stroke, coming from he knew not where, robbed him also of sensation, and when he awoke he lay on a cot in the hospital Fate-Bene Fratelli, while Victoria bent over him like some mild nun of the Annunziata. It seemed then, as he soon learned, that they had together been brought here; she had quickly recovered, but he had lain in fever and delirium for many days.

"Our cause?" he asked of her.

"Is lost!" she briefly answered.

A moment's pause was broken by another question. "And you have nursed me?"

"Yes."

"As in your kindness you would tend any wounded wretch!" he said, bitterly.

"No, signor," she responded, in low, fervent tones. "As I would tend an angel from heaven, if he should fall to my compassioning."

Chenevix gazed long and searchingly into the truthful eyes that met his own, and at last, satisfied, as it would seem, slept with her hand in his.

Many more long days and nights Victoria watched with him, relieved by the angelic ministrations of Margaret Fuller, that primal Florence Nightingale, in bearing the olive of peace and healing through the havoc of war, till he was sufficiently restored to leave. Slow as the time was, they look back on it with regret, for they had experienced in its flight the uninterrupted pleasure of a companionship they might never know again.

The Austrians were once more in the ascendant, and when he again wandered out into the plaza, the evidence of their subdued order was everywhere apparent. Scarcely had he cast his eyes around, ere he found himself, at unawares, seized by their officials. This was monsignore's revenge. As he was being thrust into a coach, a figure wrapped in a long cloak passed, and being suddenly stopped by the affair, stumbled and fell against him. The guards hastily interfered, but not before a little hand had slipped into his a vial, while a voice whispered, "Drink it at once!" The coach when closed, was so dark that he did not hesitate on account of discovery, and on reaching the place of trial, their captive was, to all appearance, dead. So the physician declared, and hastily confined, he was the same day entombed.

That morning Victoria had sold her diamonds, and some of the gold thus obtained had chinked in the physician's palm, more had chinked in the grave-digger's, an empty grave had been left, and a villa outside the wall received the but half animate form of Chenevix. Here the proper medicines were applied, and two days after, when he sat stronger than before he had drank the opiate, the door opened and Victoria, who had just reached the villa, entered quietly. Her face was quite pale, and she commenced speaking hurriedly.

"I have procured a passport for you," she said. "It is filled out and viséed. You are able to leave, Signor Chenevix; let me request you to hasten." It seemed to pain her as she spoke. "I have stolen hither, the marquis follows, and will arrive momentarily. His joy at your supposed death is magnificent! Your position is at the gate. Farewell, if we do not meet again. Thank God!" signor, there are two worlds!"

"I must leave you, then?"

She handed him a little note which he read:

"SIGNOR CHENEVIX,—I know not who you are, but as one gentleman to the other, I ask you, force me not to break the oath I made, on the Princess Victoria's birth, to the Arch Cardinal Vologni, that she should wed his heir. I ask you not to address my child for a period of three years, a promise corresponding to her own, and believing in your honor, I am yours, ANTONIO TRISTEZZA, of Reggioso."

Immediately drawing forward a writing stand, Chenevix wrote in answer :

"EXCELLENCY,—I respect your wish, let my secret also be regarded.

Yours, RICHARD CHENEVIX,
Duke of Radnorsley."

He sealed it and gave it to her.

"I have promised," he said. "We do not meet again for three years. You will then be your own mistress, unless events are untoward. I shall then be in Rome."

"My father, Signor Chenevix will perceive, knows of his safety; no one else; he followed me and so learned it. Farewell again."

"Princess, one word! If you were alone in the world, and I the same man as now, humble, foreign, obscure, would our fortunes be united?"

She looked up with a sparkle of happiness making her beauty brilliant, and answered slowly and distinctly, "Signor, the world would not be wide enough to separate us."

A moment of quick joy, he had clasped her in his arms, snatched one burning kiss, placed her in his own chair, and dashing down to his own coach, disappeared round the bend of the road just as the marquis drew up in a cloud of dust at the gate. Without the interchange of a word, her suitor conducted her back to Rome, he full of corroding, jealous anger, and she hanging on the blissful dream of the last few moments; the steadfast, earnest eyes, the kiss, the touch, though years might intervene ere it was repeated. Once at home she gave the prince his note, which he read without comment to any, and the arch cardinal, who was awaiting them, and who had been severely silent and stern, insisted that she should be confined in some upper room till she consented to the marriage. Reggioso was in his power, and Victoria was accordingly imprisoned. But nothing conquered that spirit, and when at the end of the year the cardinal with his nephew entered and requested her decision, she calmly declared it unaltered.

"Another year!" said the cardinal, and another year found her still a prisoner. Again at its expiration the cardinal entered. This time she would have nothing to say to either of them, and the cardinal withdrew. Harsh measures being thus found ineffectual, monsignore advised milder ones, and the princess once more appeared in the wondering but questionless society of the capital, constantly attended by the marquis, in hopes that weariness and habit might cause her to yield. The misery of those two years cannot be imagined, but now the hope dawned on her that the third year would bring Chenevix. It passed without him. The fourth year and much of the fifth passed by and he came not. Despair took the place of hope.

One dreary night she sat alone from sunset to day-break, bitterly reviewing the years that were gone. It was plain he had thought her only a wild, ungovernable child, she said. In England there were women beautiful as she, and far more cultivated. He had forgotten her and loved there. From that night the ennui of ease, the discontent of life, settled on her brow, transfixing the airy, high-spirited girl into the scornful, superb woman of elegance.

The fifth year had nearly passed; the marquis had finished growing and entered the Garde Noble, and sitting carelessly one night at the opera, he, as ever, at her side, her glance lighted on a familiar face, and fastened there. Could it be Chenevix? A silent, spell-bound gaze, and he bowed. It was impossible for her to return it, to move; her face hardened and grew ghastly, and she was borne out in a swoon. Weary days passed ere she again saw him; she could not relinquish self-control thus a second time; he should see how she bore neglect; and scornfully as to any of her Roman admirers, she gave him a mocking recognition. It was idle, she began to think, for her to occasion such strife in her family, and joyfully the cardinal perceived that she was drifting with the current, her consent almost, and at last, as he thought, being finally gained.

About this time she lost a ring of opals, and when, after a long interval she again saw him, the ring was on his finger. Well, any lover could wear one's rings, but had he wished ever so much, she reflected that she was too constantly guarded for him to obtain any interview, and with her mind strangely balancing in uncertainty, she waited. Then he disappeared altogether from her sight, and months passed without him. So settled did the family now regard her marriage that the trousseau was already finished, and they clamored for her to name the day. But to such appeals she never answered, and they concluded to fix it themselves; in this they reckoned without their host, for as she would not speak on the subject, they should have seen that she was not prepared to act on it. At last they boldly announced that her wedding-day was de-terminated on. She laughed at the intelligence and continued as before.

When she again met Chenevix, it was as the artist beside his picture; she had recognized him with a wild heart-beat of pleasure, which all her pride could not repress, on entering the hall; and for seven years never so near together. As now, she carelessly strolled up to the painting though every step seemed a year. "Correct, save in one particular," is the first sentence she has interchanged with him for a desert of time.

"Is seven years so long then?" asked the painter.

"Signor, two years in prison have not been so long as five in freedom."

"Madam has been a prisoner then?"

Her eyes flash but she does not reply.

"I, too," he resumes, "have been in like situation. Not two years, but four. My cell not a palace, but walls of ice."

She turns her dark eyes on him for explanation.

"The princess is interested?"

"I would like to hear you more particularly," she says, distinctly.

"In short, then, when I reached England six years ago, I entered, that I might not be tempted to falsehood with your father, on an expedition to the Arctic seas. Greater separation I could not fancy. Time will not answer here for details. Four years walled in among dense masses and mountains of ice, that built themselves up, ere I again saw my native shores. I hastened at once to Italy. A hundred attempts to address the Princess Victoria have failed; the prince, her father, has as many intercepted letters. He knows I am in Rome. I was this moment recognized by the arch cardinal, who is strangely perplexed, and has gone to solve the riddle."

"He will open your grave and find it empty!" she says, laughing.

"We will then arrest his holiness for barking."

The princess hardly understands the allusion and perceives her friends moving forward. He stoops so as to look clearly into her unshrinking eyes. "Victoria!" he says, "your wedding is fixed, as you know, for to-morrow night, in the Church of Santa Croce, and," bending earnestly forward, "it is for the bride to choose the bridegroom!"

"Seven years ago I chose that bridegroom!"

"And his name?"

"Is Richard Chenevix."

"At what hour does the marquis expect his marriage?"

"At six," she replied.

"Very well, taking a little precedence, I shall be married at five!" he said, smiling. The princess is here joined by her chaperone, and soon glides out, a happy smile hovering round her lips. To-morrow comes and crawls along; the sun passes the meridian and steals down the west; it is five o'clock. A bride has just entered the vestry of Santa Croce. The church is full of those who wait to see the proud princess give herself to a man she is known to despise. They have been told that the bridegroom waits, and they do not wish to delay the marquis, therefore she leaves her father's arm to the countess while moving forward herself with her bridesmaids to her lover. Chenevix meets her as this bridegroom, with his head bowed to hear her murmur, and the ritual proceeds. The great clock in the tower strikes six ere the stately ceremonial pronounces them man and wife. Proud and happy they have just left the altar. Suddenly a quick defiance, a haughty smile chase over her face, for there is a commotion at the door, and they pass down the aisle together while the marquis and arch cardinal are alighting. Unperceived they enter their own coach, and the bells above again swell on the air, with acclamations from the populace, who have not forgotten the maid of seven years ago, nor her husband.

"The Duke of Radnorsley stops the way!" cries a footman.

"God and our lady bless the Duchess Victoria!" cry the people. She looks up in her husband's face, struck with sudden astonishment, but the loyal smile she finds there only gives confirmation. Monsignore and the marquis stop, arrested by the words, then the latter darts forward. "What means this?" he begins.

"Marquis Vologni," says the duchess, from her seat at Chenevix's left hand, "I said that to-night I should be married; never having taken you into my confidence, I did not say to whom!"

The duke bows to him with superb stateliness, and they drive on. The marquis has in fact only his own presumption to thank, and since he dare offer neither insult nor injury to the British ambassador at Rome, he swallows his rage, and with his baffled uncle returns home to seek another bride.

When they are once more alone, the duke's clasp of his bride is none the less tender, while, careless of the orange flowers, her head lies on his shoulder. "And is my darling wife defrauded," he said, "because humble Mrs. Chenevix blossoms into the Duchess of Radnorsley?"

"O no, no!" she answers. "But I should be no less glad and gay if you were a lazzarone and I still your wife."

Misery requires action, happiness repose.

THERE IS NONE SO POOR AMONG US.

A BALLAD.

BY J. H. M'NAUGHTON.

There is none so poor among us
 But may yet in mansions shine,
 None so stricken, none so famished,
 But may yet with princes dine;
 There is none so low among us
 But may rise from out the pit;
 Will his rage prevent the peasant
 From ascending? Not a whit!
 Cheer ye up, ye stricken-hearted;
 Grasp the sword and take the van;
 Valor's arm can ne'er be thwarted,—
 On to battle, man to man!
 Cheer ye up, ye stricken-hearted!

Out upon this grovelling, whining,—
 Shout the war-ory to the wind;
 Teach the world that men of tinsel
 Ne'er can vie with men of mind.
 There is none so poor, so needy,
 None so weak, and none so low,
 But may win both wealth and honor
 If he dare but strike the blow.
 Cheer ye up, ye stricken-hearted,
 Grasp the sword and take the van;
 Valor's arm can ne'er be thwarted,—
 On to battle, man to man!
 • Cheer ye up, ye stricken-hearted!

THE REVOLUTION OF 1688.

A page in the life of William and Mary of England.

BY HERBERT LINTON.

IN a large room, hung somewhat too profusely with Flemish paintings, sat a man whose aspect was at once severe and pensive. Thin as a shadow, with a frame bent as if by sickness, a forehead broad and high, if not exactly open and frank, a nose somewhat hooked, eyes that shone brightly but coldly, and a mouth round which the lines were deeply and firmly marked, betokening a strong will and a determined character, William, Prince of Orange was all his physique denoted him to be.

For a long while, he had experienced a discontent and uneasiness, amounting to actual unhappiness, at the prospect of his own state when the princess should succeed to the monarchy of England. The natural distaste which a man feels at being obliged to be second to a woman with whom he is on any sort of intimate relations, was aggravated in this case by the inherent jealousy of a temper like William's, and the consciousness of his own ability to command.

His evident want of ease excited a serious alarm in the breast of the princess, who tenderly inquired the cause. Unwilling to disclose his thoughts to her, of all others, he changed the subject at once, professing to her that he had been suffering from one of his frequent headaches. She begged him to retire and allow something to be applied for his relief; and the prince glad to escape from the scrutiny of his wife, was soon apparently asleep in his chamber. Closing the windows and doors, Mary left him to his repose, after laying a wet napkin upon the broad and ample brow, which would almost seem to ache from its own weight, she descended the stairs thoughtfully, wondering if these frequent and violent attacks would not some day lead to disastrous consequences.

Mary loved her husband even more than he gave her credit for doing. Unamiable as his general character indisputably was—peevish, cold and sarcastic as he often proved to others, he never seemed to visit it upon the princess, whom he evidently regarded as his superior in birth, and whose beauty and virtue made him regard her as the first of women.

The first person whom Mary encountered after leaving the chamber was Gilbert Burnet, the brilliant and lively spiritual adviser of her royal highness. The cloud had not left Mary's brow, which was brought there by anxiety about the prince, and Burnet hastily asked her what was the matter? On being informed, he gaily answered that the prince was suffering from altogether a different disease.

"It is the heart—not the head, your highness! The prince is troubled with an affection of the heart which has already attended him nine years."

Mary looked at him at first with dismay, knowing that his knowledge of physiology was as superior as his theology; but the smile upon his face re-assured her.

"The fact is this, your royal highness," continued Burnet, "the prince dreads the moment that you shall be crowned queen."

"And why?" she asked, astonished.

"Because he will no longer live with you when that event takes place; and the thought of a separation is most terrible to one who regards you so supremely."

The princess sat down in a tumult of complicated feelings. She was ghastly pale, and Burnet saw at once that he had been too blunt and abrupt in his speech. With the deepest contrition, he besought her to forgive him the pain he had evidently cost her, and to believe that no human being knew that he was going to utter such words to her. He would say no more until she granted him forgiveness.

She assured him of this and begged him to proceed. He then related to her how inadvertently he had discovered William's feelings, and his conviction that he would never share her throne.

"But how shall I act under all this?" asked the princess. "This resolution which the prince has formed, must be met and crushed at once. No anxiety of this kind must be permitted to fill his mind, already burdened by care, and struggling with the sufferings of disease. Nothing on my part must be omitted to give him confidence in me and my regard for him. A thousand thrones cannot be put in competition with my husband's love."

Burnet had changed wholly from the careless, indifferent manner with which he had commenced the conversation. A serious expression had succeeded to the light gaiety which his countenance had before exhibited. He sat apparently absorbed in the contemplation of the bright colored dresses in the Flemish painting opposite. He was in a dilemma, that might draw upon him the cool sarcasm of the prince; and although he hardly cared for it himself, yet he felt that he could not bear to provoke it in any matter that concerned the princess.

"Again I ask you," said Mary, "how I may best act in regard to this resolution—this whim, if I must call it so?"

"I know of but one way. Assure him that he himself shall administer the government; to which measure, the parliament may be easily moved, as well as to bestow on him the title of king."

"Then assure him yourself from my own lips, that they shall be thus influenced."

Burnet started to find the prince, but he was off upon his favorite hunting ground. The next day, however, he came with his heart full to the princess, to express his admiration of her generous desire to hold him her equal. The scene between them was affecting in the extreme. Mary expressed herself strongly as to the high opinion which she held of his talents and capability to hold authority, and promised him that he should always bear rule.

Restored confidence—expressions of ardent affection, which, coming from such lips as William's, all unused to utter the soft accents of love, were more forcible if not so smoothly rendered—were the fruits of Mary's loyalty to her husband; and the lamp of conjugal affection which until now had not seemed to burn very brightly in the House of Orange, revived its blaze anew.

To William's rooted aversion to France, more than even his love for Holland, historians ascribe his ambition to have been kept awake. The desolation of Holland, whose inhabitants had been called upon to bend the knee to the House of Bourbon, when William was yet a boy, rankled in his heart, and deepened his hatred of Louis of France. The two were as different as possible. Louis with his courtly airs, his refined and voluptuous tastes, contrasted strongly with William, whose manners and habits were simplicity itself.

To this hatred, might reasonably be attributed William's intense desire for sway. It must have required all that dogged sullenness for which he was sometimes distinguished, to affect indifference when the birth of an heir to the English throne was announced. He succeeded well in concealing any disappointment he might have felt; for on the morning after the announcement, prayers were said for the little Prince of Wales, and an envoy was sent to London with a formal congratulation on his birth.

Still, when the conspirators against King James pleaded with William to come to the rescue of their ill-governed country, the very first act of the prince was to suspend reading the prayers for the child whom nine-tenths of England believed sincerely was not the son of the queen. History, while it frees James from the imputation of deceit, throws no light over his strange and unaccountable conduct in allowing none but Papists to substantiate the child's birth.

"And why not make a descent upon England at once, your highness?" asked the young and impetuous Lord Mordaunt, who had come to the Hague, to persuade William to a measure which he fancied would be perfectly easy.

The prince smiled.

"Do you consider that there would be danger in the attempt?"

"William of Orange is not apt to think of danger," was the proud response.

"I beg your highness's pardon. You and I have nothing to reproach ourselves with on that score."

"Not if your lordship's exploits have been reported to me aright," answered William, with a touch of the sarcasm so natural to his manner.

If the implied reproach touched the pride of the young lord, he had, at least, the tact to conceal that it did so; and he only replied to it by re-urging his plan.

William's words were guarded enough. "I have long taken an interest in English affairs, my lord, and shall keep my attention fixed upon them still."

Whatever were his meditations upon the subject, he did not disclose them to the rash youth before him. William's time had not yet come. The future lay before him; and he had long been impressed with the idea that he had a great and important part to perform in it; but no alchemy raised by rashness and excitement could transmute the sterling metal of his nature into the dross of which such beings as Mordaunt was made; and which the Prince of Orange estimated at just its specific value.

* * * * *

It was December, 1688. The troops of the prince were pouring into London. William himself was landed safe from a private carriage in which he was taken to St. James'. From the top to bottom of the palace, all was one mass of orange ribbons. Bells were rung, illuminations were got up in a style hitherto unprecedented, and every where rejoicings were taking place. St. James was all too limited for the immense crowds that attempted to throng its rooms and staircases. The long looked-for triumph had now come.

It was just at that time that the dethroned queen and her infant were entering France. Louis, attended by his family and the nobles of his court, went forth to meet her, with the strongest expressions of welcome. He even went on foot for the last part of the way; and after condoling with her upon the misfortunes which had driven her hither, he took her child in his arms, and embraced him.

The queen now entered the state coach of the king, in which she was conveyed to St. Germain's where James arrived the next day. Everything that munificence could suggest, was provided for the royal visitors; and France and England were for once on terms of cordiality; although it must be said that it was only England in its degradation that received the courtesy of the King of France.

On the eleventh of February, 1689, the Princess of Orange re-entered her father's late dominions, to take the throne which he had desecrated by his meanness and pusillanimity, to speak in the softest terms. It was a sight which the world has never seen repeated—the accession of a daughter while the parent monarch still lived; and at first thought, would seem not only strange and unnatural, but absolutely shocking. It will be remembered, however, that James once listened with complacency to a scheme whereby he might defraud his daughter of the succession. Beside this, Mary set aside all authority or ties of consanguinity, wherever her husband was concerned. Notwithstanding what tale-bearers said of Mary's domestic happiness, her whole love and duty were actually given to William, and he could not but be sensible of the value of the gift.

The revolution which thus placed William and Mary on the throne, was a momentous one. It was the last that England knew; and to the peace and happiness which she has since enjoyed, she is indebted to the wisdom of their joint reign, and the proof which it brought home to the English heart, that the throne and the parliament are one and inseparable.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF WOMEN.

Punch thus expresses his distress at the disappearance of women from the face of the earth: There are no women now-a-days. Instead of women, we have towering edifices of silk, lace and flowers. You see a milliner's large advertising van that slides along with a rustling sound, and you are told that it is a woman; but as you cannot approach within several yards of the monster obstruction, you cannot tell what it is, beyond something that looks like an entire shop front put in motion, with all the goods in it exposed for sale. I really believe, if any showman would open an exhibition where one could see a woman, such as were in my young days, when they used to be fair, slim, slender, graceful, well-proportioned, and everything that was beautiful, instead of the animated wardrobes, and unrecognizable bundles of fine clothes, that they now are, I really believe that an enterprising showman like that would realize a large fortune."

THE SAFEST INVESTMENTS.

In the long run, those men get to be the richest, as all past experience proves, who invest most of their surplus capital in good mortgages and real estate. It is astonishing how fast a fortune accumulates, even at six per cent., if dividends and rents are invested quarterly, or even semi-annually. Investments in real estate securities rarely or never bring loss; and hence there is no drawback on the compounding of interest. The fact is notorious that, of the Philadelphia families which were rich a century ago, only those remain rich that kept the bulk of their wealth in real estate. No business man can afford—for any long period—to pay two per cent., for money; to demand such high rates is, therefore, not sound policy in the capitalist; and the history of the rich in this or any other city, if traced back for a hundred years, affords abundant proofs of this. It is wiser, believe us, not to "kill the goose that lays the golden eggs."—Philadelphia Ledger.

CALMNESS.

There is a calm the poor in spirit know,
That softens sorrow, and that sweetens woe;
There is a peace that dwells within the breast,
When all without is stormy and distress;
There is a light that glids the darkest hour;
When dangers thicken, and when tempests lower;
That calm is faith, and hope and love is given;
That peace remains when all beside is risen;
That light shines down to man direct from heaven.
JAMES EDMISTON.

ONE YEAR AGO.

BY E. L. RUTLEDGE.

One year ago to-day! 'Tis sorrow's hand
That lies so chill and damp upon my heart—
O God, would I had passed that envious strand,
The woful hour that saw her soul depart!
The moonlight glimmers o'er the forest mound
Where they have hidden my life's light from me—
Thou, e'en the flowers are dim, their colors drowned
In the rich tears of night, shed piteously
For one who loved her, but too tenderly.

I see the blue eyes, moist with love's dear light—
I kiss the red lips in my idle sleep—
I see the ripples of the hair so bright,
Kissing a brow, for angels' kisses meet.
I live a life of hopeless, eager pain—
I clasp my hands in agonizing prayer,
That God may pity me, and take again
This worthless life, whose best hope is despair!
Whose gayest wreath—the buds and blooms of care!

THE FRATRICIDE:

—OR,—

SPIRITUALISM IN THE OLDEN TIME.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

"FUDGE!" exclaimed a testy old gentleman at a friendly party one evening, after a long discussion respecting the late controversy between the "Spiritualists" and the learned professors of Harvard University. "Ghosts? Fudge!"

"Nevertheless," observed a remarkably quiet-looking individual, who had hitherto taken no part in the conversation, "nevertheless, a belief in supernatural visitations does not appear to me to be inconsistent with the exercise of reason. I could tell a story apropos to the subject, if I chose."

"For heaven's sake!" said the company, in a breath; "let us hear it." And the testy old gentleman chimed in with: "It will go hard with me, if I do not account for your marvels by natural causes."

"You shall judge," rejoined the quiet-looking personage. "All I ask is, that you do not interrupt me in my recital. The story was related to me very many years ago."

Then silently collecting his thoughts for a few moments, he thus proceeded:

"The person from whose lips I received the following details was named Bertram. He was a man of very eccentric habits, and like the celebrated Count Cagliostro, was well versed in optical delusions which he produced by means of mirrors—magic mirrors, as they were called before the science of optics was as well understood as it now is. Bertram travelled for some time through the southern States of Europe, and during his stay in Florence, became acquainted with Francis Wallscourt, the only surviving son of Lord Wallscourt, an English nobleman of ancient family, who being a Roman Catholic, preferred living in a country where Protestantism dared not lift its head. This young man became so interested in the occult sciences studied by Bertram, that he passed much of his time in his society, and finally induced him to visit his father, Lord Wallscourt, at his palazzo, where he had lived in almost monastic seclusion since the loss of his eldest son, who had been torn from the bosom of his family in the most afflicting and inexplicable manner.

"Lord Wallscourt's family had consisted of two sons, the youngest of whom (Francis Wallscourt) had originally been destined for the church, in order that the undivided wealth and estates of that noble house might be settled upon his elder brother Charles, that being one of the conditions upon which depended his marriage with Chylena Montmorenci, an orphan heiress to whom he had been betrothed while they were both children. By an unusual and a happy chance, so strong a sympathy sprang up between Chylena and Charles, that they were lovers while they were yet children, and would mutually have chosen each other, even if their parents had not decided upon their union. After three years' travel, Francis returned home, and preparations for the solemnization of the nuptials were at once commenced. All that was noblest in Florence had been invited to assist at the ceremony, and a succession of fetes were to follow it, when, the day but one before that appointed for the marriage, Charles suddenly disappeared, and was seen no more!

"Since his return, he had been in the habit of going almost every evening to Lord Wallscourt's villa, that he might superintend the preparations that were in progress for the reception of his bride, who was to pass the first days of their marriage in that beautiful retreat with him. On the evening of his disappearance, he had proceeded thither as usual; but the night passed away, and he did not return to Florence—the morning came, and still he was absent. Expresses were sent in all directions in search of him but in vain. None of his attendants had accompanied him to the villa; those of Lord Wallscourt who remained in permanence had seen him depart, as usual—and this was all that was ever known on the subject.

"To describe the consternation and despair into which the young bride and the whole of the Wallscourt family were plunged, when hour after hour passed away, and no trace could be discovered of the lost young man, would be impossible. On the day following his disappearance, it became known that a piratical schooner had been seen off the coast on the fatal evening, and that some of the crew had landed in a boat and carried off several of the inhabitants of those shores. Lord Wallscourt immediately ordered his fast-sailing vessels to be equipped and sent in pursuit, and Francis insisted in embarking in one of them. But a violent gale of wind dispersed the little squadron—the vessel in which was Francis putting into a neighboring port for shelter. There they heard that a piratical corsair had been lost, with all on board, on the preceding day. This intelligence was but too well calculated to extinguish all rational hopes of the young man's yet surviving; yet still an immense reward was offered for his discovery, dead or living.

"Nearly three years were spent in unavailing researches, and they were at length forced to resign themselves to the belief that if the ocean had not buried in its unfathomable depths the object of their painful solicitude, he must have fallen a victim to the barbarous treatment of the pirates, and perished in their hands.

"The destinies of Francis were materially altered by the death of his brother; for as he by that event became the sole heir of the Wallscourt family, he was emancipated from the life of celibacy to which the ecclesiastical profession would have doomed him, and it became the absorbing wish of Lord Wallscourt that the hand of Chylena should be transferred to his surviving son, and that the union of the two families, which had been decided upon for so many years, should be thus ratified. One person alone distinctly objected to this substitution—and that person was the fair young mourner, whose widowed heart recoiled with horror from the idea of breaking its faith to the lost Charles.

"Francis, although captivated by the beauty and virtues of the young heiress, and sensitively alive to all the advantages of such an alliance, refused, with a noble generosity which did honor to his feelings, to press his suit with her, as soon as he became aware of her strong objection to another marriage. He even carried his disinterestedness so far as to advocate her cause against himself with his family, and with her guardians, and generously protected her against the solicitations with which they persecuted her.

"'Chylena is right,' he would often say; 'who knows but that my brother still lives? Could I, after co-operating in so culpable a transaction, dare to raise my voice to Heaven and supplicate for his restoration to us? And if, indeed, he no longer exists, how can we better honor his memory than by abstaining from filling up the void which his death has left amongst us—by sacrificing all our hopes in his tomb—by respecting as sacred all that ever belonged to him?'

"In spite of these sentiments, all Francis could obtain from Lord Wallscourt was that he should refrain from molesting Chylena for another year, during which time he continued his researches for his lost brother with unabated ardor, but with no happy result. As for Chylena, touched by the delicacy of Francis's conduct towards her, she felt herself constrained to admire and respect the man she could not love, and insensibly a tender pity succeeded in her bosom to the profound indifference she had previously evinced for him. She could not remain blind to the extent of his passion for her, and every fresh sacrifice of his dearest wishes to her peace of mind was eagerly advanced by Lord Wallscourt as a motive for softening the inflexibility of her resolves.

"It was at this particular stage of the affair that Bertram appeared at Florence, and was invited by Francis to visit Lord Wallscourt at his villa. The presence of the stranger there formed an interesting epoch in the existence of the melancholy circle. His acquirements were varied and captivating; the mysticism with which his conversation was tinged, and vague hints darkly thrown out of supernatural powers exercised by him—powers that would bring him into communion with beings of another world—invested him with a sort of solemn interest in their eyes. He soon divined their characters—entered into their individual feelings—became the confidant of each—and gradually acquired a dominion over the minds of all for which it would have been difficult for them to account. Lord Wallscourt, especially, whose mental powers had become weakened by grief, succumbed to the influence exercised by this extraordinary man, and unresistingly admitted the mysterious influences thrown out by him of an intercourse with supernatural agencies; Bertram became his oracle—and the heart of the bereaved father thrilled with an awful hope that, through his ministry, the fate of his lost son might be revealed to him.

"At last he ventured to give utterance to those hopes, and one day besought his new friend—besought him to exert his powers, in order to throw some light upon the inexplicable disappearance of Charles.

"'Although,' said he, 'the Church of Rome brands with the epithets of sorcery and malefice the science you have mastered, I cannot resist the impulse which drives me to brave any contingent penalty, that through your exertions I may obtain some certain insight into a mystery which has desolated my domestic happiness. You see the wretched state into which we are all plunged. Chylens's grief has so far yielded to the influence of time, that it has softened into a calm and tender regret, which would ultimately leave her willing to favor the addresses of Francis, could her conscience be satisfied as to the certainty of his brother's death. Francis, on his part, is consuming away—his health and courage sinking under the perpetual struggle to which his feelings are exposed by the intensity of his passion for Chylens, and his respect for her scruples. As for myself, you behold an unfortunate father, whose hopes of living in the children of his children are sacrificed to the dreadful doubt which hangs like a cloud over the fate of one of them. Could that doubt be dispelled, all would be well. Bertram, you understand me; have you the power of raising the veil which conceals the secrets of the world of spirits from the uninitiated?—does your science embrace the possibility of ascertaining whether Charles be alive or dead?—and if so, can you bring home conviction to the minds of those so deeply interested in knowing the truth?

"Bertram fearlessly assured him that he could. Scarcely was this interview over, when Francis, unconscious of the conversation which had just passed, sought his friend, and flinging himself into an arm chair with every gesture of despair, exclaimed:

"Bertram, I can bear this no longer! I must quit the spot—I must leave my country!"

"Gracious heaven!" exclaimed Bertram. "What has happened?"

"My friend—my dear friend," replied the young man, "in vain have I struggled against my love for Chylens! it has overcome my fiercest resolution to smother it within my own bosom. Every day increases the intensity of my feelings, and if I remain longer here, I shall not be able to resist persecuting her with the expression of them."

"Be assured," said Bertram, "that the heart of the lady will at last pronounce itself in your favor; and that she will yield to the wishes of your friends and bestow her heart upon you."

"Never!" cried Francis; "never, as long as she retains a vestige of hope that Charles still lives!"

"You believe, then, that an awful certainty would decide her?" inquired Bertram. "And what if I tell you that it would be possible for me to bring that certainty home to her conviction?"

"What do you mean?" exclaimed Francis, hastily, and fixing his eyes with terrified surprise upon the countenance of his friend.

"I mean," was the answer, "that it is possible to compel the disembodied spirit to appear once more on earth; and if ever terrestrial interests could warrant the peace of the tomb being thus invaded, it would be in a case like the present, where the tranquillity of so many persons depends upon the truth being fully established."

"No, no!" exclaimed Francis, shuddering, and turning to a deathlike paleness; "I cannot countenance so impious a measure! In the name of heaven, say no more of it, Bertram! Let me still be the victim! Destined from my earliest infancy to be sacrificed to my brother's aggrandizement and happiness, let me to the last fulfil my melancholy doom!" And hiding his face in his hands, he wept bitterly.

"Bertram reasoned long and eloquently with Francis upon his scruples; and giving him as last to understand that the experiment which he proposed would be merely a pious fraud, intended to bring certainty to the minds of Lord Walscourt and Chylens (by convincing them through an optical delusion of the reality of that melancholy termination to Charles's existence, which had long since ceased to be a doubt to all but to those two persons), he succeeded in obtaining his adhesion to the plan he meditated. But it was necessary, also, to obtain that of Chylens; and Bertram found that to be the most difficult part of his undertaking. At last, upon receiving from him a solemn assurance that if her betrothed lover still lived, the conjuration would produce no result, a reluctant assent was wrung from her, and only granted in the lingering hope that the failure of Bertram's experiment would give weight to the fond expectation of once more beholding the living Charles, and authorize her to persist in preserving inviolate the faith she had plighted to her first and only love."

"As soon as the unanimous consent of the family had been obtained, Bertram required that a delay of several days should be granted to him, in order to prepare for the great undertaking. During his stay at the villa, he had had ample opportunity of making himself master of every detail relative to the appearance and manner of the unfortunate Charles. A full-length portrait of him, which had been finished but a few days previous to his disappearance, enabled the adept to impart to the shadowy vision, which he was preparing, the closest resemblance to the ill-fated youth; and the supposed manner of his death decided him as to the way in which he should represent that catastrophe to have happened.

"At the expiration of ten days, Bertram's preparations were terminated, and he announced that in the evening the mysterious question was to be resolved. Fasting, prayers, and vigils, added to the mystical communications of the necromancer, had produced the desired effect upon the minds of his friends; wound up to a state of fanatical credulity in his own powers, the emotions they evinced ended by inflaming his own imagination, and the state of nervous excitement to which he was roused, contributed powerfully to the illusion which he wished to produce.

"In the dimly-lighted chamber of their guest, the lower end of which was buried in shadow, the Wallacourt family were assembled. Bertram had neglected nothing that was likely to add to the mysterious horror of the scene that was to be enacted; an Æolian harp (a then little known invention) had been placed outside one of the windows, and the wild, unearthly tones it gave forth, as the night wind swept across its strings, seemed to the trembling listeners to be the wailings of spirits in purgatory. They drew more closely together, and Bertram, stepping forth from the group, in a solemn voice adjured the spirit of the departed Charles to appear to them and reveal the manner in which death had overtaken him.

"Scarcely had the words been pronounced, when a blue and ghastly light partially illuminated the obscure end of the chamber, and discovered a large mirror from the surface of which a dense mist slowly rolled away and revealed to the astonished gazers the form of Charles Wallacourt, clothed in the identical dress which he had worn on the night of his disappearance—his hands heavily fettered, and water streaming from his head and garments, as he lay stretched in utter lifelessness on the sea shore! While their eyes, as though fascinated with horror, remained fixed upon the apparition, the surge appeared to roll slowly over it and bear it away to its ocean-grave. The mist again spread over the surface of the mirror, and all was darkness. Not a word had been uttered during this strange scene; breathless silence had attested to the awe with which it had pervaded the minds of the unhappy family; but at the termination of it, a cry of anguish burst from the lips of the heart-stricken Chylena, and she fainted.

"A dangerous illness was the consequence of the painful emotions she had endured on the evening of Bertram's exhibition of his supposed unearthly powers; but from that date, no further doubt remained upon her mind as to the fate of her lover, and to the fluctuating hopes which had so long tortured her, succeeded a calm resignation which betokened at no very distant period a still happier and brighter state of feeling.

"Meantime the Wallscourt family publicly attested to their belief in the death of Charles, by going into mourning for him; masses were said for the repose of his soul; and finally, Francis assumed his brother's title. Bertram had quitted Italy shortly after his successful stratagem, and was about to return to his home, when he received a letter from Francis inviting him to return immediately to Florence, that he might be present at his marriage with Chylena, and witness an event which he had been so instrumental in bringing to pass.

"Bertram lost no time in obeying the summons, but he did not reach Florence until the eve of the day on which the nuptials were to take place; and as Chylena had expressed a desire that the ceremony should be solemnized in Lord Wallscourt's villa, in the presence only of the nearest relatives of the two families, and that it should be followed by no rejoicings save a feast given to the tenantry, in order to distinguish it from the courtly splendors that had been prepared for her first bridal, Bertram proceeded directly to the villa, and arrived there just in time to accompany his friend to the altar.

"The noble pleasure-grounds and gardens had been thrown open to the numerous peasantry belonging to Lord Wallscourt's relatives, and the lovely young bride, leaning on the arm of the happy Francis, whose countenance was radiant with an expression of triumphant love, mingled with the gay throng, receiving their respectful felicitations and acknowledging them with graceful affability. After the ball had ended, a plentiful repast was served in the great hall of the villa, to which all the rustic guests were indiscriminately admitted, as well as the various strangers who had come to witness the rejoicings. Among these latter, the noble hosts had remarked a person whose presence seemed ill-suited to the joyful occasion, for he wore a dress peculiar to one of those confraternities which abound in the southern States of Italy, and whose members, in observance of a vow, devote themselves to attending condemned malefactors to the place of execution—a dress which not only effectually conceals the countenance of the individual wearing it, but imposes a solemn prohibition against his being spoken to—I mean the habit of a Gray Penitent. The ghastly fashion of the garb—the long, shapeless robe of livid gay, loosely shrouding a form of almost shadowy fineness—the close capachia, covering the head and face, with two holes cut for the eyes, which invested it with the character of a death's head—contrasted strangely with the gay holiday dresses of the peasantry and the more costly elegance of the bridal party, and forcing upon the imagination images of suffering and death, caused the hearts of all to sink with apprehension. This vague terror was more particularly experienced by Chylena and Francis, whose glances were, despite of themselves, strangely fascinated toward the unwelcome visitant, and each time that they gazed upon him, they beheld his lack-lustre eyes intently fixed upon them.

"At last, towards midnight, the crowd dispersed, the orchestra became silent, the tables in the banqueting-hall were abandoned by their late merry occupants, and nobody remained there but the immediate family of the bride and bridegroom, Bertram, and the Gray Penitent (who had remained immovably fixed in the recess of a window, having by signs declined sharing in the banquet).

"My children," said Lord Wallscourt, looking at the young couple with glistening eyes, "the fondest wish of my heart is realized by your union, and my gray hairs will now descend peacefully to the grave. My friends," he continued, turning to his guests, "before we retire, let us drink to the happiness of Chylena and Francis!"

"At these words, the Gray Penitent emerged from the recess where he had remained half-concealed by the draperies of the window-curtain, and advancing with measured, noiseless steps towards the table, seized upon one of the flowing goblets which had just been filled, and raised it to a level with his lips.

"Have you no other name to pledge?" said he, in hollow accents. "And Charles Wallscourt—where is he?"

"Lord Wallscourt started at this allusion to his dead son, and an expression of sadness overclouded his countenance, as he replied:

"Alas! my beloved Charles is lost to us forever on earth. You do not seem to be aware, reverend stranger, that he has been taken from us to that world from whence there is no return!"

"And yet," continued the stranger, in the same accents, "if the last voice that vibrated in his ear could now be heard, he would not remain deaf to the call! Old man, bid thy son Francis call upon his brother's name!"

"What does he mean?" murmured the affrighted group; while Francis, pale as death, grasped the arm of Bertram for support, and Chylena leaned, half-fainting, upon the shoulder of her father-in-law.

"Who pledges me?" resumed the terrible stranger, looking round. "To the memory of Charles! and let all those who loved him follow my example." And he raised the goblet to his lips.

"Whoever you may be, reverend penitent," said Lord Wallscourt, in a tremulous voice, "you have pronounced a name which has ensured you a welcome here. Approach, my friends—let us not be outdone by a stranger; let us all drink to the memory of our beloved Charles!"

"And at this appeal, the glasses were raised with trembling hands to the lips of all present, with one exception, and replaced empty upon the table.

"There still remains one full goblet," said the Penitent; 'tis that of Francis—wherefore does he not drink to the memory of his brother?"

"He held the wine cup towards him. Francis shrank back from the invitation pale and trembling, his forehead covered with cold drops of agony, his eyes wildly dilated; but a gesture of entreaty from his father seemed to overcome his repugnance, and seizing the goblet from the hand of the Gray Penitent, he stammered forth—"To the memory of my dear Charles!" and replaced it upon the table untouched.

"'Tis the voice of my assassin!" exclaimed the Gray Penitent, in an accent which thrilled all present with horror; and tearing open his garments, the cowl fell back from his head and revealed the well-remembered lineaments of the unfortunate Charles, stamped with the ghastly characteristic of death—the breast and throat perforated with gaping wounds.

"At this horrid spectacle, all those whom terror had not transfixed to the spot, fled shrieking from the hall; and Bertram, who for the first time beheld the realization of that which his arts had so often simulated, fell to the ground in a swoon.

"When he recovered his senses, the phantom had disappeared, the guests had dispersed, and he found himself stretched upon a couch in his own room, with his servant watching beside him."

* * * * *

Here the testy old gentleman, who during the previous recital had been smoking very assiduously, laid down his pipe and interrupted his friend.

"Do you not think it possible," he inquired, "that your necromancer, Mr. Bertram, might have exceeded the bounds of temperance at the wedding supper, and that the apparition of the Gray Penitent was conjured up from the fumes of the wine?"

"He would fain have believed so," was the reply; "but the state into which the unfortunate Francis was thrown, deprived him of the possibility of a doubt. A prey to the most horrible convulsions, the unhappy bridegroom only recovered his consciousness to ask for a confessor, with whom he remained shut up for several hours. What passed between them never transpired, for the seal of confession is sacred, and Francis, who never arose from the bed to which he had been carried from the banqueting-hall on that fatal night, expired without proffering a word to any other human being. The old lord did not long survive him, and bequeathed the whole of his possessions to the virgin bride of his two sons."

"And what became of her?"

"She founded a convent. In laying the foundation of a chapel, an old dry well, the entrance to which had been bricked up for several years, was discovered, and from its depths was drawn forth the skeleton of a man bearing upon the third finger of his left hand the gold alliance with which Charles Wallscourt had been betrothed to Chylena Montmorenci!"

"Umph!" ejaculated the testy old gentleman. "Take notice! I do not attempt to dispute the fact of the murder, but I take up my position against the genuineness of the ghost. That Francis murdered his brother, I look upon as an undisputed fact; two strong motives impelled him—first to save himself from becoming a priest, and lastly that he might marry a beautiful young heiress with whom he had fallen in love. It is natural to suppose that he confessed his crime to his spiritual director; and my opinion is, that that reverend personage, disapproving of the marriage, and not daring to prevent it by betraying the secrets of confession to the family of the delinquent, enacted the part of the ghost that he might terrify the conscience of the murderer into an avowal of his crime."

The quiet-looking gentleman who had told the story, said nothing, but quietly re-filled his meerschaum and smoked on in silence.

Not all the pleasure that kind looks or that kind words give, or have given in life can balance the pain that reproachful eyes occasion—eyes that have become sealed over with that leaden seal which lifts not; how they pierce one by day time, and more dreadfully by night—through and through! Words slip and are forgotten; but looks, reproachful looks, frightened looks, make up all that is terrible in dreams.—Fresh Gleanings.

THE DYING CALIFORNIAN TO HIS MOTHER

BY MRS. E. S. ANDREWS.

Mother, I am dying now,
Life's tide is ebbing fast,
The death-damp gathers on my brow;
Soon, soon I shall have passed
The sea upon whose darkling wave
I dread to launch my bark;
There's something fearful in the grave,
So dreary, cold and dark.

O, mother, it is hard to die,
Untimely, and so young;
So soon beneath the clod to lie,
Of good so little done.
But, mother, of thy counsels kind
I've not unmindful been;
I've shunned the haunts of vice and crime,
Debauchery and sin.

But I could life's dear joys resign,
Almost could welcome death,
Could I but in thy arms recline,
To yield my latest breath;
Could I but hear thy blessing now,
In life's dissolving hour,
Or feel thy soft touch on my brow,
E'en death might lose its power.

To daunt my spirit, as I near
The last convulsive throes;
O, would, my mother, thou wert here
To soothe my hour of woe;
When this hath reached you I shall be Beyond the reach of pain;
O, mother, do not weep for me,
Since we shall meet again.

THE TRAPPER'S BRIDE.

BY MAURICE SILLINGSBY.

"I don't think I ever told you," said James Colter, clearing his throat with a swallow of whiskey, and passing over the long Dutch pipe he had been smoking, to his particular crony, Si. Buffer—"I don't think I ever told you, boys, about an adventure I once had with the Indians, and how I subsequently came into possession of an Indian wife."

"You never told me!" said Tom Sloper.

"Nor me!" granted Buckeye, taking an additional pull at the whiskey jug.

"Divil a word at all did I ever hear from yes concerning that same," echoed Mike Flinn, who was engaged in turning the spit upon which a choice bit of buffalo's rump was simmering and sputtering, and filling our hungry nostrils with its agreeable aroma.

We were all seated around the camp-fire, seven of us in number, and each one of us was ready and even anxious to be entertained with a good story, as there was a drizzling rain without, and the long evening before us promised to be unusually dull.

"Well, then, boys, I don't mind telling it," responded Colter, crossing his legs before the fire, and leaning his elbow against a log. "As long ago as the Miami Valley was first beginning to be explored by hunters and trappers, and before anything like civilization had planted itself in that unfrequented region, I started one fine morning in the latter part of October, on a trapping excursion up the Miami River. There was no one with me but Tom Hinniker—you all remember Tom Hinniker, or at least some of you do—he was the most perfect wizard in all matters of wood-craft I ever knew; the Lord preserve him, poor fellow, though he has been food for worms these ten years. Well, as I was saying, we started up the Miami, Tom and I, carrying our traps, tent-cloth, and cooking utensils on a pack-mule. For four or five days we journeyed on, keeping the river constantly in view, before we discovered any very promising indications of that most knowing of animals, the beaver. The ingenuity of man does not excel their's in the erection of dams and houses, and such like handiwork, when you take into consideration what sort of implements they have to do with, which are nothing under the sun but the creature's tails and paws."

"Arrah! an' is it so? Upon me sowl, thin, an' isn't it the most wond'herful thing that they should be afther building houses with their tails?" queried Mike, who had just given a finishing turn to the spit, and had consequently caught the closing remark entire. "An' that bates everything in the ould country—and troth, I am sure of it!"

"Never mind the old country, Mike; you've done with that long ago," said Tom Sloper. "It's the new we are on now."

"An' faith it is; and I know that well," responded Mike, "without yez iver speaking a word."

"Well, boys, if you've done with your blarney," interposed Colter, "I'll proceed. But I don't want to be interrupted every two minutes, because it's unpleasant. Well, as I was saying, after four or five days, we come in sight of a spacious cove that spread out from a bend in the river. On examination it proved to be but a small stream emptying itself into the Miami, but dammed only a few rods above where it naturally effected its confluence with the main current, so as to give it at a distance the appearance of a cove.

"We wanted no better indications, so we just threw down our traps, cut a stout sapling for a tent pole, and went to work. For two or three days we were very busy making preparations by which we might successfully invade the territory of our fuzzy neighbors. One morning while we were scudding along the shore on a temporary raft we had constructed, we were suddenly surprised in the middle of our labors by the appearance of a war party of Indians. They were about twenty in number, and I learned, subsequently, that they had just made an attack upon one of the pioneer settlements which, proving too strong for them, they were driven back with considerable loss. Under these circumstances it could not be expected they would cherish any very amiable feelings towards such persons as claimed relationship to the pale faces.

"No sooner were we noticed by them, than one of their number, who seemed to be a sort of chief among them, advanced from the main body, till he was within about twenty rods of us, when he paused for an instant, and then began to make motions for us to come on shore. We had no weapons about us, excepting our hunting knives, while the Indians, on the contrary, were all armed with muskets, and no doubt well skilled in the use of them. I turned to Hinniker and asked what was to be done.

"'Give in,' said he; 'what is the use in contending? We had far better go on shore and surrender ourselves as prisoners, which leaves us some slight chance of getting away from our captors, than stand here like mules, and suffer ourselves to be riddled into atoms by their infernal bullets.'

"In any sense our situation was a critical one, but this was the most rational view, certainly, we could have taken, because it admitted of some slight possibility of escape. To oppose them we knew would be certain death; so we quickly headed the raft in the direction of the shore, and made signals that we would surrender without resistance.

"No sooner were we landed than the savages crowded around us, and began stripping us of everything but our shirts, pants and moccasins. Having accomplished this, they next bound our hands securely behind us, and giving us to understand that we must 'march,' started off in a north easterly direction from our camp. For three days, with very little intermission for rest, we continued to move on through the wilderness at a swift pace, closely guarded by our tawny captors. About noon of the fourth day they halted in the centre of a small opening, while one of their number started on at a rapid trot in advance of the main body. We had now arrived within about six miles of their encampment, and the Indian who had gone on in advance, was sent to herald the triumphal approach of the returning war-party, in order to insure them a suitable reception. Before coming within a mile of the village, we could distinctly hear the confused sounds of rejoicing; and on arriving in sight, we could see that they were making ready for us to run the gantlet, a conviction which had no tendency to strengthen our drooping spirits.

"Well, as we came nearer, they set up a most diabolical shout—a sort of compound whoop and yell—and fell to capering about in the most extravagant manner, twirling their sticks and war-clubs in the air, and beating the ground with the most vehement and vindictive gestures. By the time we had arrived on the ground, they had formed themselves into lines, and were impatiently awaiting the moment when they might flay us alive, if we should prove slow footed enough to allow them that tender gratification. In running the gantlet among the Indians, the possession of a pair of light heels is of the utmost importance. I have known of instances where a quick runner has succeeded in passing through the entire lines without receiving a single blow which amounted to so much as a scratch; but those cases are rare. Hinniker and I were both middling light of foot, but before they were done with us, we were hardly able to crawl. There was one pretty young squaw in the ranks who seemed to commiserate our situation very much, for she made no attempt whatever to injure us as we passed, though we, or, rather I, learned afterward that she had been recently married to one of the young warriors who had fallen in their late conflict with the whites.

"After running the gantlet, we were conducted to one of the wigwams, while the warriors of the tribe held solemn council to deliberate in what manner we should be put to death. As we lay in this awful plight, bruised and despairing, and expecting every moment to be dragged forth to torture, we saw the form of the handsome young squaw moving stealthily towards us. When she came near enough, she made a signal for us to be silent, and then whispered very softly: 'Be no afraid—me like white man—me save you!' And without uttering another word, she glided cautiously out of the wigwam.

"Through all that long and wearisome night (the longest I ever knew), we lay groaning in anguish, and but for the cheering words of the young squaw, I might have likewise added, despair. The dull, heavy pain of our bruises, the sharp, excruciating torture of the prongs, which confined our wrists, and penetrated through the flesh like so many needles, kept us awake till the noise and confusion on the outside, and the few faint streaks of light straggling in through the chinks and apertures of our prison, convinced us that another day had at length dawned. For a couple of hours longer we continued to sit in moody silence, listening to the increasing clamor without, and feeling that the moment of torture was approaching very near at hand. Once, only, was our solitude disturbed, and then by a hideous old squaw, bearing in her shrivelled and besmeared fingers some small bits of the very toughest venison. About eight o'clock, as near as I could guess from the situation of the sun, the Indians came in a body to the wigwam, and striking the prongs from my wrists, led me forth. Hinniker was left behind, though I felt certain, poor fellow, that his turn would come next; for these red fiends, when once they have scented blood, are like so many famished wolves, ready to devour everything before them. In a moment my eye took in the scene, by which I could not avoid fully understanding their intentions. In front of the wigwams, which were built in a sort of semi circular opening, skirting the forest in the rear, was a wide open clearing, in the centre of which were heaped up several cords of dried limbs and fagots. From the centre of this pile rose a stout sapling, peeled quite bare from the lower limbs downward. The purpose for which it was intended would have been obvious enough to a person less experienced than myself in the cruelties and monstrosities of savage life. It was too evidently the intention of the fiends to torture us by every process of cruelty known to them, till such time as we could no longer endure their torments, when they would doubtless, for want of better amusement, wind up the horrors of the hour, by burning us at the stake.

"After being removed from the wigwam, I was dragged forth, amid shouts and whoops of exultation, to the place of torture. On reaching the ground, four of the savages hideously painted came forth from the ranks, and seizing me by the body, bore me to the top of the pyre, where they at length succeeded in firmly lashing me to the stake. Had it not been for the strong confidence which I had previously placed in the encouraging promise of the young squaw, I should have been at this moment utterly without hope. I knew that when the Indians, as a race, had once given their word, they had rarely been known to break it; but in what manner my deliverance was to be effected, I did not, and could not conjecture. To say, even, that I entertained more than the faintest glimmering of hope, just then, would be affirming something which was certainly very foreign to my feelings. At this critical point and just as they were preparing to force into my quivering flesh those sharp splinters of pitch-wood, which gave such excruciating torture to the victim, I saw the handsome young squaw elbowing her way through the crowd towards me. O, how beautiful she looked at that moment. In my eyes she seemed little short of an angel sent down from heaven to rescue me from an army of fiends. To judge from the manner the painted savages made room for her, she was a person of no small importance among them. Whether on account of her great beauty, for Nanoma was beautiful in spite of her Indian blood, or in consequence of her birth, for I reasoned she might perhaps be the daughter of a chief, I had certainly no means of determining. When she reached the spot where I was confined, she waved off the savages with an imperious gesture, and then turning her resolute gaze full upon the wondering faces of the assembled chiefs, she spoke to them as follows, although, of course, she expressed herself in the jargon peculiar to her tribe. She explained to them that no one had experienced so great a loss as herself in the late disastrous encounter with the whites, for she had lost her husband in the conflict, a handsome and brave young chief, and she was lonely—very lonely without him. Therefore she had resolved on taking the white prisoner to fill his place, that he might cheer the solitude of her wigwam. It was no boon she asked; it was only a privilege based on the ancient usages of her tribe.

"There was a murmur of admiration from some, and of disapprobation from others. At length one of the younger chiefs came forward, and went through with a great variety of astonishing feats, whooping every two seconds in the wildest and most unaccountable manner, when he gradually commenced cooling down, and began talking to the fair Nanoma at last, in something resembling a set speech. In the first instance he had been boasting of his great prowess, by a sort of pantomime peculiar to the savages; and in the second, had offered to make Nanoma his wife, if she would but give up her extravagant notion concerning me, and consent to my being burned. Nanoma listened with flashing eyes till he was through, and then, raising her fair form proudly erect, she hurled back her refusal with a look of utter scorn. The discomfited young chief, who had doubtless imagined an easy conquest to himself, slunk quickly out of sight, amid the gibes and jeers of the multitude.

"Nanoma then turned to me, and with a single blow from the tomahawk which she held, she severed the green walnut withes with which my wrists were confined. We next descended from the pyre, and with the approbation of the head chief, instead of being burned to death, as was intended, I became the devoted spouse of Nanoma. The marriage ceremony I will omit.

"In thus having one of their victims snatched from them at a moment when they had anticipated a far different result, it only made them the more fierce for the destruction of Hinniker. I saw them rush for the wigwam like so many infuriated demons. I strained my eyes, expecting the next moment to see him dragged forth and put to the most dreadful torture. When they re-appeared, however, Hinniker was not with them. For an instant they seemed bewildered; then a loud yell of angry disappointment succeeded, and several of them struck off into the woods in various directions.

"Nanoma glanced up pleasantly into my face, and murmured in a low tone, audible only to myself: 'Me like you; me save big white man!'

"I subsequently learned that while the attention of the savages was directed towards me, Nanoma had crept into the wigwam, unobserved, and had succeeded in setting Hinniker at liberty. For several days the savages scoured the forest in all directions, but the wily trapper was too old in wood-craft to be caught napping; and they were obliged at length to give up the idea of his recovery in despair. But they never suspected how he obtained his liberty. In the meantime, I was becoming quite a favorite among the Indians, and after a few weeks they ceased altogether to observe my movements. I taught them a great many useful things for which they certainly appeared grateful.

"Every day Nanoma seemed to grow more devotedly attached to me. In truth she was a noble souled, high-minded woman; and could I have remained content among the Indians, she would have been my choice above all women I ever knew. But somehow I thirsted and panted to be back again among the whites. It was a species of captivity I was undergoing, and I longed, in spite of my increasing affection for Nanoma, to break down the barrier which restrained me, and make my final escape to the settlement. During the six months I remained among them, I taught them many valuable secrets, as regarded hunting and trapping, of which they were entirely ignorant. In all my hunting and fishing excursions, my Indian wife was my constant companion; she could not bear to be separated from me for a moment; although it was not from any suspicion of my deserting her, as the sequel will show. Nanoma was not only noble and affectionate by nature, but she was a woman of unusual intellect and penetration. She discovered from the first that I was ill at ease, and, happily, with her clear discernment she attributed my uneasiness to its real cause. She saw me growing thinner daily; she saw me sit, sometimes for hours, gazing towards the east, and then she would creep to my side with all the yearning tenderness of her soul, and entwine her arms around my neck. She never wept; it was not her Indian way of expressing sympathy, but she would glue her lips to mine, and then gaze deep into my eyes, with such a pitiful, endearing look, as though she would fain take unto herself a portion of the misery which was weighing me down. She learned to speak English very readily, and soon became much interested in everything I described, as appertaining to civilized life. I explained to her that the race to which I belonged had a method of communicating their thoughts by means of certain characters which they called the alphabet. A new idea seemed to strike Nanoma, and springing to her feet, with a sudden flourish of intelligence kindling in her eye, she darted from my side and out of the wigwam. In a few minutes she returned, bearing a thin and much soiled pamphlet in her hand, with the significant title of 'Quill Thrusts,' by 'Peter Porcupine.'

"'Them no um?' she said, inquiringly, pointing out the big capitals on the fly leaf.

"'Yes, dear Noma,' answered I—I always took advantage of the abbreviation in addressing her—'those are the characters to which I alluded. She seemed very much pleased and happy after this, and insisted I should read aloud to her, which I did, though she could not understand the meaning very clearly, of course. I think, however, she caught some faint idea of what the writer intended to convey, as she wound her arms softly around my neck, and followed me over the page with her bright, intelligent eyes. As for me, the sight of the printed page was like manna to the famishing traveller in the wilderness; like the visitation of some dearly beloved face in a foreign land. I discovered, on questioning Nanoma, that the pamphlet had been taken from the pocket of some white man, whom the Indians had slain, and had since been preserved as a curiosity by one of the chiefs.

"Day after day—with the pamphlet in my hand—and week after week, I became the wise teacher, and Nanoma the earnest and interested pupil; but in spite of all this, and of the wealth of affection lavished upon me by this untutored heroine of the wilds, I grew paler, dailier, and more mopish and melancholy. She observed the slightest change, and would often sigh, and sometimes hang upon my neck for hours; but I could not muster sufficient hardihood to think of taking an Indian wife into the settlements. The image of my father—a learned judge—and of my brother—an ambitious and rising lawyer—rose up before me, and crushed down the better promptings of the heart. Nanoma seemed to comprehend all this as if by intuition, and daily she seemed nerving herself for some great sacrifice of which I was yet ignorant. One morning she arose very early, and laying out a large stock of provision for me to carry, desired me to go with her on a journey. We accordingly started and travelled in a south-easterly direction till after the sun reached its meridian (Nanoma remaining all the while stoically silent and taciturn), when she suddenly paused, gazed at me wistfully for a moment, and then said, addressing me in measured and distinct words:

"'Me save you first; me no kill you now. Go, my white love, dear to Nanoma as a thousand lives; but she no kill her life, for then she no have it; she give you up! Go! go!'

"She waved me from her with a hurried and irresolute gesture. I lingered for a moment, and reached out my arms towards her. She hesitated, came forward a step, and then, as if suddenly sensible of what she was doing, she fairly shrieked out the word—'Go!' and fled from me with the speed of the wind. It was the last time I ever saw her, though I received a message from her in less than two years after; but that message—I have it still; I shall always keep it till I die;—brought only her loving, dying words, and showed me what a wretch I had been. Her letter—here it is, I will read it in a moment—was written on the fly-leaf of the old pamphlet, and given into my hand by a young Indian who disappeared from my sight without a single comment or word. This is it:

"'To James Colter of Ohio: My true white love, when you see this, Nanoma will not be live no more; but she will be go to the spirit-land, blessing her white love all the way.
NANOMA.'"

We all looked at the letter, for the trapper's story had invested it with unusual interest. The chirography was plain and easily deciphered, being a fair imitation of the printed letter. I glanced at the trapper as I handed back the precious memento, and I fancied I detected a tear lurking in the corner of his eye; but, with an impatient movement, he brushed it hastily away, and soon after relapsed into his habitual immobility.

Strong passions work wonders when there is stronger reason to curb them.

THE OLD HOUSE.

BY HATTIE BOOMER.

We have shut up the dear old house to-day,
And tied up the latch with a string—
But ere I have turned from the loved doorway,
A song in its praise I will sing.

It was the dear home in which I was born,
And though it looks dingy and small—
It was faded by many a pitiless storm,
Through which it has sheltered us all.

The mossy old roof—it has half fallen in—
But O, the bright dreams I have had,
As untroubled beneath it—tucked in to my chin—
I slept in my low cottage-bed.

I cared not for storms—though sometimes a clatter
Forewarned it was not tempest-proof,
And my fancies were sweet, when the rain with soft patter,
Sang a lullaby song on the roof.

The mad, merry romps we have had through this door,
With brothers and sisters at play—
We knew every nail in that old kitchen floor,
And the knots which would always look gray,

Despite of the drubbings which busy hands dealt
If a holiday feast were in store—
When we furnished the rooms—nor a hope ever felt,
Nor a wish to have anything more.

That damask rose there, by the window so low,
Of all our glad summer—the dower—
A mother's dear hands placed it there long ago,
Ah! I well can remember the hour;

It blooms brightly to-day by the sunshine refreshed,
The frost, and the dew, and the rain—
But those laboring hands are now crossed in the rest
Which will never be broken again.

Ah, forgive! but the old house is painfully dear—
I'll not sing its praises to-day,
But drop o'er its beauties an old-fashioned tear,
And turn from its sunshine away.

A PICTURE FOR HUSBANDS.

BY MRS. M. E. ROBINSON.

EVIDENTLY, one of the male sex was expected in Mrs. Barber's cosy sitting-room. A comfortable arm-chair, dressing-gown and slippers, the tea-table, with its acceptable appointments of shining ware, snowy napkins, light bread, yellow butter and delicate cake, showed conclusively that they waited somebody's coming. A contemplated absence of three days had lengthened into a week, bringing neither Mr. Barber nor a letter from Mr. Barber; consequently Mrs. Barber looked slightly anxious, kept a close watch on the clock, peered out of the window into the gathering darkness very often, listened until she imagined all sorts of sounds, and made herself quite miserable by thinking that some horrible accident had befallen the object of her solicitude. Then smiling at her cowardice and nervousness, she drew the curtains closer, lighted the small astral lamp on the mantel, and sat down to watch the blue flame flicker around the glowing coal.

"Good evening, Sue! Why, you look as startled as though I was a ghost, instead of the best friend you have in the world! Pray, hasn't that husband of yours come home yet? No? Then take my advice, and don't brush his coat nor kiss him again for two months. Serve him right for leaving you alone a whole week."

The speaker, Elsie Hunt, a lively, dark-eyed woman, tripped into the room.

"I know you didn't expect me," she chattered on, in the midst of Mrs. Barber's words of welcome; "but I thought I would just run in and show you my presents, and see if you weren't almost frightened to death staying alone in this great house."

"I guess not, Elsie. Don't I look in good bodily and mental condition?" returned Mrs. Barber, trying to smile cheerfully.

"I must admit that I never saw fewer signs of fright in my life; but I'm sure that if my husband should go away and be gone a week, without giving me proper notice of his intentions, I would certainly run away, or fill the house with company."

"My dear friend, you haven't been married a year," said Mrs. Barber, with something like a sigh.

"Heigh ho! I'm not going to borrow trouble yet awhile, I'm sure," returned Mrs. Hunt, seating herself on an ottoman. "Look here! See what Fred brought me from the city to-night; this pretty dress-pattern, and the most beautiful annual of the season. Isn't he a thoughtful husband?"

"They are very handsome, Elsie, and you cannot too highly prize the affection that prompts these tokens of remembrance. We value gifts only as we appreciate the givers."

Lively Mrs. Hunt looked serious, and gazed into the fire in silence for a moment. Steps were heard outside, then in the hall. Mrs. Barber hurried to open the inner door.

"Good evening, Sue; how do you do, Mrs. Hunt?" was Mr. Barber's salutation, as he entered.

He didn't shake hands with his wife, or kiss her. Why should he? Hadn't he been married seven years? It seemed entirely uncalled for—though, by the way, he never needed a hint to perform that delicate operation on lips out of the family, when he could get a good opportunity.

"O John, I'm so glad you've come!" she exclaimed, not heeding this matter-of-fact greeting. "You staid so long, I've been a good deal alarmed about you."

"Yes, Mr. Barber, she has been very anxious about you. I can testify to it," added Mrs. Hunt.

"Which was needless. I have told her repeatedly not to feel any solicitude about me when I am gone. Borrowing trouble is a useless expenditure of feeling," quoth Mr. Barber.

"Well, I don't know how one can help it, under certain circumstances," pursued impulsive Mrs. Hunt. "If I should be left alone so long, I should fret myself into a fever."

"Which would be simply babyish—begging your pardon, my fair neighbor."

Mrs. Hunt shrugged her round shoulders, by way of answer.

While this colloquy was going on, Mr. Barber was getting out of his coat into his dressing-gown—but not unassisted. His wife untied his muffler, received his hat, helped off one thickness of broadcloth and then another, held his wrapper in a convenient position for him to poke his arms into, transported two muddy boots into the kitchen, placed the slippers just under his feet, and wheeled the arm-chair into the warmest corner.

Elsie Hunt noted all these little attentions, and waited patiently for some acknowledgment of them. But she waited in vain; Mr. Barber manifestly regarded them as matters of course, neither by word or look indicating that he was particularly obliged to anybody. Mrs. Hunt bade her friend good night, observed to the occupant of the arm-chair that she hoped he would succeed in making himself comfortable (which remark, however, savored of the sarcastic), and went home to tell what a bear that Barber was, and what a slave Sue made of herself.

"My dear, you shouldn't expect so much of us poor, guileless men. I dare say, now, that Mrs. Barber did nothing more than her duty," good-humoredly returned Mrs. Hunt's stronger half, when his wife had given vent to her indignation in unqualified terms.

"Perhaps not; but then one likes, occasionally, to get credit for doing one's duty," retorted Mrs. Hunt. "Why, if she was a black woman, and he her owner and master, she could not serve him more faithfully than she does."

"Granted, Mistress Elsie! A man is better served by one good wife (mind—I say good), than by six slaves. They can't be expected to take that interest in the nobler part of humanity that women do; we don't expect to find a wife in a domestic. And then," pursued Mr. Hunt, in the same bantering tone, "according to your own showing, Mr. Barber did not require these manifold attentions from his wife."

"But he received them, nevertheless, without a 'thank you!' or a kiss, like a brute as he is! I wonder, Mr. Frederick, how long I should wait upon you in that way, without any acknowledgments? Not more than seven years, I'll warrant—which is precisely the term of apprenticeship that my foolish friend Susan has served to a hard master."

Mrs. Hunt punched the coal violently in the grate, as an escape-valve for her resentment against the luckless Mr. Barber.

Meanwhile, the last-named gentleman toasted his feet to his satisfaction, rubbed his hands complacently in the genial warmth, looked gratified at the picture of comfort the room presented, and then wheeled around to the table and commenced a survey of the eatables before him.

"I don't see any meat," he began, querulously. "I always want meat when I've been travelling. My system requires it."

"I am sorry that I don't happen to have any cooked, John; but if you will wait a few minutes, I will broil a piece of steak for you," replied his wife—to which proposition Mr. Barber acceded at once, affirming that he really did not think he could eat a mouthful without it, meat was so necessary to his constitution.

And so his patient helpmate re-entered her kitchen, to find the fire low and the room uncomfortably cold. After two journeys to the woodshed and a long struggle with the refractory coal (which very nearly refused doing duty at that unusual hour), the process of broiling was finished, and Mrs. Barber, victorious over all obstacles, though flushed and tired with her efforts, bore the expected article of food into the presence of her lord, who, by way of thanks for the favor, protested "that she had been gone long enough to cook a whole dinner."

Mrs. Barber waited upon him as assiduously as if he had been a prince, and, in fact, did everything she could do, except put the food into his mouth. After disposing of an unfashionable quantity of bread, cake, and every vestige of the meat, as well as three cups of tea, Mr. Barber wheeled about again, placed both feet on the top of the stove, and applied himself industriously to puffing smoke out of a roll of tobacco.

Mrs. Barber had no appetite; anxiety and watching had taken away all desire for food. She wanted to know what had happened in her husband's absence; if friends had sent any messages; if he had brought her a souvenir of remembrance—ever so trifling a gift; if his business transactions had been successful; in fine, she wanted to hear what every woman likes (and every man, too)—the news. But she knew—as who does not?—that a hungry man is always cross, and had refrained from asking questions until the momentous business of eating had been accomplished, when she sat down and awaited any communications he might see fit to make.

A long interval of silence succeeded. The clock ticked and the smoke accumulated, yet not a word had been spoken. Mrs. Barber looked wistfully at her husband. He did not like to be questioned, and she knew it. But what was a woman to do? If he wouldn't talk voluntarily, wasn't she justified in trying to coax him to be communicative? She made the attempt.

"Did you have a safe journey, John?"

"It would seem so. I appear in a tolerable state of preservation—do I not?"

"Yes; but did you have a pleasant time?"

"It strikes me that travelling isn't the most agreeable occupation in the world; however, opinions differ about that," answered Mr. Barber, crossing his legs more comfortably, and puffing a large mouthful of smoke dangerously near Mrs. Barber's face.

Now she did not like the smell of cigars; their fumes assailed her and made her head ache. But as the vile habit was so firmly fixed upon him, and he seemed to take such solid satisfaction in making himself unfit for the society of decent human beings, she never opposed him, cheerfully sacrificing self, daily and hourly, at the shrine of tobacco. Perhaps, at this particular time, Mr. Barber did not intend to be impolite; if he did, a good deal of nonchalance accompanied the action. The wife coughed and moved back a little.

"Did you see father and mother?" she continued, with some hesitation.

"Yes."

This brief monosyllable and a column of blue vapor came out of Mr. Barber's mouth together.

"Did they send any message to me?" was the next persevering query.

"Nothing in particular."

"Did you bring the package I sent for?" she resumed, trying to speak cheerfully.

"No."

"Why not, John?"

"Because I forgot it, Mrs. Barber," said her husband, in a voice that betokened entire conviction that he was an ill-used man.

Disappointed, and despairing of eliciting any information out of her close-mouthed husband, Mrs. Barber made no further effort at conversation, but sat and meditated upon this disagreeable phase in his character. Were her questions unreasonable? Were they put when he was cold, or wet, or hungry, or otherwise unfavorably situated? A conscientious negative followed these mental queries.

Mr. Barber was not particularly unamiable or ill disposed. He was simply intensely selfish, and this selfishness was so incorporated into his being, that he had no well-defined idea of how much petty meanness he was capable. Exacting in all that concerned himself, he had very loose and vague ideas of what was due to others. A contemplated absence of two days had, for sufficient reason, lengthened into a week. Mrs. Barber was alone, and in view of modern casualties, naturally solicitous for his safety; for to the credit of true womanhood, be it spoken, neither selfishness nor neglect do readily alienate a kind heart. "Now why did not this absent husband pen a few thoughtful words to the waiting wife? Because, forsooth, it was too much trouble, and he really didn't think the matter of enough consequence to spend fifteen minutes of time and a postage stamp upon. That she should care to know his movements in detail or in general, or be desirous of hearing what Mrs. A. said or Mrs. B. did, or anxious to receive tidings from friends, or curious to listen to those little items that the most wise, at times, evince an interest in, was to him nearly incomprehensible. A morbid curiosity, a love of tattle, he denominated it—forgetful that he had himself been edified in the relation of these very details.

To be sure, Mr. Barber would have been seriously disturbed, had his wife failed to have had a good supper and a bright fire ready for him; but he didn't think it politic to swell a trifle into a great matter by acknowledging the same, either by appreciative words, or smiles. It was in the way of her duty—wasn't it? and why need she covet reward? Then, again, our model husband never was guilty of making his wife presents. To his mind, it was very like throwing money away. How exceedingly unromantic, too! If it was one's cousin, or one's sweetheart, it might do; but a gift for one's wife was absurd! We know to a certainty, also, that Mr. Barber had not hinted to his wife, in the remotest manner, since the day he gave her the honor of bearing his name, that she was anything more to him than a convenient home-appendage, tolerably calculated to make him comfortable—a useful domestic-machine, which, by skilful management, might be able to grind out a good deal of drudgery. That she should aspire to be his confidant, or adviser, or equal, had never entered his astute head. In fact, his thoughts were so full of Mr. Barber, that there was seldom a gap into which another personality could crowd.—Is it a marvel, then, that Mrs. Barber's heart was often sorrowful, or that the unsatisfied part of her nature cried out for sympathy and the calm of loving kindness? Ah, no! And there are other wives who aspire to something more than enough to eat, drink, and wear!

Before retiring, our disappointed wife inspected Mr. Barber's carpet-bag. In it she found a quantity of soiled linen, a new cravat, an elegant vest-pattern, and a box of choice cigars—an inventory that more fully confirmed his complete selfishness. When, after the performance of sundry duties, such as sifting coal, bringing wood from the shed, water from the pump, potatoes from the cellar, etc., Mrs. Barber followed her companion to their sleeping-apartment, she ascertained by certain significant sounds that he was already within the dominions of Morpheus; but while she was endeavoring to make the disrobing process as noiseless as possible, he opened his eyes to remark that "it was singular a woman couldn't do anything without making a racket. Her feet were as cold as stones, moreover; why hadn't she retired at a seasonable hour, before the fire got low and the room chilly?" Sure enough, Mr. Barber!

It was Mrs. Barber's habit to rise early. Her husband's business demanded his attention at an hour which obliged her to be stirring betimes. So the next morning our model man shook his wife gently, and said:

"Sue! Sue! the clock is striking five. It is time to get up. You may as well be getting breakfast, as tossing about in the bed as you have been for the last half-hour."

"I'm afraid I'm sick, John," feebly responded Mrs. Barber. "I've slept but little, and been very restless all night. I wish you'd get up and make the fire, and perhaps I shall feel better soon."

Mr. Barber demurred sometime, before complying with this reasonable request. "Making a fire" (especially in the winter season) was so much out of his sphere, that it seemed a mountain-task to contemplate. He uncovered his head, slowly put out one foot and then the other, drew them in again suddenly, and finally, with a prolonged shiver, made a second and more successful attempt of alighting upon his feet, when the operation of dressing was hastily performed.

He did not gain a victory over charcoal and anthracite without a struggle. One burned too quick, and the other not quick enough; one crackled and sputtered, as if laughing at his efforts—the other lay cold, black and defiant. Lucifer-matches and patience at last getting the mastery, Mr. Barber marched up stairs and proudly announced the fact.

"I fear I shall not be able to get your breakfast, John, my head is so giddy," answered Mrs. Barber, raising her head with an effort.

"Now don't go to giving up to a headache, Susan," he continued, in a disappointed tone. "There's no use in giving up to sickness. Only think you won't be sick, and I'll warrant you'll be all right in an hour or two."

Mrs. Barber sighed; while a sharp pain in her head contracted her features. At that moment Master Robert Barber, a small personage of five years, scampered into the chamber and announced his wish to be "dressed." His mother made a movement to attend to his wants, but a sudden faintness forced her to desist.

"Can't you dress him, John?" she asked, looking pityingly at the little shivering object in the night dress.

"I never could dress a child, there's so much pinning and tying and buttoning to do. He can wait, I dare say." With which remark, Mr. Barber went down stairs to try his luck at breakfast-making.

He, like many of his sex, had an exalted idea of his culinary acquirements. His wife was a notable cook and housekeeper; yet John Barber, though he liked to eat her nice pastry and meats, always insisted, in her presence, that his mother was the only woman who could roast beef properly and make a chicken-pie fit to eat.

"Getting breakfast," quoth Mr. Barber, as he stirred the fire and spread the cloth, "is a very simple thing; and why women need make such a fuss about it, is more than I can account for. Let me see—yes, I'll cut the meat, and then I'll fry some of the buckwheats that I see Sue has mixed. I'll venture to say that I can make them as beautiful a brown as the best French cook in the country."

Mr. Barber cut his meat, laid it upon what he thought was the gridiron, but which in reality was a flat-heater, and placed it upon a bed of hot coals. Precisely two minutes sufficed to fasten it firmly upon its iron bed, from which a good deal of pulling and scraping was necessary to raise it. A dried and burned surface rewarded the eyes of the cook, who went through with the "turning" process with exactly the same results.

"I'll butter the griddle well, and there'll be no mistake about the buckwheats," pursued Mr. Barber, flinging the flat heater into a tub of cold water to quench the smoke that was filling the room.

The most important event that followed this movement, was the instant cracking and breaking of the heated iron.

With his enthusiasm slightly cooled, he turned his attention to the buckwheats in embryo. Pouring a quantity of the mixture upon the griddle, he watched its baking with great interest. He didn't like the looks of that circle of dough; it didn't rise and puff up as he hoped it would. So he tossed it into the slop-pail and put on another. Alas! instead of a "beautiful brown," that buckwheat was a confirmed black, and soon followed its predecessor. Half a dozen more experiments failed as signally, and he gave up the attempt in disgust, concluding to make a breakfast off beefsteak and cold bread. He was just placing himself at the table, when he suddenly recollected that he had no coffee, and what was worse, the water was cold in the pail.

"Confound it—I forgot to fill the kettle! I wonder how folks contrive to remember everything!" he exclaimed, petulantly. "But I'll go without coffee; I can and I will!"

Mr. Barber would have complained bitterly, had his wife placed before him a breakfast of burned, unpalatable steak, cold bread, and cold water for drink; now, however, he partook of the delicacies his skill and judgment had provided, without a thought of his exacting demands, or an appreciatory feeling of his wife's care and attentiveness to his numerous wants.

But he was destined to have a lesson. Not thinking his wife's illness of much consequence, he left the remains of his "juicy beefsteak" and dry bread upon the table, and betook himself to his business. On his return, at noon, he found everything in the kitchen as he had left it, and Mrs. Barber so much worse, that he really began to think she was seriously indisposed. Turning and tossing, her face flushed with fever, and trying to quiet little Robert, who, cold and hungry, was crying bitterly, she touched the outer edge of Mr. Barber's sympathies sufficiently to induce him to go for Mrs. Hunt, who was soon in the chamber of her friend, with a finger on her pulse and a hand on her throbbing forehead.

"Why, Mr. Barber! how could you be so thoughtless as to let your wife lie here, alone, and suffer all this morning?" she exclaimed. "Don't you see that she has a high fever, and must be attended to at once? Do run for a doctor, while I see to this poor child."

Mr. Barber did as he was bidden, without comment. To speak the truth, his conscience pricked him a little for his neglect and the uncharitable, not to say unkind, words he had spoken in the morning.

"I declare, Sue, I'm out of patience with your husband! He's the very essence of selfishness and self-conceit! Do you remember what a fuss he made, the other day, about a headache? and how you made herb-tea, and bathed his head, and put up a stove for his accommodation, and brought the camphor and the hartshorn, and walked on tiptoe all day to avoid noise, and gave up going shopping with me, because you said 'John was too sick to be left alone?' And here you are, in a high fever, and he—"

"Don't Elsie!" implored Mrs. Barber. "John is thoughtless, I know; but he doesn't mean any harm, I'm sure. He isn't used to my being sick, and it makes him impatient."

"Heartless, I should say," rejoined Mrs. Hunt, in an undertone, while she busied herself in kind offices for her friend.

It is not necessary to dwell upon the days and weeks of suffering that fell to the lot of poor Mrs. Barber. A painful and protracted illness, induced, in a great measure, by exposure and over-exertion, gave Mr. Barber a deeper insight into the mysteries of housekeeping, the excellence of foreign help, the innumerable privileges of motherly nurses, doting aunts and knowing cousins, and the immense advantage his household derived from the supervision of an Irish damsel.

Mrs. Barber was not one of the complaining kind. She rarely spoke of the headache, neuralgia, or nervousness, and seldom claimed sympathy for wearied limbs or "shooting pains;" consequently this dispensation crossed the plans and sorely tried the patience of her ease loving husband. He missed her wifely care, and the thousand and one little offices prompted by a kind heart. Nobody waited for him, now; he waited for everybody. When he wished for a fire, he had the privilege of making it. If his tea proved to be cold, grumbling did not warm it, for Peggy's sensibilities were too callous to allow her to be troubled by fault finding. When he failed to find his slippers and his shirts, he was assured that they were "layin' round somewhere," which proved true to the letter, for sometimes they were on the dining-table and sometimes in the kitchen-closet with the towels.

"Confound that jade for a nuisance!" he exclaimed, one morning, being more than usually annoyed at the girl's tardiness and increasing familiarity of speech. "I haven't enjoyed myself a minute since Sue was taken sick. Look at this room! I'll wager it hasn't seen a brush or a broom these two weeks. See the cobwebs and the coal-dust! And as for food, what I've had to eat, a pig would refuse!"

"I'm glad of it, Mr. Barber!" said a voice; and turning quickly, our luckless husband met the black eyes of Mrs. Hunt.

He was a little, a very little, embarrassed.

"I repeat that I'm glad of it!" she added, with a saucy smile; "and I hope that you'll be uncomfortable just long enough to teach you to appreciate your wife. She's been a drudge for you, Mr. Barber, since your marriage; always at your beck and call, she devoted all her time and thoughts to your service. And for what? Nothing—absolutely nothing. She doesn't get a return even in such small coin as kisses. When did you kiss your wife last, Mr. Barber?"

The questioner looked mischievously, yet seriously, into the latter's face.

"When did I kiss my wife last? What a singular question! I cannot tell, Mrs. Hunt. Not since—not since—"

"Your marriage, perhaps?"

"Very likely not. But then women don't care about kisses after marriage. They have something more important to think of, generally."

"They do care about kisses and kind words and pleasant smiles," affirmed Mrs. Hunt, energetically; "and it is only a mass of selfishness done up in the figure of a man that will withhold these simple tributes to affection."

"Then I'm afraid I've been selfish, Mrs. Hunt."

"Intolerably so; there's no doubt of it," she added.

"Susan has made me an excellent wife," he went on to say.

"No doubt of that, either: though I presume to say you never told her so," added his fair critic, taking the edge off her pointed words by a manner peculiarly her own.

"I never did, upon my word! Elsie—Mrs. Hunt, I'm a tyrant, a bear, a brute, a—"

"Go and tell her so; it will do her more good than all the calomel and quinine she can take. And mind you, Mr. Barber," pursued Mrs. Hunt, "don't forget to kiss her, after you have told her that you are a brute. She'll be sure to believe it, then!"

Mrs. Hunt went home, and Mr. Barber went up stairs. What passed there, is not recorded; but one thing is certain—Mrs. Barber's spirits revived wonderfully, and as a consequence, her health rapidly improved. In a few weeks she was able to walk slowly about the house, and in due time returned to her place in the family, from which Irish Peggy and the high-minded nurse were soon dismissed. The rooms gradually assumed their accustomed neat and cheerful look, while the extension table in the small sitting room renewed its attractions three times a day for Mr. Barber.

Mrs. Barber made no more fires on cold winter mornings; she brought no more coal from the cellar, or water from the well. John was no longer the indifferent recipient of her attentions, but a tenderer husband, a more loving companion, a better friend. The illness that she had lamented so much, promised to be a blessing in disguise; for through that, and the instrumentality of kind-hearted Mrs. Hunt, she had gained what a true wife values most—the love and sympathy of her husband.

A GOLDEN THOUGHT.

We know not the author of the following, but it is one of the most beautiful productions that we have ever read: "Nature will be reported. All things are engaged in writing their own history. The plant and pebble go attended by their shadow. The rolling rock leaves its scratches on the mountain side, the river its channel in the soil, the animal its bones in the stratum, the fern and the leaf their modest epitaph in the coal. The falling drop makes its sepulchre in the sand or stone; not a footstep in the snow, or along the ground, but prints its characters more or less, a map of its march; every act of the man inscribes itself on the memories of his fellows, and his own face. The air is full of sound, the sky of tokens, the ground is all memoranda and signatures, and every object is covered over with hints which speak to the intelligent."—Philadelphia Christian Observer.

FEROCITY OF RATS.

The London News of the World states that a family named M'Kall residing at Mary-hill were recently attacked by an army of rats in the night. Mrs. M'Kall was awoke by a pain on her forehead and putting up her hand, it came in contact with a rat fixed to her temple. Springing out of bed, she observed one of her fore-fingers cut in two places, and on lifting her infant child the blood was streaming from its head in several places, which showed marks as if produced by the teeth of rats. One of its fingers was cut severely. The husband had to sit up and watch his family for the rest of the night, to save them from any further attack from these ferocious vermin.

AIR, WATER AND EXERCISE.

Air, water and exercise—the three greatest medicines known, and the best; for when employed in moderation and in proper proportions, they give health to the body, vigor to the mind, and lovingness to the heart. They brighten the eye, quicken the intellect, and elevate the soul. In their train follow a sharp appetite, good digestion, and sound sleep. The blood is purified, the strength is renewed, and the whole physical man is invigorated. They plant perennial roses on the cheek of beauty, add largely to the powers of endurance in mature life, and give to old age the bodily agility of younger years, with the kindness of childhood.—Dr. Hall.

LIZZIE.

BY GEORGE A. B. DONALDSON.

I have seen the rose on thy cheek, dear love,
And a smile on thy lip so cherry red,
But the form of death, with its chilly breath,
Has taken the rose, and the smile has fled.
I stand by the grave that is covered with flowers,
Where the roses red in beauty bloom,
But I think not of flowers, but of happy hours,
Before you were laid in the cold, cold tomb.

But my eye grows dim, and the tear-drops flow,
And my heart grows chilly and cold,
My thoughts turn to thee, and my head bows low,
When I think of the days of old.
But the time will come when again we shall meet,
When free from all sorrow and pain,
When the eye will close, and the heart cease to beat,
Then in heaven we will ne'er part again.

THE LOST JEWEL.

BY RACHEL MOORE.

"MIRIAM, Miriam, my darling, is it true?
Say it again—only once again, Miriam!"

Miriam lifted up her face, with a soft, happy, wondrous smile, and a glow sweeter and brighter than the sunset-light falling through the branches overhead suffused it, as her hazel eyes answered the ardent questioning of her lover's glance.

"Yes, yes, Edward!"

The words were sweet to his eager ear.

"Again, and again, Miriam! I could hear you say it forever, my love!"

And he bent his handsome head, to kiss the tip that had said, what no other lips had ever said to him—"I love you." But his caress was given back with half-timid, yet earnest tenderness; and his soft blue eyes beamed with happy emotion. It was Edward Vane's first wooing; and the pleasure he experienced was as rare and delicious as it was novel; for, to the young lover declaring his earliest attachment, is not the timid "yes," and the kiss of her he loves, the sweetest thing he has ever known?

Under the trees, in the garden of the old parsonage, they walked together in the sunset, after this sweet confession; walking side by side, Edward holding Miriam's hand, and talking tenderly to her as they went, with his warm heart beaming in his handsome face; and Miriam listening silently, with a happiness whose very silence manifests its depth. And the sun sank lower, and the shadows grew longer, as the pleasant moments slipped away—golden moments to Edward and Miriam; and finally, as the twilight began to gather, they heard the voice of Miriam's father, calling her, from his study.

They went back, and now, standing for a single instant longer in the old stone porch, under the curtaining vines, Edward drew Miriam to his breast again, and pressed his lips gently to her cheek.

"A few moments, my darling, before you go to him. Let me see him first. I must tell him—"

A happy thrill ran through Miriam's heart. She laid her head quietly on her lover's bosom, and kissed softly the beloved hand that held her own in a lingering clasp.

"Yes, tell him," she said, with a blush; and then, loosing herself from his embrace, she went away, while Edward Vane sought her father's study.

It was no new thing to the good old pastor, that Edward and his daughter loved each other; he had seen it long since, had known it, perhaps, before they knew it themselves. Edward was not, it may be, the husband her father would have chosen for her; affectionate in disposition, with an ardent temperament, but impulsive—changing—uncertain of purpose—all this the old man had seen him to be; but he himself had not many years to live; they loved each other—and it might be, after all, for the best. At any rate, he could not find it in his heart to cross their love, and so his consent was given, and Miriam and her lover received his blessing.

And now, the old parsonage seemed another Eden, in whose garden dwelt only happiness. But has not every Eden its serpent? It came in dark, but beautiful and shining guise; it came in the shape of Miriam's lovely cousin Amabel, her wealthy, handsome cousin Amabel; who, with her sweet, bewitching face, glided in upon the happy lovers and brought fascination with her.

It was not that Amabel Wyndham, with her beauty and her pride, cared for Miriam's lover, that she left for awhile, the score of suitors at whose expense she had been amusing herself, coquetting with them all by turns, and giving hope to none; but Edward was handsome, and winning and elegant, and above all, he had never knelt at her shrine—the insatiable heart-hunter! And so, for the éclat of a new conquest, she came daily over from her father's magnificent estate, to Harleigh parsonage, to win away, with her bewitching smile, the heart of her cousin's lover.

Miriam saw her, riding lightly along on her white steed; with her dark locks braided, and her snowy-plume waving to the breeze, her red lips smiling, and her dark eyes beaming with the delight of anticipated triumph. Miriam, sitting with her father and her lover, in the old parsonage study, saw this brilliant cousin, and thought, "how lovely Amabel is!" But the thought was not mingled with envy. She had won a heart without Amabel's fascinations; and her soft cheek colored, and her clear hazel eyes beamed with innocent happiness, as she looked at her lover.

A moment more, and the quiet of that happy little circle was broken, by the appearance of this beautiful enchantress-cousin. Miriam and her father both knew Amabel's hollow heart, yet they gave her kindly greeting. She was their kin. They never dreamed with what intent she had come. They, in their charity for others, could not conceive that she had an idea of evil regarding them.

But Amabel Wyndham laughed at their charity. She did not scruple to abuse it, when it served her purpose so to do. And she glided in, in her elegant attire, with her soft, yet brilliant beauty, her captivating manner, her keen, delicate light-flashing wit, and placed herself in bewildering, dazzling contrast to her fair, simple, unworldly, and yet noble cousin Miriam. It was not the first time Edward had seen her, but he had never viewed her so nearly, never spoken to her before this evening. Amabel took care that his earliest impression of her should be only an agreeable one.

She was peerless in her loveliness, her grace, her mental gift; she would have adorned a royal court. Edward was a scholar and a gentleman, cultivated and refined, and a passionate admirer of beauty. It would have been a marvel, if one like him had resisted her enchantments, for she was the very spirit of beauty.

"How incomparably lovely!" was his mental exclamation, as she sat near him, gaily and carelessly chatting with her uncle and Miriam, and now and then turning her bright, yet softened glance upon him, with some smiling word of remark, or of question, that drew him ere long, from silent admiration, into animated converse with the rest.

He did not mentally compare her with Miriam. He was not thinking of Miriam, when he said to himself that the world could contain no face more enchanting than that of this charming guest. But during the hour that Amabel stayed, he experienced a pleasure, the nature of which he could hardly have defined, had he tried; and the depth of which he never sought to fathom. He only knew that he admired Miss Wyndham very much.

And so the heartless beauty lingered as long as it suited her, seeing plainly, and with secret delight, how Edward Vane was attracted; until she was fully satisfied with her first attempt, and bidding the party a graceful adieu, vanished like some brilliant star, that, while we are eagerly, delightedly watching it, hides itself behind the clouds. And Miriam Harleigh never dreamed whose eyes that star had dazzled.

When next she met her beautiful cousin, it was after service, at the little village church; and as Miriam lingered near the door, awaiting her father, Amabel, in passing, slightly tapped the young girl's cheek with her gloved hand.

"How came you ever to attract so elegant, so distinguished a lover as Edward Vane?" she asked; "do you know that I am quite pleased with him? and that is dangerous for you, you know! Take care, my pretty cousin, that I do not win him away from you. By the way, dear, Frederic has also become acquainted with him, and I believe, cultivates him most sedulously. At any rate, he has invited him over to spend a day or two with us this week. You can afford to lose him for that time—can't you, Miriam, dear?"

Frederic was Amabel's brother.

Finishing her heartless speech with a soft laugh, and a kiss on her cousin's lips, she passed on to her carriage. And Miriam looked after her an instant, with a sudden terror at her heart—a startled pallor overspreading her cheeks; saying in a low, half-bitter tone:

"Amabel, Amabel, was that what you came for?"

She only said to Edward, when he came again.

"Do you know Frederic Wyndham, Edward?"

"Yes, Miriam—I was introduced to him not long ago—did I not mention it? I am forgetful—of everything but you, my darling!" he added with a beaming smile. Then he continued: "Yes, and only yesterday he made me half-promise to come and pass a day or two with him at his father's. I do not know whether I shall go, though he is very urgent. He seems to like me."

A dull pain went through Miriam's heart; but she would say nothing, nor let him suspect what she felt.

"Will he go?" she asked, mentally; and with slow and unhappy suspense, she waited to see.

Edward did go. If he had foreseen the result, he might have been wiser; but with him, as is the case with many another, wisdom was purchased with experience.

During the days that he spent with Frederic Wyndham, he was thrown frequently into the society of the beautiful Amabel; their acquaintance matured, and his admiration grew deeper with every hour that passed, revealing some new beauty, some new grace in the variable, wayward, yet ever-enchanting Amabel.

When Miriam met him again, she longed to ask him, "do you not like my beautiful cousin?" But she refrained. "I will not mock myself," she thought; "how can he help liking—nay, even loving her?"

It was not Edward's last visit at his friend's. Amabel chose to win him, and there was little resistance made. Frederic was a pleasant friend, and Edward Vane, neglecting to question his own heart too closely, said that it was because of this, that he liked so well to go there.

But he always saw Amabel. They played and sang together, together rambled over the fine grounds around the mansion, and read from the same book. And Amabel's voice had wondrous sweetness in its tones, and the gentle glance of her dark eyes, in her subdued moments, was one of most enchanting softness. And Edward listened to the sweet voice, and met the soft glance of the lovely dark eyes, yielding each day more completely to their delicious fascination, until his heart was won quite away from Miriam.

Yes—he loved Amabel; he acknowledged it at last, to himself; and now, unable to resist her influence, and dreading to meet Miriam's sight, he went no more to Harleigh parsonage.

He gave himself up now, to this new happiness; it was strange, too, how bitter he found it! For whenever he sat by Amabel's side, and looked into the beautiful depths of those dark eyes, the thoughts of his neglected love rose up. He seemed to see Miriam's sweet, pure face before him, pale and sad. Self-reproach wore upon him; but he hated to listen to it; and finally, braving and defying it, in very desperation, he declared his love to Amabel Wyndham. It was a moment of triumph for which she had waited and watched with suspense and impatience. Despite herself, a blush of pleasure rose to her cheek, even while she assumed a little air of mingled annoyance and regret.

"My dear Mr. Vane!" she said, shaking her beautiful head—"how sorry I am that this has happened—that you have imagined—that you have mistaken—I have been engaged to marry Mr. Carruth since last week!"

Mr. Carruth was a millionaire.

Edward Vane saw the dupe—the plaything he had been. Incensed almost beyond endurance, he left the scene of his infatuation, of his blind folly, for the last time.

It was bitter repentance for his fault, that led him back to Harleigh parsonage, to seek forgiveness and reconciliation from Miriam.

"Miriam, I have been mad—insane, I believe!" he said. "I have forsaken your sweet face for a will-o'-the-wisp that has led me to wretchedness. Miriam, for the sake of our old love, will you forgive me?"

"For the sake of our old love—yes;" answered Miriam, extending her hand to him. She was quite pale, but there was no trace of unhappiness in her calm, fair countenance. "Yes, the pain you have caused me I will not remember; but the pain is over now—and the love has died out with it, Edward."

"Miriam—I deserve it!" he uttered, with a cry of anguish; "I deserve it! But O, do not say it, Miriam! May I not hope—"

"No—there is no hope;" she answered, gently, but firmly. "I forgive the pain you have given me, but I dare not risk that pain again. We can never be anything more than we are now to each other."

The words were sacred—they proved true. He went out from her presence, ashamed; and their paths never were the same again.

HINTS TO PARENTS.

If your child is naturally wilful, never exercise any patience towards him, but resolve to conquer him at once. You will find your attempts to do so will act like quack medicine on a sick man, either kill or cure, but oftener kill; while more moderate and gentle treatment would have cured him.

Punish him for every offence that you learn of his committing, and then try to imagine why he deceives you when he has done wrong.

Give him precept after precept, upon self government and gentleness, and forget all about the practice yourself, when he disobeys your wishes. Children generally follow their parents' examples, not their precepts.

Tell him how wicked it is to disobey his parents, then fasten your moral lesson upon his youthful mind with the rod. You will teach him very effectually by this to fear the rod, but to care little about the happiness obedience will bring him or you.

Should you live to see him a man, you will probably hear him relate, if he is not within the walls of a prison, how he felt towards you when you were putting the rod on for some trifling offence; and how he then resolved, if he lived to be a man he would pay you well for your labor.

Q IN A CORNER.

Curious Matters.

A German Hoax.

Some months ago, there was a story in all the German papers about an Englishman who had promised to an orphan boy a free education, with a judicial deposit of 150,000 florins, if he would procure to him within a given time one million of second-hand post-stamps. This at once created a great enthusiasm all over Germany in behalf of the poor orphan boy, and large packages were soon on the way from various cities, especially Hamburg, all directed to a certain journal office in Karlsruhe; in Cologne, a certain restaurant used his place as a central depot for receiving the once used stamps, and now the Karlsruhe journal refused to receive any such packages, and says that it does not know of any such Englishman, neither of the orphan boy. It was then announced that Stuttgart was the place, to which place the packages were to be sent, but with less good effect. It was said that the wonderful Englishman would paper his whole house when he should get all the stamps. It looked English at first, but it now seems to be nothing else than what they call a Schwaben-streich (Swabian hoax).

Delhi Flexible Stone.

There is in possession of Mr. Jellicoe, a gentleman of Southampton, England, a piece of the flexible sand-stone from Delhi, the seat of the great Indian revolt. It is a small slab, about a foot long, four inches wide, and three quarters of an inch thick, and can be literally bent. If it were three times as long and held out by one end, it would bend so as to have the appearance of a bow. While bending, a slight rattle is heard as if the slab was fractured or jointed, but although so thin, not the slightest sign of a fracture is observable on its surface. The sand-stone is hard, of a very light color, and when examined by a powerful microscope, its crystallization appears exceedingly beautiful.

Singular Prophecy.

Among the various, curious, and almost irresistible things in connection with the war in the East, which have recently turned up by the Rev. Dr. Cumming, he quotes the following lines, which he states he had copied from an old volume of the fifteenth century:

"In twice two hundred years, the Bear
The Crescent will assail;
But if the Cock and Bull unite,
The Bear will not prevail.

"But mark! in twice ten years again,
Let Islam know and fear,
The Cross shall stand; the Crescent wane, Dissolve and disappear."

An odd Accident.

At the Angel and Sun Tavern, Strand, London, Anne Sparrow, a servant, was recently dusting some soda-water bottles, when one of them burst with a loud report, and several large pieces of glass buried themselves in her throat, wounding her in a most shocking manner.

Curious Epitaph.

The following is a literal copy of an epitaph on a tomb-stone in a country churchyard, not ten miles from Trenton, New Jersey:

"This mortal body by a horse
Was hurried to the tomb;
But Christ, by virtue of his cross,
Will bring my spirit home."

Indestructible Wood.

The wood of the Kayer Oulin, or iron wood of Borneo, is perhaps the strongest in the world. Mr. Motley, writing from South Borneo, says, "I tested a piece of it, one inch square, and forty-two inches between the supports, and it bore, suspended from the centre, 338 pounds, before it gave way; its deflection was then about eight inches. The wood when fresh cut is light brown, but becomes of a deep, reddish black, and finally quite black when old. It is used by the natives most universally for boats and houses, though very heavy. The trees are large and majestic; the trunk very straight, and the bark thin and scaly. The wood appears to be almost indestructible." Mr. Motley gives instances where it has been in use in houses and fences, or stockades, for 130 years, without showing signs of decay. Numbers of these trees are killed by the fires which sweep the country in dry seasons.

Singular Stratagem.

The application of the process of etherization has just been resorted to in Belgium, as a means of acquiring judicial information. After a considerable robbery committed at Brussels in November last, two men named Lerk and Daubner were arrested and brought to trial. The former was condemned to hard labor for life, but in consequence of the latter pretending to be dumb and idiotic, his trial was postponed in order that a medical investigation should take place. It was found impossible to get a sign of intelligence from him. As, however, it was known that he had spoken when he said that he could speak no language but German, he was etherised, and while laboring under the effects of that application he spoke perfectly and in French. Sentence was passed upon him for ten years' hard labor.

A Lady's Dog worth a Horse.

The subjoined advertisement is copied from the London Times. "A gentleman, who, through the death of his lady, has a very small and exceedingly handsome black and tan terrier weighing a little over 3 lbs., for which he has been offered a large sum, wishes to part with it, to be kindly treated. Would be happy to exchange with a lady or gentleman having a horse, which they wish to be also kindly treated (and having no use for) for his own riding or driving. Undeniable references will be asked for and given."

The Pendulum Discovery.

Galileo, when under twenty years of age, was standing one day in the Metropolitan Church of Pisa, when he observed a lamp, which was suspended from the ceiling, and which had been disturbed from some accident, swing backwards and forwards. This was a thing so common that thousands no doubt had observed it before; but Galileo, struck with the regularity with which it moved backwards and forwards, reflected upon it, and perfected the method now in use, that of measuring time by the pendulum.

White Porpoise.

At a recent exhibition in London, among other novelties, some curried leather from white porpoise skins was exhibited, and was much admired for the essential requisites of toughness and softness, and has been considered superior to the skins of land animals; the price is the same as that of the best calfskin, and a sample pair of boots shown at the exhibition is stated to have worn out seven soles.

An Oriental Advertisement.

In an Indian paper of recent date we notice a very characteristic Eastern advertisement. A merchant who resides in the name of Soroopehaud Doss, advertises for sale a lot of Dacca muslins. They are described as so fine that a whole piece can be with ease passed through a wedding ring, and when spread on the grass in the early morning, are so undistinguishable from dew that it is reported that a cow ate a whole web while grazing without discovering it. The Emperor Akbar rebuked his sister for indelicacy in appearing before him clothed in only seven folds of this texture.

Odd and Odd.

An old fact, newly stated, is the following plan which was formerly adopted by physicians to prevent them from meeting infection. They use a cane with a hollow head, the top of which was of gold, pierced with holes, like a pepper box. This top contained a small quantity of aromatic powder, or of snuff; and, on entering a house or room where a disease supposed to be infectious prevailed, the doctor would strike his cane on the floor to agitate the powders, and then apply it to his nose. Hence, all the old prints of physicians represent them with a cane at their nose.

Strange Destiny for a Stocking.

A fine large ox was taken sick, refused to eat, and in spite of all remedies resorted to, soon died. At a "post-mortem examination," a hard, smooth ball, of the size of a large apple, and resembling in consistence, as well as in color, a piece of granite rock, was taken from his stomach; and on breaking it with a hammer, for cut it you could not, it proved to be a woolen stocking, which the animal had swallowed, and in its desperate efforts to digest had rolled over and over, and finally compressed into that rock-like ball.

Curious old Legacy.

The Aldgate Church, in London, has a fund, bequeathed to it in the dark days of persecution. Its specific purpose was to purchase flagots, not to warm the cold, or prepare food for the hungry poor, but to burn heretics. Some centuries are now past, and the supply so far exceeds the demand that there is no more room for storing away the abundant flagots. The trustees of the fund, it is said, now give away the proceeds, to keep alive the poor, and comfort and save the very class that a different age had consigned to the stake.

A Cow with a Wooden Leg.

Robert Wright, farmer, of Burton Lemars, near Melton Mowbray, England, has a cow which lately broke its leg, and which they attempted to set themselves, but finding they could not succeed sent for Mr. Reynolds, veterinary surgeon, of Melton Mowbray, who found it necessary to amputate it, and has affixed one of wood in its place, which is likely to answer every purpose. It is fastened round the knee-joint by means of leather straps, and the beast can use it.

Chinese Wall.

Some idea of the extent of the great wall of China may be gathered from a remark of Dr. Browning in a lecture on that country, recently delivered in England. He said that if all the brick, stone and masonry in Great Britain were gathered together, they would not furnish materials enough for such a wall as the wall of China, and that if all the materials in the buildings of London were put together, they would not make the towers and turrets that adorn it.

Interesting Case of Transfusion.

The Stafford Advertiser records the following remarkable operation, which was successfully performed by Mr. Wheatcroft, surgeon of Cannock, on the person of a woman named Wood, residing there. A fearful hemorrhage had set in, draining the woman of blood. She felt herself dying, and summoned her husband to her bedside, bade him "good-by," and earnestly requested him to take care of the children when she was no more. She then became pulseless and gasping, occasional breathing being the only indication of life. A vein was opened in her arm, and one in the arm of her husband, and as the blood flowed from the latter it was transmitted by suitable apparatus into the veins of the wife. After seventeen ounces had been thus injected, the pulse became perceptible, the colorless lips reddened, the glassy eye brightened, and she thankfully said, "I am better." The case has progressed very favorably, and the woman is recovering. Death here was literally robbed of his victim.

The Scarlet Letter.

A curious illustration of an old mode of punishment, immortalized by Hawthorne in his "Scarlet Letter," occurs in one of the earliest volumes of the Records of the General Court of Massachusetts Bay. Under date of March 4, 1633: "It is ordered that Robert Coles, for Drunkenness, by him committed at Rocksbery, shall be disfranchised, wear about his neck and so to hang upon his Outward Garment a D, made of Red Clouth and sett upon White, to continue this for a year, and not to leave it of at any Time when he comes among Company, Under the Penalty of ten Pounds for the first Offence, etc. * * * Also to wear the D outwards, and is enjoined to appear at the next General Court, to continue there till the Court be ended." Hester Prynne, the heroine of Hawthorne's story, it will be remembered, wore the letter A, the initial letter of her offence.

A Piece of Ingenuity.

We were shown the other day, says the Scientific American, a remarkable piece of work, the result of much patience and perseverance. It consisted of a glass bottle, the height of which was only one foot, and in which were constructed several reels of wood, having on them 3437 beads, 120 yards of silk, and 8 china images; altogether this curious bottle contained 3688 pieces, so jointed and framed that they filled the bottle, and had all been put together through the neck. But the crowning work was the stopper, from which four pieces projected in the form of a cross, so that it could not be withdrawn, and the question with us was how was it got in? This bottle is the work of Mr. F. A. Fabvier of this city, and is well worthy the attention of the connoisseur and curious. There are two on exhibition at the Crystal Palace.

Immense Engine and Mill.

An enormous engine and rolling mill are now in course of erection at the Dowlais Ironworks. It supplies blast to no fewer than six furnaces, and its enormous beam and adjuncts weigh upwards of 40 tons, and the flywheel 35 tons. The rolling mill has a driving wheel of 25 feet, and a flywheel of 21, which makes 110 revolutions per minute. One rail mill is to make 1000 tons of rails per week; another rough mill is to manufacture 700 tons per week; and 200 tons of bar iron are to be made up by a bar mill. This enormous rail mill is manufactured to roll both ways at a speed of 110 revolutions per minute, and so to be capable of rolling bars of a length and section never before attempted.

The Florist.

A simple wreath of spotless flowers
Is all my hand has learned to twine;
But do not scorn the humble gift,
'Tis offered from my heart to thine.—MARLAND.

Flower Vessels.

An endless variety of ornamental vessels are used for the reception of flowers, and they are equally well adapted for the purpose, so that the stalks are inserted in pure water. This water ought to be changed every day, or once in two days at the farthest, and a thin slice should be thinly cut off from the end of each stalk every time the water is removed, which will revive the flowers.

Vines in Parlors.

Vines, such as the German Ivy, the convolvulus, and other climbers, may be grown in pots and trained up in the recess of a bay-window, giving a very pretty and tasteful effect to a room. No artificial drapery equals in beauty the trailing foliage of nature. It gives an apartment a summer effect in the midst of winter.

Thermometers.

No amateur should attempt to grow plants in a greenhouse without having a thermometer to consult with regard to the heat. Thermometers may be procured with a long tube for plunging into the ground to ascertain the heat of a hot-bed or tan-pit.

Marking Plants.

The best way of naming or numbering plants in a garden is by means of a stick whittled smooth. Rub a little white oil paint on it, and while moist, write the name or number with a hard black lead pencil.

Vases.

Vases in pleasure-grounds have a very fine effect, particularly when placed on terraces. They should always stand on a plinth broader than the circular base, for nothing has a more unartistic effect than to see vases resting on the bare ground.

The Tree Violet.

The shrubby or Tree Violet, a native of one of the Canary Isles, is a very handsome plant, growing about two feet high, with a shrubby stem, and large purplish-blue flowers; it is usually kept in a green-house, where it flowers in the spring.

Water.

Water as an element of culture is next in importance to soil, for plants can no more subsist without the one than without the other. Even in a moist climate plants need watering, and parlor plants absorb a great deal.

Evergreens.

No garden should be without its due proportion of evergreens. When the flowers are all gone, they impart a cheerfulness even to the dead of winter.

Cut Flowers.

The appearance of a conservatory is very much assisted by a few vases for cut flowers. With care about the water, cut flowers may be kept fresh for several days.

Charcoal.

Outings in Germany are often stuck in charcoal. All kinds of plants grow better in charcoal than in anything else. A mixture of loam and charcoal is excellent.

Lilies.

The hardy kinds, deserving most attention, are the candidum, chalcidonicum and its varieties, tigrinum, concolor, and martagon. These, with our native species are all very beautiful. They should be planted from three to five inches deep, according to the size of the bulb, and need not be taken up oftener than once in every three or four years. None of the species can be transplanted after they have grown without injuring their flowering.

Crocusses.

There are upwards of one hundred varieties of this well-known flower in cultivation attended with universal success. They delight in soils well enriched and kept in good condition at all times, and may either be planted in beds or rows, at least two inches deep and six inches from row to row. They seldom require a removal, unless under special circumstances. Once every three or four years will be sufficient.

Cleanliness.

It is almost unnecessary, we hope, to urge the necessity of cleanliness with respect to house plants. The pots should be washed often, and vermin removed by immersing the entire plant in a half barrel of soap-suds occasionally, where water, saturated with manure is suffered to overflow, and dead leaves to accumulate.

Flower Pots.

When China flower-pots are used, they should have the bottoms pierced with several holes instead of one; and they should be particularly well drained, by being filled to, at least, a quarter of their depth with pieces of broken tiles. Glazed pots are most suitable for plants kept in balconies.

Bone Dust.

Most plants are benefited by an admixture of fine bone dust with the soil in the pots. We also recommend the use of oil meal as an excellent manure. This, together with a plentiful watering of soap-suds, will make almost any plant flourish.

Watering Plants.

There is a great diversity of habit in plants, and consequently much discrimination should be used in watering them. Plants require more water in warm than in cold weather, and those of a vigorous growth generally demand more moisture than the more delicate.

Flowers in succession.

In selecting flowers for the parlor as well as the garden, take care to have such as bloom in succession. And also, in arranging them on the stands, as well as in the garden, reference must be had to the height and to the harmony of color.

Green-house Plants.

Many persons injure their green-house plants by giving them too much heat in winter and too little air in summer, and are then surprised to see them die or become sickly. The thermometer even in sunshine should range rather low, say 53 or 55—rarely more.

Roses.

There are many roses which, like the crimson China, will keep on growing and blooming all the winter, and young plants from cuttings will continue to bloom for many months together, if not quite continuously.

The Housewife.

Hair Dye.

A perfectly safe hair dye presents itself in pyrogallie acid, which may be prepared for this purpose by exposing powdered nut-galls to heat in a hemispherical glass or porcelain vessel, covered with tissue or filtering paper pasted round its edges, and surmounted with a bell glass. The pyrogallie acid thus obtained is to be dissolved in water, purified by digesting the solution with animal charcoal, then concentrated and mixed with some alcohol to prevent its decomposition. This tincture applied to the hair, browns it; but it must not be allowed to touch the hands, as its stain cannot easily be effaced.

To revive Black Lace.

Steep the lace in porter which has stood long enough to become slightly stale; rub it about in a basin until perfectly soaked, then press out the liquid by squeezing, carefully avoiding wringing, which would tear or fray the lace. After stretching it to its proper width, pin it out to dry. This will be found preferable to the use of gum water, for imparting to the lace the requisite degree of stiffening or dressing, and will make it appear as beautiful as when new.

To dye Kid Gloves.

To dye kid gloves brown, yellow, or tan color, steep saffron in boiling soft water for twelve hours, then having sewed up the tops of the gloves, to prevent the dye from staining the insides, wet them over with a sponge dipped into the liquor. The quantity of saffron, as well as water, depends on how much dye may be required, and their relative proportion on the depth of color wanted. A common tencup will contain sufficient quantity for a pair of gloves.

Value of Flannel.

Flannel is, for most persons, the most suitable material to be worn next to the skin. Cotton wool merely absorbs the moisture from the surface, while woolen flannel conveys it from the skin and deposits it in drops on the outside of the shirt, from which the ordinary cotton shirt absorbs it, and by its nearer exposure to the exterior air it is soon dried without injury to the body. Having these properties, woolen flannel is worn by sailors in mid-summer of the hottest countries.

Indian Muffins.

Stir into one quart of boiling water as much corn meal as will make a nice batter; when just warm, stir in as much flour as will make a stiff batter; add half a teaspoonful of salt, and half a wine glass of yeast. Set it to rise, and when risen, pour into muffin rings, and bake rather slowly in an oven. To be eaten hot.

Superior Sauce, for Plum Pudding.

Mix six yolks of eggs with four spoonfuls of sifted sugar and butter together; have a pint of boiling cream, which you will mix with your yolks; afterward put it on the fire, and stir it until it is of the consistency of sauce; then add to it a good wine-glass of brandy.

Black Ink.

Brained galls, three pounds; gum and sulphate of iron, of each, one pound; vinegar, one gallon; water, two gallons; macerate with frequent agitation for fourteen days. To produce three gallons. Fine quality.

Economy in Meats.

The housewife who is anxious to dress no more meat than will suffice for the meal, should know that beef loses about one pound in four in boiling, but in roasting, loses in the proportion of one pound five ounces, and in baking about two ounces less, or one pound three ounces; mutton loses in boiling about fourteen ounces in four pounds; in roasting, one pound six ounces.

A fresh Cod.

This is very nice. Clean it, and before putting it on the strainer rub it with salt, then lay it on the strainer, and cover it plentifully with cold water, and a tumbler full of vinegar; cook it as directed for other fish. An egg sauce must be served with this, which is made by chopping up three hard-boiled eggs, and stirring in well made drawn butter. Serve very hot. Garnish the fish with sprigs of parsley.

Bread Fritters.

Boil half a pint of milk till reduced to half, with a little sugar, salt, half a spoonful of orange flower water, and a little lemon-peel shred fine; have ready some pieces of crumb of bread, cut about the size of half-crowns, but thicker; put them in the milk to soak a little, then drain, flour, and fry them. Glaze them with sugar, and pass the salamander over them.

Calves' Feet.

Clean and wash a set of feet (four); put them on in cold water and let them boil slowly two hours. Whilst boiling, throw in a teaspoonful of salt; skim them carefully. Dish them, but remove the large bones. Sauce, the same as for calf's head; they are very delicate and nice. The broth is good for jelly.

Dried Bread for Crumbs.

Save all the crusts and pieces, put them into an oven to dry, but not brown, then roll them on the paste board, and keep the crumbs in a jar or box, in a dry place, and then they are ready for cooking purposes.

To remove Stoppers.

A simple plan for removing stoppers from glass bottles, is to heat the neck gently over a flame; the neck expands and the stopper is released.

Mildewed Linen.

This may be restored by soaping the spots, while wet, covering them with fine chalk scraped to powder and well rubbed in.

Fresh Air.

Let every room be daily thrown open for the admission of fresh air; this should be done about noon, when the atmosphere is most likely to be dry.

Fish Balls.

Chop the fish very small, add some grated bread, parsley, pepper, salt, a little butter, and an egg. Mix all well together, and make into balls; fry them brown.

To remove Grease.

Oil-grease may be removed from a hearth by covering it immediately with thick hot ashes or with burning coals.

Knife Polish.

Charcoal powder will be found a very good thing to give knives a first-rate polish.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

THE NEW YEAR!

With the present number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly, we commence the seventh volume of the work, having the largest list of subscribers, with one exception, of any magazine in the country. It will be observed, by comparing each successive issue, that we are constantly increasing its value, by adding more matter, and of a better character, as we progress, it being the firm purpose of the proprietor to make the Dollar Monthly such a work as everybody will have because of its cheapness, and great excellence and value. Now is the time to subscribe and secure the work for the whole year. In thirty days from the first of last January, we had not a copy left to complete sets, so great was the demand, our rule being "first come first served." Send us one dollar, and receive the Magazine at the earliest moment after it is printed, and for a whole year.

HAVE YOU SEEN IT?—Ballou's Holiday Pictorial—with over seventy large and elegant engravings, forming a mammoth folio sheet, and something worth preserving. For sale at all of the periodical depots for ten cents per copy. Any person who desires a copy of this unique and beautiful sheet, has only to enclose us ten cents and a copy will be forwarded by return of mail.

DON'T RHYME.—A poetess down east said, "Shakspeare wasn't no poet because his plays wont rhyme." No more wont Milton's great epic, ma'am, and yet critics consider that "some pumpkins" for a "pome."

A CONSOLATION.—People who die penniless have this fact to console them—that their children always inherit their property. With rich people the case is different, the most of their effects going to the executors.

A MEMENTO.—A haunch of venison reminds us of a deceased friend—because it is the deer departed.

STRANGE, IF TRUE.

The following story is going the rounds of the papers without comment. Dr. A. C. Stiles, of Bridgeport, Conn., has a boy professing to possess the faculty of locating and prescribing for the ills which flesh is heir to by clairvoyance. Mr. William Clarke, of Westville, had an ox which appeared to be ailing, and cut off a lock of the animal's hair under the chin, which hair so nearly resembled that of the human head as not to be distinguishable from it by any ordinary observation. The hair was sent by letter to the boy at Bridgeport, and a prescription requested. The boy advised Mr. Clark to kill his ox, as it would not be able to work much more on account of a blow across the back which had injured the kidney and spine. The ox was killed, and the kidney and spine found as described by the boy.

BY THOUSANDS!

Wherever Ballou's Dollar Magazine is seen and becomes known, it draws forth lists of subscribers from all classes. The poor man says, "Well, I certainly can afford one dollar for such a work, with its fine illustrations, and mirth-provoking humorous pictures, and its hundred pages of choice reading each month;" and so he sends his money. He knows that its influence in his family will be good, that at a trifling cost he supplies to his children attractive means of improvement and rational enjoyment. Those who are more liberally supplied with money, are nevertheless ready to save two dollars by subscribing to a magazine for one dollar a whole year, in place of the old price, three dollars; and so our popular enterprise goes on, and the subscribers pour in upon us by thousands.

WORK TO DO.—The highway commissioners are respectfully informed that the "path of rectitude" sadly needs repairing, though there is so little travel over it.

THE MORMONS IN LONDON.

The English papers are pretty severe in their reports of the sayings of the Mormon knaves and blockheads in the great English metropolis. It seems they had a meeting in Tetotal Hall lately. At the outset the assemblage engaged in singing, in a loud strain, one of their favorite hymns, led on by Elder Bernard, to the tune of "The Low-backed Car." The purport of this song was the long looked-for day when they would all get to Zion (Utah). It seemed to be rather a painful effort to Brother Bernard, and it was decidedly so to those of the audience who happened not to be Mormons. One of the elders sang a song styled "Sectarian Non-sense," one verse of which ridiculed the absurdity of a man when he is ill going to a doctor, as the Gentiles (i. e., all who are not Mormons) do, instead of going to an elder of the church to be healed. Elder George Read then recited a piece about "The Bishop's Banquet," describing the good living of the right reverend prelates—a recitation which was singularly mal apropos and in very bad taste, seeing that it was immediately followed by the Mormonite refreshments—apples and pears on damp and dirty waiters, with little cakes and biscuits, which were stale and unsavory. These were washed down by copious draughts of pump water from large jugs. Another elder then indulged in a "little harmony" about "Sleepy Parsons," the chorus to which was:

"Heigho! you sleepy parsons!
Ha! ha! ha! ha! what a lark!
After all your college learning
You will find you're in the dark."

Elder Benson described Brigham Young as the best and holiest man in the world, and said he did not wonder at the sisters falling in love with him. Every good man, he said, ought to have more than one wife. He said he would advise the editors who abused them to consult their works, and they would find everything "as right as tatars." He indulged in a variety of jokes of the same class. Our English friends should learn that these rascals and boobies are as much despised and looked down on this side of the Atlantic as they can possibly be on the other.

TIGHT TIMES.—The state of the money market may be inferred from the fact that a musical organ-grinder refused to discount notes, the other evening, until he received a glass of beer as "collateral."

A GOOD EXCUSE.—One of the Lazy Club was complained of for running. His defence was that he was going down hill, and that it was less labor to run than walk. Complaint dismissed.

INGRATITUDE—AN ALLEGORY.

A wise and venerable bramin of the East, whose austere virtue and expansive benevolence had won for him gifts of mighty power from Vishnu, while meditating in his solitary walks, beheld a small dog fleeing in terror from a ferocious mastiff. The pursuer fast gained upon his panting prey, and had already crushed him to the earth beneath his heavy paw, preparatory to devouring him. The good bramin promptly interposed for the preservation of the oppressed, and by the exercise of the mighty power which his deity had given him, at once changed the little dog into a powerful tiger. The tiger prostrated the mastiff on a single blow, and revelled in his life-blood. The bramin turned and fled in terror from the spot. When being questioned why he feared the tiger and fled from him, when the latter had so much cause for gratitude to him, as the preserver of his life, he answered:

"I am the only living person that knew him as a little dog."

And such is life. Gratitude for favors received is too often smothered in hatred for the giver, because of his knowledge of the recipient's former destitution. In miserable, false shame concerning former circumstances of poverty or destitution over which he could have no control, man often loses sight of the real shame which he should feel for a want of gratitude towards his benefactor. In fact, the very sense of obligation to gratitude seems to engender hate in some men's minds, and a vengeful thirst to injure those who have benefited them. There are many tigers of to-day in the world, who were the puppies of yesterday; and having now slain the mastiffs which sought their lives, their eyes glare wildly in search of the benefactors who have known them as puppies, that they may slay them too, and thus obliterate all knowledge of their former puppy lives. The moral is, O reader of ours, when you make a great man of a puppy, expect no favor from him, look for no gratitude, but shun him as you would the plague.

A GOOD INVESTMENT.—A company was formed, two years ago, in France, for rearing bees on a large scale. Its apiaries have this year produced 111 per cent. profit on the original outlay! In one case the original cost was 3838 francs, and it produced 4277 francs.

RATHER UNFEMININE.—There is a lady at Melton, England, who shoes her own horses. She can shape a shoe and fit it to the hoof as handily as e'er a bearded smith of them all. This is Venus usurping the province of Vulcan.

THE AMERICAN INDIANS.

The inevitable destiny of the Indian race to retire before the white man, and abandon the hunting grounds of savage life to the settlement and culture of civilization, is so clearly written in the past and present history of our country, that even the most mawkish philanthropist cannot interpose a well-founded objection thereto. That a mere handful of savages should be permitted to shut out vast regions of the most available portions of the continent from occupation and improvement by civilized man, simply because they range through these regions and use them for hunting grounds, is a doctrine too absurd to be admitted. It is in direct conflict with the laws of nature, and the best interests of the human race; it is revolting to reason and justice, because it sacrifices the rights and interests of the many to the few. Equally absurd would it be to permit the blood-thirsty treachery and rapacity of the inferior race to prevent the peaceful and beneficial spread of the superior race over the lands thus monopolized by the former. But while the superior thus has a right to dispossess, or rather supersede the inferior, there is a corresponding obligation on the part of the civilized race to protect the savage, and provide amply from its abundance for the necessities and comforts of the latter.

Acting upon the view of the rights and duties of civilization, the United States government has so shaped its Indian policy, that vast tracts of territory have from time to time been reclaimed from the Indians, as the growth of the country demanded, and at the same time the Indian tribes have received ample equivalents for the privileges given up by them, in the shape of money, provisions, clothing, implements of labor, new lands adapted to their numbers, instruction in the arts of civilized life, and protection from hostile tribes. The business of the Indian Bureau of the general government has gradually grown up in the course of time, from the simple duties which a single clerk discharged, to an immense amount, requiring the constant labors of a commissioner, sixteen clerks at Washington, and thirty-three Indian agents, nine superintendents, and a large number of teachers and other employees, in the Indian country. The annual expenditures for Indian purposes is nearly three millions of dollars, and the amount last year paid to the Indians for annuities in money or goods, but mostly money, was about one million of dollars. During the four years past, fifty-two treaties have been made with various Indian tribes, by which about 170 millions of acres of land have been acquired or re-acquired by the government, at the cost of eleven millions of dollars and upwards in money, besides other considerations of benefit to the Indians, including reservations of land for their occupancy, amounting to over nineteen millions of acres. In this time the jurisdiction and agency of the Indian Bureau has been extended over 500,000 square miles not before included therein.

By these facts it will be seen by our readers that our government does not steal land from the Indians, but acquires it by treaty, and remunerates them liberally therefor besides providing for their future location and welfare. There are at the present time within the limits of the United States, about 300,000 souls of the Indian race, the greater part of whom are west of the Mississippi River; there being only about 18,000 east of that river, and they principally in New York, Michigan, Wisconsin, N. Carolina, Mississippi, and Florida. Of those west of the river, there are about 100,000 in California, as many in Minnesota, and the remainder are in Texas, New Mexico, Washington and Oregon Territories, Utah, and on the plains and Rocky Mountains. The present policy of the government for the removal of Indian tribes, differs from that originated during Mr. Munroe's administration, the feature of independence with separate government being now abandoned, and a system of colonization under the supervision of our government being adopted in its stead. Contact with the white race is found to prove fatal to the Indian. He acquires the vices of his white brother, loses his own virtues, and sinks lower in the scale of humanity than before. Therefore the present plan is to colonize the Indians into tracts of country of extents suitable to their numbers, in locations where they will be completely isolated from the whites, and then to administer their affairs by a government agent, introducing schools, religious teaching, agriculture, and the mechanic arts among them.

This plan has thus far produced very successful results, reclaiming the Indian from his roving habits, overcoming his repugnance to labor as degrading, and inspiring him with respect therefor, diffusing the blessings of common schools among the young, and habituating the mature to the restraints of the Christian religion, and comforting them with its hopes. The most inspiring prospects are thus held forth for the improvement and well-being of that race. The system of isolated colonization under government supervision has been successfully introduced among the Indians in California and those of Texas. Last year upon the reservations in Texas, there were colonized about 1500 Indians, showing an increase of over 400 from the year before. They have fenced in and cultivated 740 acres of land, and have made some progress in erecting houses and other improvements, and are under the care and direction of competent government agents, who express strong hopes of success in improving and civilizing these tribes. One tribe is the Comanches, one of the most fierce and warlike upon this continent; and if they can thus be won over to the arts of peace and the ways of civilization, there is certainly hope of all other tribes. Similar good results are produced in California, where there are some five reservations for colonization, occupied by 10,000 Indians, with 2500 acres of cultivated land thus far, and permanent buildings, and encouraging prospects of still further progress.

This plan of colonization is to be extended to other localities, and by its aid it is hoped that the Indians may eventually be made citizens, and be able to sustain their share in the management of public affairs. It would be a happy circumstance if these remnants of powerful tribes that once roamed over this continent, could be rescued from destruction and incorporated into civilized society—a noble solution of the problem of the red man's fate!

The Indians in Michigan, about 7000 in number, are becoming elevated in the scale of civilization, under these influences. They do not want to emigrate to the far West, nor do the people around them desire to have them go. This speaks well for their progress and good conduct. The Oneidas, at Green Bay, Wisconsin, are also advancing in civilization, and will eventually become citizens. The Wyandots, in the Kansas region, are about to emerge from their tribal condition, hold and own their lands in severalty, and assume the status of civilized life. They have for years had common schools among them, and governed themselves by a code of laws of their own. The Chippeways and Ottawas also cultivate the soil for a living, and have their own laws. The Cherokees and Creeks, as well as the Choctaws and Chickasaws, are already semi-civilized, as well as the Pueblo Indians in New Mexico, a well-behaved and amiable people, numbering about 7000, and among our latest acquisitions. The Seminoles in Florida have been a source of great trouble and expense to our government, and the Seminole war has become almost a permanent institution among us. A part of that tribe some years ago, emigrated to the region of country west of the Mississippi, occupied by the Creeks, and became blended with the latter tribe. They felt humiliated by being thus denationalized and made subject to the Creeks, and became idle, reckless, and a burden to themselves as well as the Creeks. This state of affairs became known to their brethren in Florida, and the latter have in consequence, refused to emigrate, preferring to infest the Everglades and prey upon the people of Florida. Lately, however, by a treaty with the Creeks, a portion of their country has been set off for the exclusive possession and occupancy of the Seminoles, and there is now good prospect that the Florida Indians will join their brethren in this new territory, and thus in a peaceable manner, the everlasting Florida war be done away with.

The sketch which we have thus given of the state of our Indian affairs, the doings of our government, and the prospects for the future, cannot but be gratifying to our readers, for it seems that this troublesome question of Indian policy is better understood and treated now, than it has ever been before. It must be a source of pride to every American, to see the encouraging and liberal manner in which his great and powerful country deals with this feeble and decaying race. Intemperance is the greatest bane of the red man. Being by nature rash and impetuous, with little mental restraint for self-government, the Indian seems to be the ready victim to the demon of alcohol, and base, selfish men have not been wanting to stimulate and feed this accursed appetite, for the sake of gain. Of late years, by the Intercourse Act, the general government has by stringent measures prevented the introduction of spirits among the Indian tribes, and in this good work the State governments within whose jurisdictions Indians exist, have cheerfully co-operated. The evil of intemperance is therefore much diminished among the tribes, and as the present system of Indian administration becomes matured, the evil will be still further circumscribed. This temperance reform among them is indispensable to the success of any measures for benefiting and improving the Indians, and for the sake of the red man as well as the white race, we most heartily bid it god-speed.

HANDEL THE COMPOSER.

Handel was a musician not only of great judgment, but also of extreme delicacy. He husbanded his means, and did not always employ them at once. And this is an example which is not much followed in these days. It is stated that an old manager of a certain London theatre, seeing, at a rehearsal, that the horn-players were quiet, asked them why they did not play. On their answering that they were counting their "rests," the indignant manager exclaimed: "Rests, indeed! I pay you to play, and not to rest; so, either play up or go away." The composers of the present day belong a little too much to the same school as this good man; for they seem to think that the instrumentalists, the kettle drummer included, are not worth their pay if they are not scraping, trumpeting, and rattling away from one end of the score to the other. This has spoilt the taste of the age; for it has led people to believe that the more hands there are at work, the finer the music must be. A great mistake—for the sole effect is to make it more costly.

It is a singular circumstance in Handel's life, that his genius gave him an indirect part in almost all the events of his century. His music was required to celebrate successively the birthday of Queen Anne, the marriage of the Prince of Wales (George the Third's father), that of the Princess Royal to the Prince of Orange, the coronation of George the Second, the burial of Queen Caroline (all great events in those days), the Peace of Utrecht and that of Aix-la-Chapelle, and the victories of Culloden and Dettingen. To this day, there is no great public funeral at which the Dead March in Saul is not used for the purpose of impressing the mind with the solemnity of the occasion.

But let us, in this connection, remind our youthful readers that however prodigious may be the gifts accorded by nature to her elect, they can only be developed and brought to their extreme perfection by labor and study. Michael Angelo was sometimes a week without taking off his clothes. Like him, and like all the other kings of art, Handel was very industrious. He worked immensely and constantly. Hawkins says that "he had a favorite Rucker harpsichord, every key of which, by incessant practice, was hollowed like the bowl of a spoon." He was not only one of the most gifted of musicians, but also one of the most learned. All competent critics admit that his fugues prove that his knowledge was consummate.

REMEMBER THIS.—No entertainment is so cheap as reading, and no pleasure is so lasting.

THE RULING PASSION.

Malherbe's scrupulosity as to grammatical minutiae became, in effect, a veritable religion to him; insomuch that on his death-bed—nay, in the last agony—he gave vent to his irritation at the solecisms of which his nurse was guilty, and, as we are assured, scolded her right smartly, in spite of the remonstrances of his confessor. The poor confessor was only snubbed for his pains. "Sir," protested the dying man, "I will defend to my very last gasp the purity of the French language." And when the good father tried to work upon his patient by describing the life to come, but in a somewhat prosy and unpicturesque manner—and thereupon asked if Malherbe did not feel a great yearning after the speedy fruition of all this happiness—the answer was: "Say nothing more about it, or your wretched style will disgust me with the place altogether."

PLENTY OF SKIES.

Ambrose Phillips, the poet, was very solemn and pompous in conversation. At a coffee-house he was discoursing upon pictures, and pitying the painters who, in their historical pieces, always draw the same sky. "They should travel," said he, "and then they would see that there is a different sky in every country—in England, France, Holland, Italy, and so forth." "Your remark is just," said a brave gentleman, who sat just by; "I have been a traveller myself, and can testify that what you observe is true. But the greatest variety of skies that I ever found was in Poland." "In Poland, sir?" "Yes, in Poland; for there is Sobiesky, and Sarbiensky, and Jabonsky, and Podebrasky, and many more skies, sir."

SPEAKING AUTOMATON.—It is said that somebody somewhere has made an automaton which can converse fluently in three different languages, but we guess its only a "figure of speech."

RANK IN CRIME.—An exchange speaks of a certain person as a "first-class scoundrel." Are there "lords, gentry and commons" in guilt as in British society?

A COOL ORDER.—Man with a dog (to barber)—Do you do curling here? Barber—Yes, sah! Man—Well, just see what you can do with my dog's tail, will you?

AGRICULTURAL FAIRS.—We think it is decidedly a "Boston notion" to hold these institutions in our midst. They are very attractive.

OTHER PEOPLE'S BUSINESS CLUB.

One of our exchanges chronicles the formation of a club for the purpose of more effectually ascertaining the business of other people generally. It has already attained a large membership, and promises a flourishing institution. The following are some of its rules: Any member of the society who shall be convicted to know more of his own business than of any other's, shall be expelled from the society without a hearing. No member shall be allowed to sit down to his own table until he has ascertained to a certainty what his neighbors within three doors of each side of his house shall have to eat—whether they have paid for the same, and if not, if they expect to. Every member who shall see two or three persons engaged in conversation shall place himself between them until he has heard all they have to say, and report the same accordingly. Every gentleman visiting a young lady more than twice, shall circulate the news that they are going to be married, and said members are required to report all manner of things about the lady to the gentleman. This will break up matches, and afford much gossip.

THINK OF IT.—If every lady in the country would resolve not to buy another silk dress for a year to come, millions of dollars would be saved to our country, which would be a complete panacea for "hard times." The gentlemen might make a similar saving by limiting their consumption of tobacco. Other nations are our creditors for silks, tobacco, and other superfluities, and to pay for them the country is drained of its specie, and money becomes tight.

HOT WEATHER AHEAD.—A French astronomer declares that in consequence of a favorable change in the currents of the ocean, a cycle of heat embracing several years, of which the present is the commencement, may be unhesitatingly looked for. So that the currents of the ocean may have a good effect on the cuprants of our gardens next summer.

SHARP LADS.—"Out West" the law gives damages for apparent breach of promise. The bachelors, however, obviate the difficulty by labelling their cards "Good for this call only!"

THE NAPOLEON HALL.

In the Louvre at Paris is a large hall devote to relics and mementoes of Napoleon the Great. This collection presents a great variety of articles used by the emperor in his daily life. Among the most interesting are his watch, stopped at twenty-five minutes past five; his camp table, of oak, one foot by three; his case of mathematical instruments; a pair of fine gold candlesticks, as left, with candles nearly consumed; his toilet set of gold, and perfume bottles with contents yet remaining; his pistols, swords, hats, coats and vests—the coat worn at Marengo, among the rest; his gold snuff-box, cane, imperial crown and robes, and the handkerchief he used upon his death-bed at St. Helena. These relics of the Mighty Corsican are worshipped by the enthusiastic Parisians with as much fervor as though they were portions of the true cross.

ARCHITECTURE.—"In architectural design," says Ruskin in a recent lecture, "imagination is the first great quality. It is the quality that distinguishes great from mean artists, and no instance is known of a great man with deficient imagination. Industry is essential, but industry alone does not make a great artist." Mr. Ruskin contends that "it is a mistake to separate sculpture from architecture; the architect should be his own sculptor."

GIGANTIC TREE.—There has been cut in Calhoun county, Ill., a tree that produced 5000 staves and six and a half cords of wood, which sold for $74 50. Square miles of such timber, of less size, but big enough for staves, railroad ties, and all kinds of wood-work, line the Ohio River in Kentucky, at ten dollars an acre, and no buyers.

THE BIBLE IN TURKEY.—The British and Foreign Bible Society has disseminated in Turkey 90,000 copies of the Scriptures in nineteen different languages, but still more are needed; double that number could easily be distributed throughout that empire.

TRUE ENOUGH.—One of our exchanges says that the recent conduct of the Sepoys has been "revolting." We rather think it has been revolting from the first.

AN ODD PURCHASE.—William L. Coby, a benevolent old gentleman of Huron, Michigan, recently bought a little blue-eyed child from her drunken parents for $3000.

A man named John Fee, living near Bullock's Creek, S. C., in a fit of anger, shot his horse and some cattle and hogs, and the next day set fire to his house, which he had previously locked. His three motherless children, aged from five to fourteen years, are supposed to have perished in the flames. He was arrested.

A HALF HOUR'S TALK ABOUT VARIOUS MODES OF CONVEYANCE.

OLD-FASHIONED STAGE-COACH.

Every one is interested in the machinery of locomotion, and the modes of getting from one place to another are intimately connected with the progress of civilization. The extraordinary development of civilized power and wealth in the present century is owing to the abundant agencies for conveying individuals and masses from one point to another, which have had their birth within the memory of living men, who are not yet aged. And each day almost yields some illustration of the adaptability of STEAM, the crowned king of the age. The "Leviathan" of to-day throws into the shade the steamship of yesterday, and we are now told that steam locomotives for traversing the highways and streets are not impracticable.

It is not our purpose in the present article to consider these lightning modes of conveyance; but rather the slower modes of travelling which satisfied our immediate predecessors, illustrating, as we ramble on familiarly, the most curious pleasure-carriages and vehicles that we note in casting our eyes over the various quarters of the globe. And our pen and pencil are first attracted to the old-fashioned stage-coach, as it comes sweeping down a country road with its team of four dashing horses, with passengers inside and out, doing its ten miles an hour, including stop-pages.

Within a very few years, as we have said, a complete revolution has taken place in the system of locomotion. The young men about town can still remember, almost vividly, when the first New England rail-car was launched upon its adventurous career. Nay, the machinery of railroads is still a novelty. Though the long trains daily meet our eyes, though we may daily travel in them, though at night their rumble shakes our pillow, and their thunder fills our sleep, still they seem, in a measure, dreamlike and unreal. Their extraordinary power idealizes such unpoetic elements as ribs of iron, plates of steel, ponderous wheels, and masses of wood. What wonder in all the "Arabian Nights" is comparable to this daily marvel? The Arabian enchanter transported his heroes from place to place on a bronze horse, or a flying carpet, or in a house; but on the railroad we behold hourly whole blocks of palaces flitting from town to town and city to city with the speed of light.

FARMER'S CART, KHOSROYAH, PERSIA.

THE RUSSIAN DROSZKY.

But one should never speak ill of the bridge that has carried him safely over, and our enthusiasm for the new system of locomotion should not cause us to forget the old. A thousand pleasant and interesting associations cluster around the good old stage coach system—the reliable dependence of the public for so many years. As we look to those days—not, indeed, very far remote, when our streets were filled with the thunder of arriving and departing coaches, a tender regret takes possession of our soul. For a moment the railroad is out of favor with us. We are willing—for a moment only—to forget the great blessings it has conferred upon mankind, and to remember all the ills that are chargeable to its account. We conjure up dreadful accidents—accidents of enormous magnitude, involving the carnage of a battle; we dwell upon fluctuations of fares and unreasonable suspensions of accommodations; we review the record of defaulting treasurers, and bitterly think of the money sunk in projects of branch railroads that lived upon assessments and died for want of funds. For the time being, we become, not of the present, progressive, but of the past, foggy. Old scenes, old friends, come thronging back upon the memory. We recall the excursions, pleasant, fairy-like, because performed in that golden season of life when fancy paints a rainbow on every cloud, and even tears have their prismatic colors. We recall bright mornings in June, with the dew glittering upon the elms by the wayside, the sunlight backing white villages, and brightening the floating clouds, and dimpling the streams with radiant sparkles. We behold ourself seated beside the coachman—perhaps, O, joy of joys! entrusted with the “lines”—lines drawn, not over the backs of “three blind ones and a bolter,” but four shining bay nags, half-blood, whirling along the freshly-washed carriage, with its nine inside, and a huge pile of baggage on the rack behind, as if it were a feather. Fleetly and gaily the gallant leaders skim the road like deer, tossing their heads, their little sensitive ears in motion, sometimes fondly nestling together, sometimes parting in the freedom of their stride, the heavy wheelers bravely following, up and down hill, at the rate of ten miles an hour. If we can take our boyish eyes off the horses—those magnets of attraction, we have ample time to scan the scenery; for the trees do not whiz by, like a troop of wild witches bound for their sabbath on the Hartz, as they dash by the windows of the cars; but the landscape moves slowly, gracefully changing from one kaleidoscopic figure to another.

We recall, too, pleasant drives in the sharp autumn weather, with nerves braced up like the chords of a drum; pleasant mornings, mellow noons, and cool evenings, coming down on the landscape, and darkening all but the broad track over which our horses patter rapidly, as they approach the welcome village inn, the termination of the stage and the day's journey. What a bustle the arrival of the coach caused! The day's work over, all the male villagers were congregated in the streets. The village blacksmith, leaving the horse he was shoeing, would come to the door of his shop to catch a glimpse of the coach, and exchange a friendly nod with the driver. The village belle, decked in her best, sat at her window "a love-lighted watch fire;" and how her little heart fluttered in her bosom, when, from the buff gauntlet of the driver, a snow-white letter, a missive from the distant lover, winged its flight to the very window-sill of the expectant maiden. But the largest representation of village curiosity, wisdom, wit and wealth was to be found at the favored hostelry where the stage stopped. The figures of the village idlers and magnates were defined against the glowing background of the bar-room windows, ruddy with the light of generous oak and nutwood fires within; for, in those days, wood was plenty, before the confounded railroads devoured our forests, doubled the price of fuel, and reduced us to the ghastly substitute of anthracite.

What a bustle as the coach drew up, and the portly coachman, tossing his reins to a hostler, descended with dignity from his box, like a king from his throne! The first greeting was for the driver. He felt his importance. It could not be otherwise; it was not in human nature to be proof against the flatteries of which he was the object. When the Duke of Saxe-Weimar was travelling in this country, and waiting for the coach in the sitting-room of an inn, an individual opened the door, and presented himself with the following salutation:—"Are you the man that's going in the coach? 'Cause I'm the gentleman that drives you!" The duke was too sensible a man to be offended. The gentleman who held the reins and guided the conveyance over the corduroy roads of Georgia was, at that moment, of far greater importance than the individual committed to his care, and knew no reins but the reins of state—far easier articles to handle, according to Chancellor Oxenstein.

The ladies handed from the coach, the gentlemen extricating themselves, the luggage unstrapped and carried into the house, the male travellers congregated round the bar-room fire, the habitual frequenters of the place, the village politicians, and the village bon vivants courteously making way for them, and removing from the focus of generous heat. Then how many questions would be asked and answered! for the stage-coach was the messenger of news. In those days people were not crammed with news, as they are now, when every important village has its journal or journals. Perhaps since the last stage-coach, a packet had arrived from Europe, bringing forty days later intelligence. There was no such thing then as regular weekly arrivals, with scraps of intelligence, trivial items about a queen's sneezing, or a princess's birth. A European arrival could not fail then to bring a good solid budget of news, ample food for discussion for a month. Slow and sure was the motto of that day. We never heard, in those days, of fast young men; and if there were few slow coaches on the road, there were plenty of them off the road. How easy it was to make a reputation! A few verses, written by an aspiring country clerk, who "penned a stanza when he should engross," copied in a clerical hand, sent to a Boston newspaper, and there inserted, coming back with the author's initials, in the "poet's corner," to the chimney corner of the bar-room of the inn, at once made the fortunate writer a village Milton. From that time forward he was the oracle of tea-tables, the idol of blue stockings.

Every bar-room had its brace of political oracles then, the champions of their respective parties; for then the science of multiplying parties was unknown. There was the sturdy old federalist and the sturdy old democrat, hammering away at each other with incontrovertible arguments, and keeping up a never-ending warfare. Then there was the school-master, always appealed to to settle abstruse arithmetical questions, and, of course, the squire. Squires were not created in batches as they are at present, and no one but him who bore the legal title was ever addressed as such by letter or by word of mouth. The squire, of course, was always the high court of appeal in cases involving the quirks and quiddities of law, and if he was well read up in the "Axe relating to a Gustus Pease," of course he gave his decision with oracular emphasis. To complete the picture, throw in a dozen brawny teamsters, huge, stalwart fellows, who drove six in hand, and resided, the greater part of their time, on huge, covered baggage-wagons, beneath which an immense mastiff kept perpetual watch.

The favorite paper in the country, in those days, was the "American Traveller," a weekly sheet, edited by Royal Porter, and containing, in addition to news, poetry, romantic love tales, letters of travelling correspondents.

But we are keeping our stage-coach company from supper. The bell rings, and a regular stampede takes place to the banquet-hall, as towards the cabin of a steamboat under the same circumstances of want and supply. With what a relish the stage-coach passengers sat down to the hot supper in the dining-hall! It was a plain apartment, with pine chairs, a pine table, and room-paper curtains to the windows. There were no splendid hangings, no French mirrors, no service of plate, no damask table-cloths, no Turkey carpets, no rosewood chairs, which make up the charges in our modern entertainments. As Hastings says: "We passengers are to be taxed to pay all these fineries. I have seen a good sideboard, or a marble chimney-piece, though not actually put in the bill, yet inflame the bill confoundedly." But solid creature comforts were not wanting. The table quite groaned with hearty luxuries, eaten with appetites unknown in these days of French cookery and dyspepsia. And the cherry-cheeked Phillises, real rustic beauties, added a charm to the hospitable entertainment.

There was a poetry and picturesqueness about those old days of stage-coach travelling lacking to our present mode of progression. The horses were changed every ten miles. The relay was ready, and in the hands of half a dozen active servants. The moment the coachman pulled up, the horses were taken out and found their way to the stable, while the fresh team were "put to" with incredible celerity, scarcely giving time to the passengers to alight and stretch their legs, in the fashion of Mr. Squeers, Senior. "Stage ready!" was shouted with stentorian lungs, and every one sprang to his seat, the whip was cracked, and off thundered the vehicle once more.

Macaulay gives a picture of the introduction of improved stage-coach travelling in England, which will serve as a contrast to the railroad system we propose to speak of next. "During the years which immediately followed the Restoration, a diligence ran between London and Oxford in two days. The passengers slept at Beaconsfield. In the spring of 1669, a daring innovation was attempted. It was announced that a vehicle, described as the Flying Coach, would perform the whole journey between sunrise and sunset. This spirited undertaking was solemnly considered by the heads of the university, and appears to have excited the same sort of interest which is excited in our own time by the opening of a new railway. The vice-chancellor prescribed the hour and place of departure. The success of the experiment was complete. At six in the morning the carriage began to move from before the ancient front of All Souls' College; and at six in the evening, the adventurous gentlemen who had run the first risk, were safely deposited at their inn in London. The emulation of the sister university was moved, and soon a diligence was set up which in one day carried passengers from Cambridge to the capital. At the close of the reign of Charles the Second, flying carriages ran thrice a week from London to all the chief towns. But no stage coach, indeed no stage-wagon, appears to have proceeded further north than York, or further west than Exeter. The ordinary day's journey of a flying coach was about fifty miles in the summer; but in winter, when the ways were bad and the nights long, little more than thirty. The Chester coach, the York coach and the Exeter coach generally reached London in four days during the fine season, but at Christmas not till the sixth day. The passengers, six in number, were all seated in the carriage, for accidents were so frequent that it would have been most perilous to mount the roof.

The ordinary fare was about two-pence halfpenny a mile in summer, and somewhat more in winter. This mode of travelling, which, by Englishmen of the present day, would be regarded as insufferably slow, seemed to our ancestors wonderfully and indeed alarmingly rapid. In a work published a few months before the death of Charles the Second, the flying coaches are extolled as far superior to any similar vehicles ever known in the world. Their velocity is the subject of special commendation, and is triumphantly contrasted with the sluggish pace of the continental posta. But with boasts like these was mingled the sound of complaint and invective. The interests of large classes had been unfavorably affected by the establishment of the new diligences; and, as usual, many persons were, from stupidity and obstinacy, disposed to clamor against the innovation, simply because it was an innovation. It was vehemently argued that this mode of conveyance would be fatal to the breed of horses and the noble art of horsemanship; that the Thames, which had long been an important nursery of seamen, would cease to be the chief thoroughfare from London up to Windsor and down to Gravesend; that saddlers and spurrers would be ruined by hundreds; that numerous inns, at which mounted travellers had been in the habit of stopping, would be deserted, and would no longer pay any rent; that the new carriages were too hot in summer and too cold in winter; that the passengers were grievously annoyed by invalids and crying children; that the coach sometimes reached the inn so late that it was impossible to get supper, and often started so early that it was impossible to get breakfast. On these grounds it was gravely recommended that no public carriage should be permitted to have more than four horses, to start oftener than once a week, or to go more than thirty miles a day. It was hoped that if this regulation were adopted, all except the sick and lame would return to the old modes of travelling. Petitions embodying such opinions were presented to the king in council from several companies of London, from several provincial towns, and from the justices of counties. We smile at these things. Our descendants, when they read of the opposition offered by cupidity and prejudice to the improvements of the 19th century, may smile in their turn." The old stage-coach used to wait for tardy passengers; the modern railway train knows no such amiable weakness. It is inexorable as fate. The cars, like tide and time, wait for no man, woman or child. The "all aboard!" of the conductor is as imperative as the laws of the Modes and Persians, and when the bell rings, off goes the train with the speed of a rocket and the noise of thunder.

Most of us remember the excitement caused revolutionized the social life of New England. They have introduced into its most remote portions the refinement, elegancies and solid advantages of the city. Over these iron conductors, literature, art and music have sped with the speed of lightning. The dweller of the Green Mountains and the resident of Tremont Street have become neighbors. The settler on the Aroostook no longer need be a stranger to the Berkshire mountaineer. And, while to the rural citizen this new mode of intercourse has tended to brighten his existence, to link him in closer bonds of kindness and interest to his fellows, expanding his mind, and filling it with cosmopolitan ideas, it has poured many a ray of sunshine into the dark places of the city. It has enabled families, confined before to murky and unhealthy haunts, to make familiar acquaintance with that nature which they had only known in books. Hundreds of families have availed themselves of this cheap and rapid mode of transportation to remove to the suburbs, where they now enjoy pure air and bright sunshine, and have little patches of flowers and vines clustering round their own little homes. It has invited forth the opulent, who have crowned the adjacent hills with princely villas and liberal culture. It has redeemed from idleness and desolation thousands and thousands of acres of waste wilderness, causing it to blossom like the rose. Say not that railroads are unpoetical, or, if unpoetical themselves, acknowledge that they give birth to poetry and beauty. If the scream of the whistle and the thunder of the train invade some spot hitherto sacred to elegant retirement, we must remember that for every individual annoyed by its invasion, the locomotive unseals the eyes of thousands to the holy and happy influence of Nature in her ever-varying yet ever-glorious phases.

In some parts of the old world, stage-coaches, or rather lumbering diligences, are still the only resource of the traveller, particularly in portions of Spain. The Spanish diligence is a cumbersome affair, in many respects resembling the old French diligence, now nearly fallen into disuse, and quite as clumsy, drawn by nine or ten mules and one horse, pushed to the top of their speed by the shouts and whips of the drivers and postilions. Where a long team of mules is used, the driver generally carries a bag of stones with him, which he hurls from time to time at his animals with unerring precision, and these stones are sometimes used with terrible effect upon each other when two muleteers chance to come into collision. The diligence is divided into three compartments, the seats of which vary in eligibility and price. The vehicle is a quaint and curious old world affair, a huge ark, a mass of timber, iron, leather and glass. It would be top-heavy but for its breadth of beam. Still, the royal diligencia sometimes makes good speed, thanks to frequent relays of mules. But "slow and sure" is the motto of these conveyances for the accommodation of the public. Their drivers have a very great respect for the fable of the hare and the tortoise. Still, it must not be supposed that a journey in a Spanish diligence is void of all romance. By no means. To say nothing of the interesting character of the country, with its broad vegas, and stern sierras—its rivers with names as musical as their waves—the storied cities through which you by the opening of the Providence Railroad, June, 1834. At that time, the road to Dedham being finished, the public were invited to test it, and a train of six cars well filled made the excursion to Dedham and back in good time. Doubtless many of the adventurers in that untried mode of locomotion made their wills and settled all their worldly affairs before embarking for the trip. The sad experience of later years has shown that such preparation is not always unnecessary. To say nothing of what they have added to the wealth of the community, railroads have completely pass—the picturesque but uncomfortable posadas at which you halt—the manners and costume of peasants, innkeepers and priests, which have changed little since the immortal Cervantes wrote his history of “that ingenious gentleman, Don Quixote de la Mancha,” there are “inklings of adventure,” which occur to almost every one who travels much in Spain, worthy to figure on the pages of romance. What say you to a highway robbery, Senor Traveller? The jaded mules are dragging your diligence through a rocky defile skirted with wood on either hand. We will throw in an escort of half a dozen cavalry soldiers by way of picturesque effect. Suddenly a group of fancifully clad villains, such as you see on the operatic stage, well mounted and armed with carbines, pistols and sabres, appear in the road, and the leader, in a loud voice, commands the driver to halt, on penalty of a brace of bullets in his cranium. But you have soldiers—they will beat back the ruffians and clear the way. Not a bit of it. Tout au contraire. The escort haven’t the slightest idea of showing fight. They know that pure Castilian blood is too precious to be wasted in a highway brawl. They discharge their carbines at random, and then turn bridle, set spurs to their nags, and gallop off at a furious race, saving their necks if not their credit. Robber No. 1 now makes the driver and passengers alight, appropriating their watches, rings and purses by way of remuneration for his polite attention. The order is now given—boca a tierra (faces to the ground), and you must lie down prone to the earth, so that you may not witness the rifling of the diligence. Woe be to you if you raise your head after the command! One of the robbers is on the watch, knife in hand, and if you venture to disobey, he will insert the blade between your shoulders with such practised skill that you will never know anything more in this world afterwards. The robbers are very expeditious in their operations, and in a short space of time you have the exquisite pleasure of hearing the sound of their horses’ hoofs dying away in the distance. Your watch is gone, but you may console yourself with the indisputable proposition of Bombastes Furioso—“watches were made to go.” Your spare cash has been abstracted—but you have still a circular letter of credit in your pocket which was of no value to the robbers, and then you have not an extra ounce of lead in your cranium, or a stiletto stick in your pericardium. This is no fancy sketch. On the contrary, such an event used to be very common in Spain, and is still not such a rare thing as to cause any great amount of concern. Lieut. Slidell was robbed in this way, and gives a graphic account of it in his “Year in Spain.” The salteadores of Mexico, in this country, are the legitimate descendants of those of Spain, and their manner of operating is identical. The Spanish mules employed in drawing the diligences are very serviceable, and frequently very handsome animals. J. N. Hambleton, Esq., of the U. S. Navy, as quoted by J. S. Skinner, says:—“Mules are more used in Spain and Portugal than in any other countries I have visited. The king of Spain used them for his carriage when I was in Madrid, and most of the grandees. In Lisbon, I was told $1500 were often paid for a pair of carriage mules. The Duchess of Bra-ganza (Don Pedro’s widow) was a decided mule-woman, and drove six of the most splendid grays I ever saw. Donna Maria used English horses. I went through her stables with her coachman, who was an Englishman. He told me that in that mountainous country, native horses were best for service—mules better than either. I travelled in the diligence from Barcelona to Madrid, via Valencia, four hundred miles and back. Mules were used the whole route, six to the team, and travelled as fast as our stages usually do. Their public vehicles are much heavier than ours.” Mules are raised extensively in some parts of our country, and have made advocates. They are hardy, free from disease, are in their prime at the age when the horse begins to decay, and require but two-thirds of the feed of a horse. Their proverbial obstinacy is rather the effect of bad breaking than a natural characteristic.

The next engraving of our series represents a Persian farmer's cart—a sort of truck with very clumsy wheels, drawn by a couple of buffalo bulls. The rude vehicle is pretty well loaded with passengers, to say nothing of the market baskets. A young man is enlivening the journey by playing an air on a rustic pipe. These people belong to Khosrovah, a village situated in the middle of a fine plain near Lake Ourmyah, three or four days' journey from Tabriz, the capital of Azbaidjan, one of the ten provinces of Persia. Its inhabitants, numbering about 1200, are of Chaldaic origin. They were formerly Nestorians, but are now Catholics, having been converted to Catholicism about a century ago. Industrious and intelligent, these people have succeeded, notwithstanding the taxes which burthen them, in acquiring a degree of ease in their circumstances not common with the subjects of the Shah. Persia is poor—the people generally occupy, in common with their cattle, miserably cold and smoky huts. At Khosrovah, the houses are clean, large and well built. There are many gardens, and the cultivation of the surrounding lands attests more agricultural knowledge and care than is generally found among the other farmers or rayahs. Artificial irrigation is almost everywhere employed in the raising of crops, and is an art perfectly familiar to the Persian agriculturist, having been practised from the remotest antiquity.

The Russian carriages are quite curious, and one of these—the “droshky”—is represented in our third engraving. Besides the sledges, which are in daily and general use during the winter, the Russians employ the same carriages used in other parts of Europe; at least this is the case in the great cities, where the aristocracy are getting more and more to adopt the fashions of France and Germany. The true Russian vehicles are always open; only women and old men make use of covered carriages. Among the vehicles in most common use, there are three particularly whose appearance strikes the eye of the stranger—the droshky, the teleka, and the kibitka. The droshky, as our picture shows, is a sort of very low and very narrow tilbury, and is particularly used by officers and young men. Although but one horse is ordinarily used, certain elegants add a second outside the shafts. The horses are matched in strength and form, but not in color. The postilion, who is a young man wearing the national costume, sits on one side or in front of the vehicle; he is called the “crier,” because his principal duty is to warn pedestrians who might otherwise be run down by the droshky, driven with the speed of an arrow over the frozen snow, which extinguishes the sound of the wheels. The fill-horse is always an excellent square trotter; the other is used for show, and is called the "furious." Shaking his long, natural or artificial mane, goaded by his master, he bounds along, prancing or galloping by the side of his soberer comrade. The droshky, like most Russian carriages, is furnished with furs often of great value, but is otherwise quite plain.

The teleka is a travelling carriage, employed by couriers, officers on missions, or travellers provided with a padroche—a document emanating from competent authorities, and which is always a recourse to the posts established by government. These last bear no resemblance to those met with in other countries of Europe, and their organization belongs to Russia itself. For their establishment the government builds a post-house, kept by one employee at every stage. All the nobles of the neighborhood are required to keep a number of horses and telekas proportioned to the importance of their domains, which is estimated by the number of their peasants. Government employees, sent on missions, are served gratuitously with these carriages and horses, travellers furnished with the necessary requisition, pay the postilion about two cents for a stage of four leagues; they are, moreover, allowed to pass the night at the stations, on condition of making up a bed, and furnishing their meal with what they bring in the teleka. The emperor contents himself with keeping up the houses, lighting, warming them, and paying the clerks who have charge of them. The horses employed for these journeys are of ordinary appearance, but very spirited. The Russian postilion never stops singing or talking to his horses, they climb all the hills at a gallop, and thus accomplish about fifteen miles an hour. The kibitka, referred to above, is less of a carriage than a wagon, and is employed only for commercial purposes. The trader who has to transport his wares, his cloths and furs to the fairs established over the whole surface of the empire, has no other means of conveyance. Sometimes you see hundreds of kibitkas on the great roads paved with trunks of trees, like our corduroy roads, driven by a very few men. In this way all transportation of goods is carried on in Russia—the traders stopping at every hamlet where they have a chance of finding purchasers.

The next engraving represents a curious cart used in the agricultural districts of India. There are few things more necessary to good and successful agriculture than suitable farming implements, and proper vehicles for the removal of produce to market, or the conveyance of manures to the fields under culture. The carts used by the people in the cotton districts around Broach, in Gujerat, afford a striking illustration of this, and are probably the best in India, in point of use-falsehood and adaptation to the purposes for which they are required. Without so much as a single mile of made or metalled road in the whole country, these carts, by having the wheels proportioned so as to fit the ruts exactly, move as if on tramways, and are drawn about from village to village by one or two pairs of bullocks, carrying heavy and bulky loads, weighing from twelve to eighteen hundred weight. The village machinist, carpenter and blacksmith make up the carts according to a fixed scale. The frame and other parts are all strongly morticed and fastened by wooden pegs. The pole extends from the axle-tree to the cross-bar by which the bullocks are yoked; it is formed of two pieces of tough wood, running separate from near each of the wheels, and uniting in front in a point. It is a powerful lever in turning or moving the cart. Round about, and forming the sides of the cart, there is, stretched by ropes, a plaited basket-work, made of cotton plant stalks. The wheels are the most important parts of the whole, and exhibit ingenuity and mechanical skill in their construction. Four equal sized segments, of the hard wood of the indispensable Acacia arabica tree, are contained in the tire, which is four inches broad; and forms a circle of from three to four feet in diameter. The axles are of iron, and work in plate-iron boxes, let in to the nave. It is very rare to find iron nails used in the fastening of the different pieces of the cart. The morticing is found sufficient, and the framework lasts for many years, also the wheels—in fact, until worn down by time, or broken by constant work. One or two pairs of bullocks are yoked in these carts, and the above sketch gives a very correct representation of the style of cart and cattle. It will be observed that the feet of the bullocks are not visible; this is because they walk in the ruts made by the wheels. They must do so, and the whole secret of the facility and speed which they travel depends on this. The ruts, when once formed, remain as permanent roadways, and particularly in the black cotton soil are distinct and durable, like tramways. They are about five inches wide and as many deep. Very little care is taken to preserve these ruts. The earth itself becomes so hard in the dry season of the year (and it is only from then that carts can be used at all in Gujerat), that a little filling in of loose earth occasionally, by the poor villagers, where holes may happen to be worn too deep, and who get a few pice from the cartmen for their trouble, is all that is ever required, thought of, or attempted. In nothing are the poor people of Gujerat more fortunate than in respect of cattle. The bullocks used in agriculture are remarkably fine, docile, and powerful animals. Large numbers are reared on the extensive sandy plains in the north of Gujerat, and on the borders of the Rann of Cutch, where extensive natural pasturage abounds. Their color is generally white, with the ears, tip of the tail, and circle round the top of hoofs, black. The height at the shoulder of the largest is six feet, but a smaller-sized animal is found to be more useful for agricultural purposes. The large ones are prized by the wealthy members of the community for their carriages and travelling carts. Ordinary sized animals are valued at sixty to eighty rupees a pair.

The "Norwegian carriage," of which we next present a sketch, is of very peculiar construction, and very much resembles a sledge on wheels. It has no springs; the shafts being very long, render the use of them unnecessary, and give the carriage a very easy motion. It only carries one person in the small seat shown in the drawing; and the back portion of the vehicle is intended to carry luggage, but is occasionally occupied by a second person. The harness is very similar to that of a cart-horse of a light description, and the reins are made of ropes.

Following this we have a most singular German carriage of the 16th century. In different special works on the history of carriage-making, or on the improvement of the means of transportation in the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, we read that a mechanician of Nuremberg, named Hans Haustsch, "made carriages which went by a spring, and accomplished two thousand paces in an hour." Our engraving is a copy from an old German cut representing one of these singular vehicles guided by Hans Haustsch himself. Notwithstanding active researches, we have not yet found any explanation of the motive power adopted by this man of skill: it is probable that the mechanism was very similar to that of a turnspit or a clock, and that the machine had to be wound up at occasional intervals. It was therefore an object of curiosity rather than a useful vehicle. The little toy-wagons, imported from Germany, and which go of themselves for a minute round a table, are perhaps only miniatures of Hans Haustsch's carriages. However that may be, we thought it would not be uninteresting to give an exact representation of one of these old vehicles; it may stimulate the attention of persons learned in these sort of things.

The next engraving represents a highly ornamented sedan chair of the age of Louis XIV. These chairs were carried on poles by two men. They were very convenient, as they could be taken into a hall, where a lady in full dress stepped in and was then transported to the ball, theatre or saloon, without any exposure to the weather, or danger of soiling her dress or shoes. The "sleigh" or sledge of Louis XVI's time is copied from one preserved in the carriage gallery of Versailles, France. It was the property of the dauphin, father of Louis. During the reigns of Louis XV. and XVI. sleighing was a passion with the court, the more so, because snow was, as it still is, a great rarity in France. A contemporary, who was valet de chambre and hair-dresser to Madame Dubarry, has recorded in his memoirs, yet unpublished, that they were short of drivers for this exercise, which, according to the French, demands great experience and special skill. There was a great competition for drivers, and some were paid as high salaries as head clerks. The same historian relates that Madame Dubarry, who occupied Luciennes after the death of the king, and wished to indulge in the amusement of sleighing during the winter of 1778, carried off a very expert driver from M. de Vergennes, on his return from the Swedish embassy, and this cost her the trifle of £4000.

A pony phaeton, used by Queen Victoria, forms the subject of our next illustration. The height of the fore wheels is only eighteen inches, and of the hind wheels, thirty inches. The phaeton is cane body, of George the Fourth style, with moveable head; the fore part is iron, but very light and elegant, and beautifully painted. The tires of the wheels are wide, to prevent cutting up the lawns and grounds around the palace. The workmanship is very beautiful; it bears no sign of royalty, but a small crown painted at the back.

The small engraving that follows, represents the veritable carriage formerly belonging to Washington. It was left by the general to Elizabeth Powell, since which time it has come into the hands of John Ham Powell, Esq., of Philadelphia, nephew of Elizabeth. It has not had horses harnessed to it for forty years, and is now in perfect order.

The modern Syrian cart, shown in the next engraving of our series, is a very cumbrous concern, with solid wooden wheels, and bearing pretty heavily upon the oxen that draw it. The yoke is of formidable dimensions, and were not the cattle very hardy and strong, they would sink under the burden, placed on them.

The omnibus of Constantinople is a fanciful concern. The body is raised very high above the perch, and the sides are curiously carved in oriental fashion. Attached to the tongue are two light curved rods, which support a series of tassels, purely ornamental additions to the equipage.

The next engraving represents the mode of travelling in the mountainous tea region of China. In spite of its oddity, there might be more unpleasant modes of locomotion. The traveller sits, it will be seen, in a light seat suspended between two stout bamboo poles, supported on the shoulders of two men. There is a rest for his feet, and with a palm-leaf umbrella over his head, and a basket of refreshments slung conveniently at hand, gets over the ground much more comfortably than his bearers.

The next picture represents one of those little two-wheeled chariots, in which the maids of honor, according to the Dutch travellers in Japan, are accustomed to take their airings. These are represented as very elegant equipages, according to the Japanese taste; they have gilt and silver plates at the extremities, the spokes of the wheel are of cedar carved and gilded, and the tires are of copper. The seat, which accommodates only one person, is spread with tapestry, which descends between the wheels; the front part, of an oval form, is open, while a stately canopy overhead protects the fair occupant from the sun and rain, and she draws her curtain when she pleases to keep off the wind. The propelling power is a stout man, with poles across his shoulders.

Following this is a representation of the chariot of a noble Japanese lady, drawn by oxen and led by a servant. The oxen are sometimes harnessed with golden chains. There are carriages with steps of eight angles to ascend them, each corner adorned with a couchant dragon. The outside is curiously painted and gilded—with several pictures framed in richly carved panels. The Japanese have certainly exalted ideas of luxury, though they may not coincide with us in their notions of taste. But that there is no disputing about tastes is an axiom as old as Horace.

Our series closes with a graphic and spirited delineation of the Neapolitan "Calesso," or "Corricolo," a curious vehicle, which attracts the attention of every stranger in Naples. It is a singular carriage, and may be said to hold any number of passengers. Our picture shows how many may be stowed in and about it. The seat is a tripod resting on a pole with very high wheels, which, in their rapid revolutions, create a constant cloud of dust. After the front and back of the carriage are full, more people clamber on to it, as they will persist in piling up one of our omnibuses or horse railroad cars on a stormy day. Even the net which hangs beneath receives its contributions of children and dogs. The driver cracks the whip, and away goes the "calesso," at a slashing pace, amidst clouds of dust, the cheers of the lookers-on, and the running accompaniment of beggars, the invariable escort of travellers in Italy.

When we come to view the general arrangements connected with the vehicles and the travelling in any country, we find the relative scantiness of the population to have a good deal to do with the matter. In Russia, for example, where desolate plains or "steppes" spread far and wide, and where the climate is generally very rigorous, the accommodations for travelling are of a comfortless kind. Spain, which resembles a half-civilized country in so many particulars, is in a very backward state in all that relates to roads and vehicles. Carriages are few in number and bad in construction; and the roads are even worse than the carriages. From various causes, mule-travelling may be regarded as the national one in Spain. The Italians were among the first to use coaches, and are in general very fond of riding. The Neapolitans are exceeding ly fond of driving—almost as much as of eating maccaroni. However much a nobleman may be impoverished in fortune, he keeps his stud and his carriages to the last, and even stints the daily economy of his household to retain the means of so doing.

The two most notable vehicles in England, perhaps, are the "Lord Mayor's state-coach" and the "Royal state-coach;" both of which huge masses of ornament are wheeled through London streets a few times in the year. With respect to the first of these, and the civic dignity for whom it is intended, it has existed very little less than ninety years. The lord mayors of London used formerly to go to Westminster on horseback, on the day of "swearing in;" but the mayor for 1452, Sir John Norman, introduced the water pageant and procession, as being much more imposing, the distance to the water side being travelled on horseback. This plan continued in operation till 1712, when a splendid state-coach was provided for the street cavalcade; four horses were at first used, and afterwards six; and in some of Hogarth's pictures we have an opportunity of seeing the kind of coach presented in his day. The present coach was built in 1757, by subscription among the aldermen; and each successive lord mayor bore the expense of keeping it in repair. It afterwards became the property of the corporation, and has been frequently renovated and beautified since; the body and framework are profusely carved and gilt; and the panels contain allegorical paintings from the pencil of Cipriani. Except for pleasure-riding, however, and for short distances, coaches may be said to have had their day, and horseflesh has been supplanted by steam.

THE NEAPOLITAN CALESSO, OR CORRICOLO.

A SERENADE.

BY LIZZIE MORSE.

When purple clouds float round the moon,
That crowns the eastern breezy hills,
And softly glow their silver plumes
O'er all their blue brake-hidden rills—

Then, love, I'll wake my harp to thee,
And gently touch its softest strain;
For thus at eve thoughts float o'er me,
That dimly all the day have lain.

When purple clouds float round the moon,
Wafted on by the southern breeze,
That shakes the hawthorn's fragile bloom,
And hangs a harp on the cypress trees—

O, list then, love, to the song I'll wake,
A wild and plaintive song 'twill be—
Like the dying swan to his native lake,
Thus my last song I'll sing of thee.

When purple clouds float round the moon,
And silvery mists half veil the stream,
And rose-trees in the bower of June
Are softening in the full moon's beam:

Then wild, exulting songs I'll sing,
Of joy, and hope, and mirth,
And every note in my harp shall ring,
Of thee, dear one, who gave them birth.

THE KING'S PAGE:

—OR,—

THE BROKEN HEART.

BY KATE KEITH.

It was a gay day in Falais. All the French nobles were flocking to witness the signing of the treaty between Henry II. of England, and William the Lion of Scotland; and moreover, the beauty of the kingdoms had wended its way thither. The sun shed its most brilliant beams on the court jewels and plumes, and the eyes that vied with them in brilliancy were lit up with smiles.

William looked around him with a pleased expression, but his gaze became fixed when it encountered the fair form of La Belle Ermengarde, or, in other words, the far-famed Ermengarde de Beaumont. There were many, very many brighter eyes, but none so soft and sweet as her's; there were more blooming cheeks, but her's wore the pure hue of that child of spring—the snow-drop. Yet they became at once the richest diamond, when she perceived the earnest gaze of King William. Other eyes noticed it, too, the jealous ones of rival beauties, the Prince Cœur de Lion's, and, above all, the bright, sunny orbs of a young page, in attendance on William, were fixed on her with eager scrutiny.

After the business which had drawn them together was completed, the hours were beguiled with various sports; feats of strength and skill; combats of honor, love, or beauty, while the laugh and joke circled freely. William, and Prince Richard of England, one in heart and temper, joined in the sports with spirit, for William, though yet a prisoner, was detained only till he should fulfil the treaty by rendering homage at York, which would take place ere many days should elapse.

"Did you note the beautiful Ermengarde, Richard?" said William, as they at length sought the solitude of the apartment in which the latter was attended by King Henry's soldiers.

"We will speak of her anon," said Richard, motioning the guards to leave them alone. Then he resumed, "I must first tell thee, ay, and swear it, Will, by all the saints in the calendar, that if ever I sit on England's throne, I will repay all thou hast lost in my cause."

"Nay, nay, Richard. We have had enough of treaties, and castles, and kingdoms, for this day, I will rely on your generous heart; but now, what think you of the lovely Ermengarde?"

"Why truly she is the Norman lily, but I prefer the roses of our own kingdoms. By my knighthood, Will, but I think you are verily smitten. Your hand has set sign and seal to one treaty of homage, and your heart has given witness to another. It has been whispered in my ear, William, that there is a sweet wild flower blooming in your court, and it was thought you might plant it in your bosom. And, furthermore, since you came hither, I have heard that you have transplanted it, to bear it wherever you go."

At this moment William's page entered. Richard gazed curiously at him; he seemed to measure with his eye the tiny foot, and to scan narrowly each graceful turn of the boy's rounded figure; but he hid his thoughts what they might, he gave them no utterance, but rose, and wishing William a good rest, took his leave.

For a minute not a word passed. The boy stood a few yards from William, with a fixed and sorrowful look. At length the monarch held out his hand and said, softly, "Isola!"

In an instant the head was raised, the eyes flashed, and the mouth curved in a bright smile.

"Isola," he continued, "what would you?"

"What would I, William! Bid me not so coolly tell you what I would, because I seek you. What should I want, William, but to read love in your eye? O, I had rather hear you chide me in words of hot anger for interrupting you and Prince Richard; but do not sit with that pitiful smile on your lips. My brain, my brain, William! I have been sitting in my solitude, and imagining you with your beauty on your throne."

"Isola," he uttered, almost unconsciously, "you know I loved you."

"Loved! Why should it not be love? Tell me, am I so changed since I became—alas! alas! not a wife; but what other words can my lips utter—not that which burns in my brain, and chokes in my throat. William, would that I, too, might say, 'I loved you; but see.' And she advanced nervously to his side, then drooping her head on his shoulder, took his hand gently, and placed it beneath her bosom. He started, for it seemed as if her heart were bursting from her side; but tears came to her relief, and she became calm, for she felt that his were mingled with them, and his arms were round her as they were wont to be.

In a few moments she raised her head. Every trace of tear and sorrow had disappeared, as had also William's thoughts of the young and noble Ermengarde; or, if he gave her a momentary consideration, it was to wonder that he could ever think of any, save the bright, child-like being at his side, who had knelt, and was now twining one of her long, fair ringlets around his finger, while he hummed playfully one of her old border ballads. Suddenly she paused, and gazed earnestly as though embodying on her mind's eye some shadow of her imagination, and she softly murmured:

"She is very, very beautiful; if I might bear to look on Scotland's queen, it would surely be she." But she shuddered convulsively as she concluded.

"Isola, rise!" exclaimed William, as he took the beautiful hand which had now forgotten its task. "Come, love, there is none in my heart save you."

"Ermengarde de Beaumont!" she rather shrieked than spoke; "does not her name thrill your bosom? Does it not bring to your mind all that is beautiful? Does not your fancy place her on a throne?"

"No, no, my own Isola!" replied the king, as he regarded her wild look with surprise; "put your arms softly around my neck, love, and tell me in the tones of old you can forgive me."

He needed not to speak again. Her arms were folded about him—her eyes were living in the rays of his—her lips were pressed on those she loved too well.

"Our child, too, William," she said, smiling, "tell me you love him. You have often told me his eyes were very like to mine."

"Ay, Isola, I love him and you; not a jot too well for your sake, but all too well for Scotland's," he murmured. But at that moment he knew not his own heart.

"When, think you, William, this King Henry will let you depart? I am weary of this masquerade habit; it suits me not. I doubt my own seeming; and I oftentimes fancy you will forget the Isola of Holyrood in the masculine figure before you. And our child—'tis true I see him in dreams by day and night—but I cannot see by his smile that he inherits his father's love. I cannot trace the lines of your brow as he grows in beauty." But had she spoken all the truth she might have added, "I like not our neighborhood with Ermengarde de Beaumont."

"Why would you come with me?" said William; "it is more than conjectured that you are not what you seem. The Cœur de Lion has openly avowed his belief that you are—"

"Ah! say it not, William. That word haunts me by day and night. If I kneel to pray, that only will rise to my lips. If I would kiss my child, it rests between his eyes and mine; there is but one time it comes not, I think not of it, with you—with you only! If your smile is bent on me, heaven is in my heart and on my soul. When with you, I am not the guilty wretch of other times; I am then only yours, only yours. But shield me from the eye of Richard; I should tremble beneath his keen gaze." And she sunk on his bosom.

With the next morning's dawn, Isola was tending, as a page, King William's bridle, as the royal cavalcade was wending its way to the seaside, where they were to embark on their way to York. Richard was constantly by William's side, beguiling the way with his ever ready wit and laugh; and even Isola could smile, for she saw that though her sex was no secret to him, he was not one to scorn her condition, nor make it a matter for the gibes of the rude court. Thus they reached York, where William did homage to Henry for all Scotland, and the blood mounted to the temples of Isola, as she heard her heart's idol acknowledge himself the vassal of one, whom, in her woman's pride, she considered his inferior.

As soon as the ceremony was concluded, William was declared free, and received the congratulations of his friends, amongst whom was Prince Richard. After clasping the hand of William, he approached the page.

"Thou art a seemly youth," he said, kindly, and, taking the trembling hand, "wilt thou wear this as a token Richard thought thee so?" And he slipped a beautiful ring on the taper finger.

Isola looked on the face of William for approval, and then, bending her knee, kissed the bestowing hand.

"Rise, rise, young sir," added Richard, "we have noted thy attention to thy master, and could almost find it in our nature to deprive him of such a page, but that he seems to value thee so much."

Again Isola looked in that face she had been accustomed to read, and where she had been wont to see the kindling fire of jealousy, when the nobles of the court made gallant speeches. She looked, and her heart misgave her, for she saw it not there now; she would have given worlds if he had frowned on her, had he spoken harshly to her; but her soul shrank within itself as she noted the indifference of the bow with which he acknowledged the compliment of Richard.

Words may not describe the joy with which this wild, guilty, and yet innocent child of affection, greeted the halls of Holyrood. Her heart bounded, for it seemed to her as if the world had been lost and gained, and that its better security depended on her reaching this home of many happy months; and so indeed her world had been lost and gained; for a woman's world, and I fear me, oftentimes heaven, lies in the little she may call her own, the heart of him she hath chosen whereon to rest her hopes, and centre her deep mine of affection.

Weeks rolled quickly by with Isola, now that she was once again, as she imagined, unrivalled in the affections of King William, and could smile on his child and hers. A buoyant and sunny spirit was Isola's; true, her face had sometimes clouds, as the April day, and lasting, like them, only till the sun should chase away their brief being; and her sun was the bright beam of love, from the smile of him she loved, or the laughing lips of her child.

William's affairs had now become somewhat more settled; Richard of England had succeeded to the throne, and a still closer friendship was cemented between these kindred spirits; consequently, he of Scotland felt secure from any harassing quarrel in that quarter, and was thus enabled to enjoy, undisturbed, many happy hours. It was during such, in the apartment assigned Isola, that she had been essaying all her wit, and her infant's playfulness to draw a smile or an approving look from William, till at length, wearied with the useless labor, and sick in heart and soul—for though he seemed to look on them, she saw that the gaze was vacant, and the thoughts in the society of another—she sat down on a rich cushion, and with the large tears on her long lashes, she proceeded to hush, with a low, murmuring sound, her child to sleep.

"Isola!" at length spoke William. In an instant the sleeping child was laid down, and she was kneeling at William's side. The tears were no longer on the lash, but were trickling on the hand she was passionately caressing, and when she raised her face, there was a bright smile, and, despite the tears, a joyous eye.

"Isola!" he continued, and his calm tone chilled the warm blood that was rushing to her heart. "I would speak to you on a subject nearly concerning us both. Have done with these childish tears; rise and listen. You know that our brave Lord of Roxburgh has thought much of your beauty, nay, has even asserted its worth in tournaments almost numberless."

"Speak not of it, sire. What should Isola care though the Lord Roxburgh should be pleased to worship her as a saint?" said Isola, still kneeling with her lips pressed on the almost withdrawn hand.

"Why, Isola," he returned, "you might become our Lady of Roxburgh—might be held up as the bright paragon of excellence; and now—"

"I am kneeling where I would rather die, than stand at the altar with another. I am, O, God! an unwedded mother, the murderess of my parents, the scorned minion of him for whom I have done all this. Hear me, William! I will go far from you, you shall not even hear from me; but do not ask me to become the wife of another. Will the child of my guilt be the better if his mother becomes a titled wife? Will my heart be less withered when it beats on another's bosom? Will my soul be less weighed down with guilt, if the velvet robes of much cost grace my limbs? No, no, William; tell me you will give me a drug that shall make me and my boy sleep a long, untroubled sleep, and I will bless the hand that gives it; but never, never believe woman's love so lightly given."

For minutes William sat motionless. He had not expected such a torrent of passion to lie in that meek and loving heart; he had tried others and found it different. But that was where the love borne him was in honor conferred, in the presents given, or the power derived; but Isola's was a virtuous mind, though an erring heart. She had loved but once, and her love was drawn from her soul's depths, and never might rest there again. She now rose with a proud and tearless eye, and a pale cheek, and was about to rejoin her child, but William passed his arm once more around her, and pressed his lips to hers. The scalding tears came to her relief, and her head rested on his bosom. At that moment he looked as though he wished she had not fallen, for then might he have proudly placed her on his throne, but now it could not be; and the bright imagination which had filled his soul since he left Falais, came to fill up the picture his heart could not have finished without it.

A servant now entered, and having delivered some despatches retired. William took one of the papers. Isola seated herself statue-like, at a distance, but her eyes were on his countenance, her soul in deep communion with his. He read and re-read the vellum, his eye brightening as it scanned anew the lines. This did not escape Isola; she rose, and taking her sleeping child, once more stood beside the king.

"You are paining your fancy," she said, "to find a speech meet to tell me from whom those papers come, but it is not needful. William, I know they have come from Normandy—the Lady Ermengarde de Beaumont has been wooed and won—the beautiful and happy has consented to share your throne; and surely it is well such a one should be your wife! Yes, the word has been uttered, and it has not broken my heart. William, will it please you kiss the child of Isola's shame, and breathe a benediction on his lips!"

"Isola Montclairn," replied the monarch, "sit down and listen to one whose love you know you have, and the fair child of that love. You have wisdom, and must have expected the time when I must seek from some one of the sister kingdoms a queen, to increase our power, and please our subjects."

"Stay, stay!" she exclaimed, frantically, "you are reasoning. I have not the power to listen to the cold, wire-drawn arguments of policy. I have no reason—my soul is dead within me—my brain is on fire, and my heart is in the grave. Will it please you to bless our child?" And she knelt, holding it up to him, whom William kissed fondly and blest; then pressing his lips to the burning brow of the sweet suppliant, he held forth his hand for her embrace. But she gazed reproachfully at him, and murmured, "William, would you now have me rest my lips on that hand? Will it not soon be leading another to the altar?"

"Pshaw! you are but a silly child," he returned. "I will send one who shall comfort you." And he was about to leave her, but she flew towards him, seized the but now rejected hand, and pressed it madly to her lips and heart. She only felt that a long farewell was printed on her lips, and fell fainting on the couch.

her of whom he had made mention. In a few minutes she began to revive, and raised her eyes to the face bent tenderly over her, to discover if her head rested where did her hopes; but she closed them again, and relapsed into a swoon, when they met the pitying gaze of him whom William had sent to tend her recovery.

"I see! I see!" said the brave knight, "I see, William, the woful wreck thou hast made. O, Isola! why did you reject my suit when I sought you in your father's halls? You were then a pure, bright and beauteous flower, and William would never perhaps have looked on you but for me. I have done all this, and it shall be my effort now to win you from this degraded state. Alas how did you laugh when I painted such a scene as this to your young imagination, and told me I knew how to plead for myself; but that I should think you much more graceful with a throne for your seat, and a crown on your brow, and that among the court beauties I should soon find one to love better than you. Isola! Isola! the throne I would have wished for you would have been a husband's love, and your crown, purity; and my heart tells me that none of the court have power to call forth its affections like you, all fallen as you are. Can Ermengarde love him better than yourself? No, but her wondrous beauty has enslaved him. Isola," and his breath fanned her colorless cheek, "look up, love, the world's scorn shall not touch you—say you will become my bride."

"Your bride!" she said, faintly. "Whose? I am anything, everything. I was Isola Montclairn, the loving, the loved, the dutious—but a thing of vanity called beautiful; now I am, alas! still Isola Montclairn, but how changed; the undutiful, the mother of a nameless boy, the unloved, the loving still. Roxburgh, do you now ask me to be yours? Look on me; are not my eyes dimmed with anxiously watching his looks? my lips, are they not seared with kisses of guilt? my hair which was once your pride to fashion to your will, by turning it in ringlets about your fingers, does not its touch pollute you? And see yonder, thou knowest whose is that child?"

"Ay, Isola, it is your's. I love you, how well you know; in your father's house I loved you when first I knew you had been false to me. I love you now. I will with pride yet make you mine. I will lavish a father's care on yonder playful infant."

But Roxburgh pressed her no further now, for she besought him to leave her. For minutes after his departure, a stranger to past events would have fancied her a beautiful statue. Her eyes were fixed on the setting sun, which threw its bright rays on the rosy cheek of her babe, and her hands braced her dishevelled hair; but at length the tears started, and gushed in streams of passion down her cheeks, and she flung herself madly on her knees, with her head bowed almost to the earth. This relieved her burdened spirit, for though tears were ever and anon upon her face, they were only those of momentary depression, which a look of love would kindle into a smile; but these were the overflowings of a bowed spirit, seeking communion with things not of earth.

"I will call on thy name," she said, softly; "is it possible that years have passed, in which I have thought lightly of the spirits hovering around me in my career of guilt? Father, mother, speak to me. Father, I am thy fond Isola, a child, a very child; put thy hand upon my head as thou wert wont to do, and tell me I am like my mother. Mother, let me hide my face in thy bosom; I am thy child; what child? thou askest. O, I heard thee, mother. I will whisper thee the words—I am the child of wickedness and shame. But look on me now. I dare not pray, mother; thy voice will be heard for me at the throne of mercy. Thou wert used to tell me thy ambition looked not beyond seeing me the wife of Roxburgh. Pray, O, pray that I may be worthy to become his wife!"

Thus she laid bare her heart to her God, praying to become the child of truth; but yet passion would have its sway sometimes, and then she would ask of Him, who alone could give it power and strength, to overcome her sinful love. Roxburgh sought her again, and with joy heard the calm words from her lips, when she consented to be his. But had he known thoroughly that heart in its depths, he would have left her to sink calmly, and with the love of God in her soul, to the grave, without seeking to draw her into fellowship with the world.

But he did not know it, neither did Isola. She fancied that when she should be called upon to acknowledge her queen, she could do so without cherishing a feeling unworthy Roxburgh's wife, or William's liege subject. She had communed with the spirits of those with whom her childhood and the first year of her womanhood had been passed so beautifully, and she felt calm and purified, and she fancied she had released her spirit from its guilty thralldom; but no, she was too strong in her own strength. Perhaps had the crown been deferred, she might have really attained the serenity which she now only imagined she possessed.

hearts and tongues ready to welcome their new queen. The chapel was gaily decorated, and the court displayed an unusual blaze of beauty, for many were the arts used to outshine the far-famed Norman beauty. On that morning Isola knelt in vain—not a prayer rose to her lips; many supplications were in her heart, but alas, they took not the form of prayer. There was but one form before her, but one name would tremble on her tongue.

William led Ermengarde proudly through the admiring galaxy of wealth and loveliness. The ceremony commenced, and he was about to clasp the ring on her finger, when a wild voice rang through the chapel.

"Ermengarde, wear it not! Once I thought 'twould be a glorious thing to see around my finger—but it eats into my very heart—presses tightly round my brain. But I remember, thou wilt be a queen, and I—" The voice ceased, for the mad speaker was hurried out.

There were many there who knew whence the words came; and many more, amongst whom was the queen, who conjectured them to proceed from the lips of some misused wife. King William knew whence it came, and felt whither it went; but above all, Lord Roxburgh was wounded in his soul's depths, for he bore from the chapel his maddened Isola, and soon after he followed her to the grave.

PORTRAIT OF MISS NIGHTINGALE.

She is rather high in stature, fair in complexion, and slim in person; her hair is brown, and is worn quite plain; her physiognomy is most pleasing; her eyes, of a bluish tint, speak volumes, and are always sparkling with intelligence; her mouth is small and well formed, while her lips act in unison, and make known the impression of her heart—one seems the reflex of the other. Her visage, as regards expression, is very remarkable, and one can almost anticipate by her countenance what she is about to say; alternately, with matters of the most grave import, a gentle smile passes radiantly over her countenance, thus proving her evenness of temper; at other times, when wit or pleasantry prevails, the heroine is lost in the happy, good-natured smile which pervades her face, and you recognize only the charming woman. Her dress is generally of a grayish or black tint; she wears a simple white cap, and often a rough apron.—Soyer's Culinary Campaign.

Remember that though the realm of death seems an enemy's country to most men, on whose shore they are loathly driven by stress of weather, to the wise man it is the desired port where he moors his bark gladly, as in some quiet haven of the fortunate isles; it is the golden west into which his sun sinks, and sinking, casts back a glory on the leaden cloud-rack which had darkly besieged his day—Gospel Banner.

THE PICNIC PARTY:

—OR—

THE TWO WEDDINGS.

BY MARY B. DAVIS.

"WELL, Frank, what exceedingly wise thought has taken possession of your brain?" exclaimed Mr. John Brown, as he stood in the law-office of his friend, Mr. St. Clair. "I declare, I have been standing here some moments waiting for you to extend your usual salutation; but all in vain—you continued oblivious to everything around you, until I felt constrained to break the spell, fearing bad results from such deep study."

"I beg your pardon, my good friend, for my seeming indifference to your presence; but as you suggest, my thoughts were rather of a wise nature—or at least I trust there will be wisdom in the perfection of them. But I must hasten to make them known to you, as I shall require your assistance to mature a little plan I have."

"Well, let me hear it at once—I am getting impatient," said Brown; "you can safely hope for my ready assistance in almost any undertaking except matrimony—but think I am too much of a bachelor to venture myself there."

"It savors a little of that; I must confess," returned St. Clair, laughingly; "but you need have no fears for yourself. You recollect Marion Miner, my cousin, and also my father's ward? She is spending her present vacation at our house, and it was she that suggested to me the plan I am about to divulge to you. She came dashing into the room where I sat, last evening, with an open letter in her hand—the very personification of indignation—exclaiming:

"How unfortunate, cousin Frank, it is to be rich and handsome! I fully intend, when I get emancipated from school and seriously think of marrying, of changing my name, donning some simple garb, and going into the country to earn my living by my own exertions."

"Well, cousin mine," said I, smiling at her enthusiasm, "what do you propose to effect by your rustic simplicity?"

"Why, win a husband by my own merits—not by my pretty face, name, or fortune. One of my schoolmates writes me of a friend of hers who has been a wife but a year, whose liege lord told her, unblushingly, that it was her beautiful face and fortune that he wedded—not herself. Now, Frank," continued Marion, seriously, "have a care that you do not win a wife through either of these mediums, or through the romance of your name, particularly."

"So you are going to try some such ruse, Frank, my boy," said Brown, laughing heartily. "And pray tell me in what way I can be of assistance to you?"

"I will. You know how often you have laughed at your plain, unromantic name—Mr John Brown? Well, I have a fancy to borrow it, for a while, and lend you my fortune, with Mr. Frank St. Clair, as a passport into some fair lady's favor; and as you profess yourself impregnable to their battery of charms, you will be in no danger, while I wish to be simply Mr. John Brown, with no pretensions above a fair share of agreeableness, and a tolerably good-looking phiz."

"A new kind of sport, Frank. But where do you propose to go, with your new name?"

"Into some quiet country village, for a few days, shooting and perhaps—"

"Yes," said Brown, interrupting him, "perhaps you will find some 'bright, particular star, and think to wed it. But do not count upon my doing the same thing, for you know I decided long ago to lead a life of single-blessedness."

"Do not be too sure, my dear fellow; you may even get ahead of me, for perhaps you will get a little of my nature, along with your new title. But do you like the plan?"

"Very much; it will be a pleasant change from city life and drudgery. But when do you propose to go?"

"Next week," said St. Clair, "for I am heartily tired of pleas, writs, courts, and in fact everything that appertains to a lawyer's life."

Nestled lovingly beneath the sheltering arms of many a noble elm and chestnut tree, was the quiet village of Glendale, with its picturesque scenery of vine-wreathed cottages and bright-flowered gardens ever tempting the passer-by to stop and admire. Standing coquettishly by itself, on the banks of the beautiful stream which wound quietly through the village, was the residence of Mr. Carson, the wealthiest citizen in the place. Becoming weary of mercantile life, he had left the city, and had chosen Glendale as his permanent home; but being naturally of an active disposition, could not content himself without some excitement. He accordingly purchased a small manufacturing establishment about two miles from Glendale, riding out every day to attend to his business.

He had just returned from the "dell," and was seated in his great arm-chair on the piazza, enjoying the luxurious coolness of the evening, when his youngest daughter Belle, a wild, joyous, madcap creature, came dashing up the gravel walk, and throwing her arms around his neck, exclaimed:

"O papa! will it not be so delightful? we are to have our picnic the day after to-morrow! I have just been to see Carrie King, and she tells me that there are two arrivals in our quiet little place. Only think, papa!" said Belle, without stopping to take breath; "two gentlemen from the city—a Mr. Brown and a Mr. St. Clair!"

"Well, my little wildfire, why does it please you so much? Are you going to take them by storm?"

"To be sure. What an inducement for our party! I have already sent them invitations by Carrie, who has been introduced to them by her uncle who keeps the hotel. But you must let me go now, dear papa, and tell Eva and mama."

"Why Belle Carson! what a looking creature you are!" said both ladies, in the same breath. "Your curls are flying in all directions, and your gipsy hanging upon your arm instead of on your head!"

"O, Eva dear, spare your lecture for another time! I have something delightful to tell you." And she repeated what she had just told her father. "Only just think, Eva! Mr. Frank St. Clair—what a delightfully romantic name! Are you not already in love with him?"

"Hush, Belle! how can you behave so? But what is the other gentleman's name?"

"Listen, sister mine, you shall hear! No more or less than Mr. John Brown! And a splendid-looking fellow he is too, Carrie says."

"Of course—because he has such a horrid name. But I should never fancy him for that; I hate such plain, common names."

"One of them is quite wealthy, Carrie says, and I suppose you will make attacks upon his heart at once," said Belle, teasingly.

"I presume it is Mr. St. Clair," said Eva. "But who have you invited to your picnic?"

"O, all the girls, which will be two for every gallant."

"You have not invited Lily Lee, surely?" replied Eva.

"Surely I have. I would not have slighted her—she is my best friend."

"Are you not ashamed of yourself?" returned Eva, poutingly; and running to Mrs. Carson, exclaimed indignantly: "Mama, Belle should not be permitted to behave as she does. She has invited those gentlemen to meet Lily Lee—a factory girl. I shall die of mortification."

"Not yet, Eva dear, for Carrie is coming to call with the gentlemen this evening. So don't your brightest smiles for the occasion."

The gentlemen were soon announced, and expressed themselves delighted to attend the party. The evening passed pleasantly away—Belle being the life of the company with her quick repartees and lively sallies.

"I like Mr. Brown the best. But such a name—I would never marry him!" said Eva.

"Do not trouble yourself to win him," said Belle, laughing, "for he is poor, Carrie tells me. St. Clair is my fancy of the two, but I hate rich folks. Besides, he is a professed bachelor."

The sun beamed with unwonted brightness the morning for their picnic. Belle was up early, dancing around as gay and happy as the birds. Not so Eva; she was sullen and dispirited, because Lily Lee was to be of the party—for although poor, she was fair and beautiful, winning all hearts by her gentle, artless manners, and Eva feared her as a rival.

"You will go, Lily, darling, won't you?" said Mrs. Lee, tenderly.

"I do not care about it, dear mama, for Eva Carson will spoil all my pleasure, as usual; but as Belle insists upon my going, I think I will."

"What a contrast between the sisters!" said Mrs. Lee. "I think Belle will try to make your time pleasant for you."

"Most certainly, mama; but you seem so feeble, my mind will wander back often to you."

"O, dear sister," said May, a bright-eyed, laughing creature of about ten years of age, "you must certainly go, and I will stay and nurse mama so tenderly!"

"I know you will, my pet," said Lily, kissing her; "and perhaps I had better go, though I scarcely know how to leave my work for a day."

"My poor child," said Mrs. Lee, wiping away a tear, "what a weary life is yours!"

"O never mind, mama," returned Lily, cheerfully; "I am getting along very nicely, and shall be able to keep Johnny in school another quarter. But I must hasten, as the party will soon be here."

The place selected for the picnic was about a mile from the village, on the bank of the beautiful stream before mentioned; so the company preferred walking, and were paired off—each gentleman having two ladies in his care.

The day passed pleasantly and quietly away, nothing occurring to damp the happiness of the gay party except the ill-concealed chagrin and sarcastic expressions of Eva Carson, because Lily was not slighted by the gentlemen as she had hoped, until about four o'clock, when a scream of pain was distinctly heard, and Belle came bounding in terror to where the company were seated, exclaiming:

"O dear, some of you come directly! Lily has fallen, and is unable to rise."

They all rushed at once to the spot, but Brown was the first to reach there. Lily had attempted to reach some of Belle's flowers that grew upon an overhanging rock, and her foot had slipped on a loose stone, spraining her ankle. She had fainted. Belle was frantic with terror, but Brown calmed her, and taking Lily in his arms, bore her to the river's bank, laving her temples until she revived sufficiently to realize her situation. Blushing deeply, she thanked her friends for their kindness, and attempted to rise, but could not stand. She begged to be taken home at once, and Belle insisted upon accompanying her. But Lily forbade it, and wished to go with the lad who had brought their things.

This unfortunate accident soon broke up the party, and they started for their homes. Eva had secured St. Clair as her escort, and Brown accompanied Belle.

"I feel so condemned for asking dear Lily to get those flowers for me!" said Belle, tenderly. "Her sufferings will not be light; she will be so troubled, too, that she cannot attend to her work."

"Why does she work in the factory?—is there nothing else she can do? She seems far too fragile and delicate for great labor."

"Because necessity compels it. She has taught our village school several previous summers, but through the machinations of an enemy, she was this year deprived of it. She has an excellent education, and it was a great grief to her to give up her school."

"Could she get no other school?"

"O yes," returned Belle; "but she could not think of leaving her invalid mother for a single night."

"She has no father, then?" said Brown, much interested.

"No; he died about three years since, and Lily by her own exertion has supplied the wants of the family, since she has a younger brother and sister whom she insists upon keeping in school. Their little cottage is their own, but still it is very hard for poor Lily to get along."

"She is certainly a noble girl, and should be honored both for her independence and tender interest in her family. I shall certainly call in the morning and extend my sympathy. Will you accompany me, Belle?"

"I will, with pleasure," replied Belle, pleased with Mr. Brown's approbation of Lily.

They now separated, and Belle drew languidly near her home.

"Why, my little gazelle," exclaimed Mr. Carson, who was in his accustomed seat in the piazza, "what has happened? Have you lost your heart to-day, and found none in compensation?"

"No, no, dear papa, my heart is unchanged as yet; but I was thinking of our dear Lily. She has sprained her foot badly in attempting to get me my favorite blue bells."

"I am sorry for her," said Mr. Carson, feelingly, "for she is a lovely girl."

"I am not sorry," said Eva, who had just parted with St. Clair at the gate, "only that it gives her that attention from the gentleman which she so coveted. She is an artful, intriguing girl, and I firmly believe she did it on purpose."

"Hush, hush, my child!" said Mr. Carson. "Such a remark is unworthy any one."

"You should be ashamed of such a thought, even," said Belle, indignantly. "She would despise intrigue in any form. I think her the loveliest girl our village boasts."

"Except one," thought St. Clair, gazing admiringly upon Belle. He had returned with Eva's parasol unperceived by the girls, but just in time to hear what they were saying of Lily. Eva had made a deep impression upon him, and he had resolved to see her often, while in Glendale; but her malicious, ungenerous remarks of Lily had unmasked her, and broken the charm with which she was fast binding him, placing Belle in her stead. * * *

"Are you not very lonely, Lily?" said Brown, as he was sitting for the sixth evening in the neat little parlor of Rose Cottage (a name given to Lily's home by Belle). "You must nurse your lame foot tenderly, that you may be able to attend a sailing party which we have in view for next week. I shall have to leave your pleasant little village soon, much to my regret."

"I should be very lonely, but Belle has been often with me through the days, and you have been very kind to deprive yourself of the pleasant companionship of your friends to relieve the tedium of my evenings!"

"It has been no deprivation, dear Lily," said Brown, taking her hand. "I crave no sweeter companionship than that which I have enjoyed here by your side. And may I—dare I—hope," continued he, earnestly, "for your sweet society through life, to share alike my joys and sorrows?"

"O, my friend," said Lily, smiling through her tears, "your words have made me infinitely happy; but I could not leave the precious charge here given unto my care by a dying father. I love you more than I can tell you, but I cannot leave my feeble mother."

"Nor need you, Lily dearest; we can labor together for them, surely, if we love each other."

Just then Mrs. Lee came in, and the lovers besought her blessing.

"You have it, my dear children," said she, laying a hand upon the head of each.

"My children!" what does that mean, Lily?" said Belle, who came dashing into the room, accompanied by St. Clair. "I am crazy to know."

"It means," said Brown, "that I have been making Mrs. Lee for Lily, and she has given her to me."

"Just what Frank has been about," said Belle, giving one of her ringing laughs. "I had half a mind to refuse him, but papa would not let me, fearing Frank would die of consumption. Was he not compassionate, Mrs. Lee?"

"Yes; but why were you going to refuse him, you little madcap?"

"O, you know how I hate rich folks, and always vowed I would not marry any but a poor man. But Frank has faithfully promised to found an orphan asylum, or some other benevolent institution with his money—so you see we shall have 'love in a cottage,' after all."

Frank and John exchanged significant glances, which puzzled the girls very much.

Mrs. Lee and Mr. Carson were let into the secret of the ruse, and liked it much. The gentlemen were to return in three months and claim their brides. * * *

The little church at Glendale was crowded with villagers to witness the two weddings. Very lovely looked Lily and Belle, as they stood with their chosen ones before the gray-haired pastor, and breathed the vows that gave them the cherished name of "wife."

After the ceremony, the company assembled, at Mr. Carson's request, at his house. All was mirth and conviviality, when Mr. Carson asked the mention of the company and related the ruse of the gentlemen—and the object of it—and taking Belle by the hand, led her forward and presented her as Mrs. John Brown, and Lily as Mrs. St. Clair. Belle was in perfect glee, dancing and skipping around the room, while Lily was silent and subdued.

"You are not sorry for the change—are you, my dear wife?" said Frank, pressing a kiss upon Lily's brow.

"No, my dear husband; but it was so unexpected, I can scarcely believe it even now."

"You may safely do so. I am so happy that you loved me for myself, and also that your weary hours of labor are over! May I ever deserve such happiness?"

A happy company they were, as they started the next morning for their city home. Mrs. Lee and Mr. Carson accompanied Lily, at her husband's request. He urged Eva to go with them, but she, feeling too much ashamed of her own unworthy conduct, to enjoy their society.

"Take good care of my darling pet, John," said Mr. Carson, as he pressed a warm kiss upon the lips of Belle. "Remember that kindness will always win her."

Mrs. Carson shed a few tears at Belle's departure; but as Eva was her counterpart and idol, she consoled herself with saying that she hoped that Eva would not throw herself away upon a poor young man, as Belle had done. But Belle was satisfied, feeling that she had thrown herself into arms that would ever shield and protect her from the storms and ills of life.

A CHINESE RACE.

Imagine from ten to twenty shaggy animals of every color and size, from ten to fourteen hands high, some of them resembling bears more than horses, mounted by Chinamen of the most grotesque appearance and costume, and literally covered by housings or saddles nearly as large as themselves. Upon the start being effected, one half of these jockeys are unhorsed, or rather unhoused, and are either biting the dust or waddling after their impracticable steeds. Their companions who manage to keep their seats, and to direct their course in a proper direction, continue to gallop on until some other catastrophe ensues, such as the reversing one of their sheepskin saddles, or the pony bolting with his rider into one of the muddy ditches that line each side of the course; and there are rarely more than one or two survivors that accomplish the whole round. These would, if permitted, continue to gallop to the end of time, or at least, to the end of their ponies, having no idea of the termination of the race, and are often left to do so amidst the cheers of the spectators, so that the one that holds out the longest is declared the winner. The races terminate in balls, dinner-parties, and all the profusion of eastern hospitality.—Fortune's Travels.

SCIENCE VS. THE INSECTS.

The insects and vermin injurious to vegetation present a curious and difficult subject of inquiry. A considerable part of every crop of grain and fruit is planted, not for the mouths of our children, but for the fly, the carculio, and the canker-worm, or some of these pests of husbandry. Science has done something, and will no doubt do more, to alleviate the plague. It has already taught us not to wage equal war on the wheat fly and the parasite which preys upon it; and it will, perhaps eventually persuade those who need the lesson, that a few peas and cherries are well by way of desert on the cheerful little warblers who turn our gardens into concert rooms, and do so much to aid us in the warfare against the grubs and caterpillars which form their principal meal.—Edward Everett.

TIME.

Time speeds away—away—away;
No eagle through the skies of day,
No wind along the hills can flee
So swiftly or so smooth as he.
Like ferry steed, from stage to stage,
He bears us on—from youth to age,
He plunges in the fearful sea
Of fathomless eternity.—KNOW.

"I MUST SLEEP NOW."

BY ANDREW J. WOOD.

I must sleep now; I am weary,
And I fain would rest awhile;
And forget this world so dreary,
In the dreams which men beguile:
I must sleep now; for I'm feeling
A cold hand upon my brow;
And a drowsy is o'er me stealing,
That must blind my senses now.

I must sleep now; for the cold world
Looks upon me with disdain;
As from its respect I am hurled,
Without thought of my deep pain;
It has echoed forth my praises
On the ever-wafting wind;
And while yet the glad song raises,
Casts my form in scorn behind.

I must sleep now; she who kneeling
At the altar as my bride,
While those sacred thoughts came stealing
O'er her husband at her side,
Sacred swore in joy or sorrow,
To be faithful unto me,
All forgot upon the morrow,
And far hence did quickly flee.

I must sleep now; life's no blessings
To detain me longer here;
All the false world's rich possessions
Could not now my sad heart cheer.
Lay me 'neath the waving willow,
Where the stars their night-watch keep,
With the damp earth for my pillow,
For I now must sink to sleep.

* The last words of Byron.

PEALSWEEP'S VOW:

—OR,—

THE CAPTIVE PALE FLOWER.

A LEGEND OF THE WHITE MOUNTAINS.

BY MARY W. JANVREIN.

A PLEASANT summer twilight fell softly around an ancient, rambling farmhouse, situated in a little clearing on the borders of a dark pine forest in the outskirts of old Salem. The young moon already hung her silver crescent in the west, and threw faint shadows across the little plot of greensward before the old house, where a band of children lingered at their play, filling the still twilight with the hum of merry voices.

One little girl, with eyes blue as the flax flower, golden curls and dimpled shoulders, seemed the especial favorite of the group—for they gave her royal precedence in the good old game, "Queen Anne;" made her judge at "forfeits," and carefully shielded her from tripping in ruder games. This was little Mary Crager, born and bred in the neighboring farmhouse, and the pet of all the country children round about, and, despite the cloud that had already darkened the morning twilight of that fair child's life, no laugh rang merrier, no voice was more gleesome than hers. Well is it, that childhood comprehends not the woes that crush the old and stern! Well is it, that even the dawn of human existence is girt with rosy clouds, and we heed not the thunder clouds looming up life's western horizon!

Had little Mary Crager been old enough to realize the terrible blow that made her motherless—that brought a gloom and boding hate to the brow of her dark-visaged father sitting that summer's twilight in the door of the farmhouse, with moody brow bowed on his hard hands—then she had not played so blithely on the green with the happy-hearted little children, who, despite the ban of their mothers—"You must not play with Mary Crager"—had stolen away for an hour's frolic, ere "bed time," which came too early for those eager little ones.

For Thomas Crager lived in the early days of New England, and in the very hotbed of that terrible delusion which found its converts, not only in the unlearned and superstitious, but even in the highest circles—the magistrates, ministers, and even the judges on the benches.

Thus, when the Salem witchcraft ran like wildfire over New England, and scarcely a day or week went by but some "goody" was "bewitched" with divers pains or diseases, and neighbors accused neighbors of sorcery till every man's hand seemed literally against his brother—it was not strange that harmless, inoffensive Goody Crager should be supposed to take the form of a "strange black cat," and perform a variety of feats and a series of attacks which resulted in that goody's apprehension, commitment to Salem jail, and ultimately, in a brief trial her condemnation to be "hung as a witch."

On the gallows in the market place of old Salem, the terrible tragedy was completed which satisfied an excited, deluded populace—which made little Mary Crager motherless, and converted Thomas Crager into a heart-broken morose, gloomy man.

From the execution of his wife, he had turned away with but one purpose—revenge against those who had accused her, and the magistrate who had condemned her to death; and, had not been for the softening, humanizing influence of the prattling child who played around his knee, other tragedies might have been enacted and more lives have been choked out than we yielded on the scaffold in the market place of old Salem.

But the little Mary restrained him. At nightfall, when he came wearied from tilling his cornfield, she stroked his face, climbed his knee, and diverted his mind from its black thoughts by her endless prattle; but often he relapsed into dreams and plans of vengeance—and such were now working in his brain, as he sat in the gathering twilight, while the new moon inverted her silver burn above the forest.

Meanwhile, the children, wearied with their noisy games, had sat down to rest upon the grass, when little Mary Crager, bounding up, said:

"O, let us all go down to the big oak and play keep house. I will be Goody Stanhope, and you shall all be company! Come!" And she held out her little dimpled hands. "Why, Ruth Whalley, if you aint afraid! I aint afraid of the Indians!" And she ran courageously to the forest.

"Nor I either," slyly ventured little Ruth, "only mother said I mustn't stay long, and then it's real dark in the woods now!" And she timidly drew back, glancing to the wood, where already the night shadows were fast creeping.

"Well, let's play a minute—a little minute before you go home," pleaded Mary. "But you do look just as if you're afraid of the Indians; and I aint—for father said the other day they had gone 'way off to Canada, and couldn't steal little children any more. I'm real glad of it, for I shouldn't want to be stole by an Indian!" And despite the boast of not being afraid, little Mary gave a slight shudder of fear, and looked over her shoulder into the darkness.

"Per'aps we'd better not go to the big oak to-night," timidly ventured another of the group, scanning her eyes in the direction of the forest. "It's real dark there, and I'm afraid—let's go home."

"Yes, let's go home!" said all the little girls in chorus. "Come, Mary!"—for Mary had wandered away in the direction of the big oak on the edge of the wood, at whose moss-grown, gnarled trunk they had spent many and many a long summer's afternoon, playing "party" and arranging a tea-table with bits of broken crockery and acorn cups—"Come, Mary!"

The child turned, and her light summer frock fluttered in the air as she ran towards them. But just then the thick drooping boughs of a giant hemlock in close proximity to the oak stirred—a tall form, copper-colored, and lithe-limbed as the mountain deer, darted from out the black shadows, and with one wild whoop of exultation gripped the child—stifling her mouth with his heavy hand—and sprang like a wild deer into the depths of the forest. And the little children, pale and shrieking, ran toward the farmhouse, screaming:

"O, the Indians! The Indians! They've carried off Mary!"

Thomas Crager staggered to his hut, grasped the loaded queen's arm which stood behind the door, and dashed among the dusky pines.

Long years before, "a sun's journey up the Androscoggin from its mouth, in a wild glen by the shore of a little lake that was curiously surrounded by a fanciful setting of evergreen verdure, stood the wigwam of a young hunter."

His name was Pealsweep. Among his tribe he ranked as "a swift hunter and brave"—and none brought down the eagle in his soaring height, or the red deer among the passes of "Agiochook" with surer arrow than he.

In Pealsweep's wigwam, Naniko, his handsome squaw, spread his moose-skin couch, cooked his venison and maize cake, and Oronee, a bright-eyed boy, bounded forth to meet him when he returned from the chase, picked pebbles on the margin of the mountain lake, or sped his tiny arrow unerringly at the black crows that came settling down on the cornfield his mother had planted and tended.

One day when Pealsweep hunted a moose among the mountain gorges, a pale face—penetrating into that upland region from the distant settlement at the mouth of the Kennebec—tarried at the wigwam. Naniko set before him venison, and pounded corn for bread; the little Oronee gave him skins and arrow heads for a shining knife, and laid before him his richest stores—belts of wampum and gay feathers; but the pale face was base and treacherous—he crazed Naniko's brain with the baneful "fire-water"—stole her best and softest deer skins—then tossed the little Oronee out into the waters of the lake, "just to see the papoose swim ashore"—and then went down the mountain side, laughing in drunken glee.

Oronee came in, wet and frightened, and crouched down at his mother's feet; at nightfall he fell into a heavy sleep, and when that stupor passed, the terrible wasting fever crouched also in the wigwam, waiting for his prey. Seven suns rose in the east, and wheeled slowly across the sky to their western setting, the while that blasting fever kept watch in the shadows of the wigwam; and all this time Pealsweep went not forth to the chase, nor sat beside the council fires of his tribe, for the hunter's heart was enwrapped in his boy. He had hoped to see him a mighty hunter, and brave—when the aged tree fell, the sapling must gather strength from its roots; but now, the oak was sturdy and strong, but the lightning had stricken the tender shoot. He buried his face in the moose skins whereon the moaning one lay; he put away food from his lips, and chanted the gloomy death-songs of his tribe; he besought the Great Spirit who dwelt among the rolling clouds on the misty summit of "Agiocheek" that his boy's passage might be swift and bright beyond the sunset.

And swift and bright was the journey of the little Oronce. On the seventh sunset his glazed eyes closed; gaunt, hungry fever clutched his prey, and went out from the wigwam; but the good Great Spirit gathered Oronce to his bosom, and carried him to the happy hunting ground, to launch his tiny canoe on the waters of that bright clear lake on whose margin the foot of the hated pale face had never trod.

Silently Pealsweep hollowed a little grave in the forest, laid his boy therein, placed his tiny moccasins at his feet, and his bow and arrows in his hand, then smoothing the turf above, went into the wigwam. And there, while the white owl hooted from the woods, and the rain dropped down in the black midnight, Naniko recounted the visit of the pale face, which had been withheld from Pealsweep.

The hunter looked long and steadily into the face of his squaw, and the fires of a strong jealousy were enkindled in his heart, a terrible jealousy of Naniko. He spoke no word, but rose and went out into the night. The light had gone out from his wigwam forever. The pale face's steps had defiled it, he had ill-treated his boy, and Naniko had withheld it from him until this late hour. Was not she guilty?

Naniko drooped like a flower under the terrible suspicion that dwelt in Pealsweep's gaze. She had not told him of the pale face's visit, because she felt shame that she had drank of the fire-water; but when little Oronce's step had ceased forever in their wigwam, in her grief the Indian mother told all. But Pealsweep was firm and immovable. When the iron of jealousy had entered his soul, it could not be unriveted. In his heart, he thought Naniko false; and his stern pride was chafed and stung.

"Henceforth my squaw shall eat with the dogs, and shall not sleep at night upon my moose skin!" he said, coldly and tauntingly when he looked upon her again; and from that hour Naniko was his slave, the stain of a cruel suspicion on her head.

But it was not long. As a tender vine torn from its protecting tree, so Naniko drooped and faded, and though she cooked his bear's meat, pounded corn, and brought water for two moons one nightfall, in "the fall of the leaf," Pealsweep came to find his wigwam empty, and his squaw eyes closed in a long, long sleep on Oronce's grave.

That night, though a terrible remorse fastened its fangs on the Indian's stern soul, he made another grave for Naniko in the forest, and sang wildly the death songs of his tribe.

When two moons more had gone by there was held a great council among his tribe. Pealsweep was arraigned before the tribunal; and an old chief rose, and stretching his feeble right arm indignantly toward the gloomy-browed hunter said:

"You have sent your squaw away before the Great Spirit called her. You are a swift hunter and brave; but never make a footmark among the hunters of your tribe, unless you take the cripple that lives by the river for your squaw!"

Pealsweep curled his lip in scorn, turned his back upon the crippled Indian maiden they had set in their midst, and walked silently away into the forest.

That night, the glare of a pine-knot fire before the door of his wigwam, whereon lay the bodies of Naniko and the little Oronce which he had disinterred, flashed fitfully into the black forest; and when morning broke, he brought a box of stout birchen bark wherein he gathered up the ashes—then, raising his strong right arm in the direction of Agiocheek's hoary head, and swinging his stone tomahawk wildly aloft, Pealsweep swore, by the Great Spirit who sat enthroned amid the clouds, a terrible vow—vengeance against the pale face—and dashed away into the unpathed northern wilderness.

Many years had gone by. Time's swift-clinging wing had brought changes to the dwellers on the mountains. The tribes of the red men were scattered, but a feeble remnant lingering in the valleys below; the "mountain of the hoar forehead and home of the Great Spirit" no longer was consecrated to mystery and eternal solitude, for the white man's foot had penetrated to its summit; and in the fresh smiling Amonocuc vale, settlements had been made, and the smoke of cabin fires curled upward on the blue air.

When these settlements were in their infancy and few were attracted thither save those who came to reclaim the untamed soil of the wilderness into cultivation, a moody, silent stranger appeared in their midst. He had scarce reached the middle age of life—judging by his stalwart snowy form—and yet, by the gray hair streaked over his temples, and the faded, weary look of his dim eyes, men thought the shadows of years had passed over him. Or yet, perhaps it was some great grief which had shrouded his spirit in its gloom, and made him wan and weary before his time.

The good yocemen at the settlement besought the new-comer to tarry among them, to rear a cabin and till the soil; but nay! his feet climbed the bald mountain sides, gained a sheltered spot among the dwarf hemlocks, where he reared an humble hut, and made his lonely home. Days, weeks and months went by, wherein the settlers vainly wondered why the hermit of the mountains separated himself from his kind, till gradually, as time passed, and he came rarely among them, they grew to forget his existence, or referred to him only at long intervals.

But the Indian, with all the superstition of his race, beheld in this recluse pale face, a long-expected visitant to their native mountains. A superstition prevailed among their tribe, that whoever dwelt among the shadows of the Great Spirit's home, was protected as that Great Spirit's adopted son; and in this solitary dweller on the heights of Agiochook they recognized, in their simple faith, a being whose advent had long ago been predicted by an old seer of their tribe. So years went by; and in the enjoyment of peace and good will from his red brother—supplying his own few physical needs with fish from the rivers, or game from the forests—the life of the White Mountain hermit sped on.

But if the recluse sought the solitudes of Nature to invoke her "healing balm," then he had committed an error; for each season but deepened the gloom of his spirit, and the heavy lines upon his brow.

Below the mountains dwelt the feeble remnant of a once mighty Indian tribe; and by these red men the solitary pale brother was held in peculiar awe. They respected him for the bravery that led him to make a home, like the soaring eagles, among the rolling clouds; they thought the Great Spirit held daily and familiar intercourse with his adopted son; hence, to propitiate his favor, they often brought gifts of dried venison and maize; smoked with him the calumet, and bade him welcome to their wigwams and a seat at their council fires.

During one of these interviews, while the old warriors, grown garrulous with age, sat together repeating stories of their prowess and cunning against the pale faces, the hermit listened in silent apathy; but suddenly, when an old brave related the deeds of a warrior of their tribe, how he was the subtlest, as well as most daring of them, and most successful in schemes of death against the settlers, and finally closed with the story of the capture of a little pale flower whom he had carried far away into captivity, then the hermit suddenly leaping to his feet, in eager accents demanded the home of the Indian brave. And, early the following morning, ere the white mists began to curl lazily from the mountain, attired in a stout tanned suit, and with his buckskin pouch slung over his shoulder, he set out on a long and toilsome journey through the wilderness.

Through forests unmarked save by the hunter's trail of spotted trees, fording streams that come trembling, foamy and cold from the mountains, and tracking thick underbrushed swamps, the hermit kept on his way, until at the sunset of the third day he parted the hemlock boughs from the doorway of a rude wigwam in the wilderness of Laconia.

An old, gray-haired Indian sat crouching over the hearth whereon a heap of ashes lay smouldering; but he raised his head when the pale face stood before him in the gloom. For an instant the blood of his race was up in his veins, his eyes flashed angrily, and he waved his arm haughtily toward the intruder; then, as if realizing the degradation of his race, and that the white man's foot had indeed gone over him, he bowed his head again upon his clasped hands.

For this feeble Indian, whose footsteps were faint and slow, but whose eye yet flashed defiance upon the hated pale face, whose long life had been but a tissue of revengeful, bloody deeds, wherein he but fulfilled that vow uttered years before to his Great Spirit, was once the mighty hunter and brave, in whose wigwam dwelt Naniko and Oronce—he was Pealsweep!

"What seeks the pale face?" he queried, at length, almost sullenly, casting a defiant gaze upon the visitor in the doorway.

"I have come to learn the fate of my child; where is Mary Crager?" was the reply, in a hollow, beseeching tone.

The Indian cowered for a moment under the strong, eager gaze bent upon him, then turning his own dimmed eyes on vacancy, thoughts which had slept for years, came rushing to his long dulled brain. A panorama of the past swept before him; his own happy home; the squaw whose bright eyes lighted his wigwam; the playful Oronce; and then, two graves in the forest! Again he saw the smoke of the funeral fire he had enkindled; the few faded gray ashes his own hand had scattered on a roaring mountain stream! Would he could have so scattered destruction over the path of the hated pale face!

Then he counted anew the scalp locks of a hundred of the foe that had dangled at his belt—fatal tokens of the fulfilment of his terrible vow; he saw smoking houses, burning villages, and heard the supplications of helpless women and children; and lastly, floating anew before his mental vision, he saw blue-eyed, golden-haired little Mary Crager. Suddenly, recollecting himself, he lifted his eyes. He rose, and taking a pouch from the wall, took thence a bit of bark skin parchment, from which he unrolled a faded bit of coarse blue chintz, and laid it in Thomas Crager's hand!

The strong man, whose hand clutched at it eagerly, grew very pale; great drops of beaded sweat started on his seamed forehead; his knees trembled under him till he sank at the red man's feet; for this faded bit of chintz was a piece of the dress worn by little Mary when stolen!

"Tell me, what have you done with my child? You did not murder her!" And Thomas Crager plucked at the Indian's moose-skin mantle.

"Pale face!" And the old hunter's form was drawn to its fullest height and he waved his right arm aloft. "Pealsweep was once a mighty hunter of his tribe. His wigwam was among his own people; his squaw was dusky-haired and comely; his papoose was bright eyed, light of foot as the young deer, and keen of sight as the eaglet. But Pealsweep went often to the chase, and then the pale face came to his wigwam, defiled his squaw, handled his papoose like a dog, and gave them firewater 'to scorch their blood and the marrow in their veins. Then the fever entered where the pale face's foot had trod, and carried Oronce to the far off hunting ground, where the Great Spirit shall not let the white man come; and when two moons had brought the fall of the leaf, Naniko smiled not—ate no moose meat, nor drank water—she, too, journeyed beyond the sunset. Pealsweep's heart grew big with hate. He made a vow—death to the pale face! And Pealsweep was no coward, his arm was strong and his arrow sure; his tomahawk was of the sharpest stone. Scalp locks grew thick about his belt; he shot down the white papoose like dogs; but he could not kill the little pale flower that smiled up into his eyes. He brought her to his wigwam; he made her his own, till, when she had grown tall and comely, Okeejis came from among the Norridgewogs, and asked the pale flower for his squaw. She followed him to his own tribe on the borders of the big river toward the sunrise; she lives in his wigwam; the pale face must seek her there. Pealsweep hath spoken." And the old hunter relapsed into moody silence.

History records the wealth of the Norridgewogs—a powerful tribe on the rapid St. Francis River, which rushed cold and foaming from the mighty St. Lawrence.

Their village was large, and strongly fortified by natural advantages—the encircling dense pine forests and the rapid river; "their houses were well furnished, and their church richly adorned with plate," says an old New Hampshire historian; and it was among this tribe that the French Jesuits found earliest and strongest foothold in the Canadas, endeavoring to strengthen the cause of the French among them, and excite their enmity against their English pale-face brothers.

And so many a white settler's cabin was fired; his wife and children carried into captivity, afar on the Norridgewogs' homeward trail through the wilds of Laconia, and the forests and snows of Canada, to the Indian village on the banks of the St. Francis.

Already there were many pale-face captives among them—"the hewers of wood and drawers of water" of their conquerors—kept in subjection as slaves and dogs to the red men. Therefore, when the bravest of their braves, the young warrior Okeejis returned from a long southern trail through the wilderness, bringing a fair pale flower for his squaw, to dwell in his tasteful lodge, and array herself in finest fawn skins and gayest eagle feathers, there was much jealousy and bitterness among the dusky maidens of the Norridgewogs.

But Okeejis paid no heed to the jealousies of his tribe. He had won a fairer squaw than any daughter of the Norridgewogs, and it was his pleasure to pay her honor, and to dandle his bright-eyed boy upon his knee.

One night, while the last rays of sunset rested on the rushing river and shot golden arrows through the gloomy pine forests, the pale flower sat in the door of her lodge while her boy played on the little clearing in front. There was something in the twilight, the rays of the sunset, and the proximity of the deep woods, that called up a long-sleeping and dim memory in Mary Crager's heart. Confusedly, as on waking one seeks to weave into form the fragmentary tissues of a dream, so she sought to gather up anew those obscure memories—memories of another home, another people, and another tongue.

The clear brook where Mary went daily to dip water, mirrored a face paler and fairer than any among the women of the Norridgewogs; the Jesuit priest, who visited her lodge often, and learned her the French tongue and the creed of his Catholic faith, had questioned her of her birth and childhood; but memory failed to recall a connected story of her life's early morning to the poor girl. True, she had an indistinct impression of another home than Pealsweep's wigwam among the mountain forests; but what child of scarce three summers ever carries into its future the vivid memories of its babyhood? Neither did Mary; and from the terror incident upon her captivity, and a long slumber in the old Indian's arms, which succeeded her first burst of baby-weeping, she awoke to be soothed by Pealsweep's strangely tender words (for the heart of the child had unaccountably subdued the savage heart); played and laughed over the gay eagle feathers and scarlet-dyed furs in which he arrayed her; and so grew up in his cabin, contented with her lot; and when Okeejis came to ask her for his squaw, she willingly rose, and putting her hand in his, followed him toward his home, "on the big river toward the sunrise."

Pealsweep had bestowed upon her the Indian name of Wenonah, and she had forgotten any other; but that night, as she sat in the door of the lodge, the setting sunlight gleaming over her faxen hair, which time had scarcely changed to a deeper brown, and her thoughts strangely endeavoring to pierce the dusky past, a bent and travel-stained white man came wandering through the Indian village, till he reached Okeejis's wigwam, then sank wearily on his knees before her, and with beseeching gaze and the father tone in his voice, cried, "Mary! Mary!" Then, the pale flower suddenly sprang forward, a new light pierced the mists of her brain, red and white alternately contended on her cheeks, till she sank with a wild cry into the arms of her father.

"Why does Wenonah kneel at the pale face's feet? Is Okeejis's squaw a dog that she should do this?" sternly exclaimed the young warrior, coming towards them from the forest, his boy holding his hand in shy wonder at the strange scene before them.

"Touch her not; let her rest here upon my arm! You would not part me from my child?" implored Thomas Crager, clasping her closely.

And sternly the young warrior stood a moment silently eyeing the pair, then taking his boy's hand, turned away, and rapidly walked in the direction of the village. Late at night he hurriedly returned, and, standing before Thomas Crager, spoke briefly:

"Okeejis bears no evil against his pale brother; but his tribe must not find him in the wigwam of a Norridgewog. Already the braves are on his trail, and Okeejis cannot save him. Let Wenonah choose between the pale face old man and the young warrior who took her to his lodge and made her the mother of his boy!"

Wenonah rose, unclasped her arms from her father's neck, and put her hand in that of Okeejis. Much as she had experienced of happiness in her new-found father; much as she had learned in those hours when the mists had been lifted from her brain; much as her heart went out toward him, yet the associations of her later life, and the love that satisfied her spirit, could not let her follow him. Here, in this Indian village was her home; in this Indian lodge, with its fawn-skin couch, its ornaments of eagle's feathers, elk's horns, and mats of curiously wrought handiwork, dwelt her household treasures—Okeejis and her dark-eyed boy. At heart she was an Indian! Silently, she stepped to Okeejis's side, and put her hand in his.

It was enough! Thomas Crager staggered to his feet and approached his child, clasped her in a long embrace, then put her away with a look of mournful agony in his faded old eyes; feebly groped away a few paces, then returned, and with his hunting knife severed a long lock of her shining hair, which he folded with the bit of faded blue calico, and hid in his breast; then, leaning heavily on his staff, like one stricken with a great age, walked away in the direction of the southern forest.

And Wenonah dropped a tear upon the face of her sleeping boy whom she took from Okeejis's arms, and bore silently into the wigwam. And when, later, a band of Indians armed with war clubs and spears, came to Okeejis's lodge, and demanded the pale face whom their women had seen at sunset bending his steps through their village, the young warrior, raising his deer skin from over the door, stepped forth and said:

"Braves and brothers,—would ye hew down the blasted tree whence the lightning has already stripped every green twig? The pale face, old, feeble, and just ready to be summoned to his own hunting ground, was the aged tree; Wenonah, who rests on my deer skin, is the tender twig! His feet make their homeward trail through yonder forest; but he who seeks to follow him hath made Okeejis his deadly foe for ever after! Okeejis hath spoken!" And dropping the deer-skin curtain, the warrior left them.

Silently, with no word of demur, the braves went back to the village.

A month after, a party of settlers, climbing the mountains, found—lying stark and dead in his cabin—the White Mountain hermit. His wrinkled face wore the sad expression that had characterized it in life; his attire was torn and travel stained; his rough moccasins were cut into hanging shreds, as though he had been afar on a long and perilous journey; and, in his stiff, clasped fingers, he clutched a faded bit of calico, and a long, sunny tress of hair. So died Thomas Crager.

Interested recently in the perusal of a valuable little work entitled "Historical Relics of the White Mountains," it occurred to me that a tale woven from some of the old legends therein recorded, might not be uninteresting; thus, in the preceding story, have I borne in mind the assertion of the author of the volume referred to, that "wild traditions that stalk before us like gigantic shadows speaking from the past, say whether false or true, time-honored fictions in this imaginative age, are as much a legal tender for the literary world as modern facts."

Many years have vanished since those early times; settlements have given place to prosperous towns and cities; the name, "Crystal Hills," lives only in old New Hampshire history; "Agiochook," no longer "the mountain of the snowy forehead and home of the Great Spirit," has been christened anew, "Mount Washington;" the red man, with his poetical nature and sublime fancies, has almost disappeared from our eastern border—a feeble remnant wending their weary footsteps ever westward toward the setting sun—leaving no record behind, save the beautiful names with which they baptized our lakes and rivers, and the memory of those wild, fantastic legends which ought not to fade, but furnish themes for the novelist's pen.

SOURCES OF HAPPINESS.

If you would enjoy the theatre, pay for your admission; if you would stand well with your friends, give them good diners and plenty of them; if you are anxious to spend a fortune, publish books at your own expense; if you want to pass a pleasant day, there's the Thames Tunnel open to you; if you are fond of scandal, live in a boarding house; if you have a taste for law, buy horses and be sure you have a warranty with each of them; if your pleasure lies in grumbling, turn vestryman; if you would sleep soundly, keep the baby out of the room; if you would live happily with your wife, never contradict her; if you would live at peace and good will with all men, get the situation of toll keeper at Waterloo Bridge.—Punch.

THE BEST TIME TO FRET.

Two gardeners had their crops of pens killed by the frost, one of whom, who had fretted greatly, and grumbled at his loss, visiting his neighbor, some time after, was astonished to see another fine crop growing, and inquired how it could be. "These are what I sowed while you were fretting," was the reply. "Why, don't you ever fret?" "Yes; but I put it off till I have repaired the mischief." "Why, then there's no need to fret at all." "True; that's the reason I put it off."—Farmer's Cabinet.

ANECDOTE OF GENERAL JACKSON.

In one of the Indian campaigns, while the army was on the march, still in Tennessee on its way to the scene of war, in Alabama, a drafted company was expected daily to overtake the main body of troops. The company at length reached the rear of the train. Information of their approach was immediately carried to the front, where Jackson was at the time. As the messenger passed from rear to front, the fact that his company had come without arms, having left their guns at home, was made known along the whole line. It was known to the entire army before it reached Jackson's ears. Curiosity was on tip-toe to know how the irascible commander would act under such circumstances. A storm was anticipated. Soon the general was observed making his way rapidly to the rear, and to the surprise of all parties, seeming in rather a smiling humor. Finally he met the company. He saluted them. They looked for a volley of curses and immediate dismissal home—the very thing they desired. Not so, however. Old Hickory pulled off his hat, and with the politest and lowliest bow, he expressed his gratification at their arrival, and especially at the fact that they had no guns—the very men that he wanted, just as he desired them, without arms. Forming them for rapid motion, at double quick step, under his own lead, they marched on until a baggage wagon was reached, then halted, and each man furnished with an axe. Forward, march! again was the word. As they passed along the line of march, the general's object was seen, and laughter, loud and uproarious, with many a hearty cheer, saluted them as they made their way to the front. There these axemen were initiated into their campaign duties. They cleared the roads, they bridged the creeks, or carried the wagons, the baggage, ammunition, etc., over on their backs when the bridges were impassable. They were ever in a post of danger, bearing the burdens of the campaign, sharing none of its honors—and the laughing-stock of the whole regiment.—Mobile Mercury.

A WALK ROUND LONDON.

When the stone in Panyer's alley was placed on its site three centuries since, the circumference was about five miles. At present, however, to take a pedestrian expedition around the metropolis would to some persons be an undertaking of some importance, as may be seen by referring to the following particulars which have been gathered from a recently published map: From Chiswick to Kentish-town, 12 miles; from Kentish-town to Millwall 17 1-2 miles; from Millwall to Chiswick, 28 miles—total, 57 1-2 miles; very nearly three days' journey at the rate of 20 miles a day; and it will be observed that in the line drawn, Battersea, Clapham, Canningtown and other places, which even at present can be scarcely said to be separated from London, have been left out. "As the crow would fly" across streets and houses from the point whence we started at Chiswick to the furthest east, the distance is nearly eleven miles, and the greatest width from north to south upwards of seven miles.—The Builder.

REFORM.

BY MRS. E. S. ANDREWS.

Reform! reform! on every side
 We hear it echo far and wide,
 Though not in deeds, only in sound,
 Only in precept we abound;
 Reform in dress, reform in schools,
 Heaven help us to reform the fools.
 We scour and scrub the cup and platter
 Outside, supposing 'tis no matter
 How loud or much the inside groans,
 With rubbish, filth and dead men's bones.
 Some seek their own defects to screen,
 By feathers, lace and crinoline;
 With gossamer their webs they weave,
 And some take refuge in a sleeve.
 If we would but cast out the beam
 From our own eyes, more clearly seen
 Might be the mote in others' eyes;
 E'en hoops would lose one half their size,
 For while we prate of fashion's trammels,
 We strain at goats, and swallow camels;
 Far better 'twere to mend our lives,
 Teach by example, and despoil
 The paltry trappings pride and sin
 Clothe their vain, idle votaries in.

THE DAY OF SMALL THINGS.

BY EDGAR L. HAMMOND.

It was a plainly-furnished, poor-looking apartment in a small house in the outskirts of the city; and yet, plainly-furnished and poor-looking as it was, this room served as parlor, sitting-room and kitchen, all in one, to those who, until a few months since, had never dreamed of the ills of poverty. It had a single occupant, a pale, sad, anxious looking, yet still beautiful woman, of some thirty-five years, clad in black garments, the robes of widowhood. She was fair, and slender, and delicate; her white, well kept hands showed her unused to toil; but, in the light of the sunset, she was stitching patiently and earnestly away upon some coarse heavy work, ill-fitted for those slight fingers; work such as is found in plenty in close-piled warerooms, by starving seamstresses, but for which is received a pittance that is but the mockery of remuneration, that scarce serves to keep soul and body together. Work, over which are shed bitter, bitter tears of despair and heart-anguish, by strained and toil-worn eyes, that must not close above their labor, even though midnight overtake them, and the dawn find them still plying their task, lest the morrow's bread be wanting, and a more terrible fate shall come.

But Emily Selden, though her tired heart might well give way, dared not weep those tears that many another wept, pursuing tasks like this. They must be kept back, they were a dangerous luxury, and she had a struggle before her that they would not help.

Six months since, in the capital of a distant State, her husband had been a rich and prosperous merchant; but the tide of fortune has its turns for all, and the man who called himself wealthy, wealthy though he might be that day, was a beggar the next. Then the poverty-stricken family, the father, and mother, and their one boy came hither in the hope of a change. There came a change indeed, in the guise of death that took away the main stay of that little band, and left the mother and her son alone to battle with their fate, strangers as they were, in a strange land. They had lived, and that was all, since then, and now, their slender means, the little sum that Mrs. Selden had left after her husband's funeral, was entirely exhausted.

For many a day back young Harry Selden, a boy of fourteen, had been seeking employment. His mother was glad to obtain even the wretched occupation that engaged her now; but every anxious effort had been unavailing, and upon the miserable sum she earned so painfully, it was impossible to subsist. What were they to do?

To-night, Harry Selden, after a day of weary, heart-breaking, fruitless search for work, came home tired and despairing, his frank, ingenious young face betraying his sad feelings. His mother's anxious countenance questioned him concerning his success, as she put aside her work to welcome the weary lad; but she saw only disappointment in his dark eyes, and her heart sank.

"No better fortune to-day than yesterday, mother," he said, with a half sigh. "No one wants a clerk, no one a salesman. No one wants even an errand-boy." He smiled a half bitter smile as he said it.

"Did you ask to be that, Harry?"

Was the mother to be blamed that a secret pain filled her heart as she asked the question? Her handsome, high-bred delicate boy—Edward Selden's son, of whom he had been so proud—an errand-boy! She had hoped for something a little higher. But Harry himself checked the rising feeling of humiliation that, for an instant, possessed the breast of each. He was very young, and had both pride and ambition; but he had a liberal share of strong good sense, as well; and he saw that pride and poverty, in his case, must not interfere with each other.

"Yes, I asked for that, mother!" he said, quietly and seriously; his voice had no longer the sarcastic tone of the previous moment. "For I could get no other situation, and I thought that.

would be better than nothing; but not even that was to be had."

He sighed again, unconsciously, as he concluded. The sigh was echoed faintly from his mother's lips as she turned hopelessly away. Even more than usual trouble sat upon her brow to-night. The boy's attention was drawn sorrowfully to her unquiet countenance.

"What has happened since I went away—anything, mother?" he asked. "Surely, nothing new in the way of misfortune has befallen us!"

"Mrs. Gray came up this morning, and asked for the rent," his mother's voice trembled as she said it; "it is due two weeks now. She must have it to-morrow, or at least a part of it. It is four dollars, and we have not half a dollar in the world, Harry!"

She turned away again with the tears that would rise now, choking her utterance; and Harry covered his face with his hands, in utter despair. But it was only for a moment, he would not give way long.

"Never mind, mother," he said, "we shall not gain the means to pay it, by lamenting over the necessity. Let us hope, at least. Mrs. Gray, you say must have at least a part of the rent, to-morrow? Then I must get it, that is all. Courage, mother! To-morrow I will try again. Who knows what good fortune I may meet with?"

Even through her tears, Emily Selden smiled.

"Harry, you are a dear, brave boy! You give me courage!"

They talked with each other hopefully that night; but the next morning, with the first waking thought of each presenting to them, bare and harsh, the reality of their almost destitute state, and the debt which they had no means of paying, neither could speak a light-hearted word. Their prospect was one of desolation and dread. What was there—who was there, to keep them from starvation? for it seemed rapidly coming to that.

The boy went out that morning with a heavy heart; and the debt he and his mother owed to Mrs. Gray following him like a spectre. Slowly he walked along the streets, looking with an almost despairing glance about him, in what seemed truly the vain hope of seeing some place where he should be likely to find employment.

With his attention wandering from the path before him, a sudden stumble over some obstacle in the way warned him to heed his steps. Recovering himself, he beheld a huge pile of wood lying on the sidewalk, and the stick which had caused him to stumble rolling off into the street. At the same time the shrill voice of a bustling maid servant was heard in the doorway of the house he was passing, scolding smartly because "that stupid teamster" had left the load of wood lying there, and brought no one to saw it; and there was nothing to make a fire to get dinner. Her mistress came along, and in her turn viewed the load of wood upon the sidewalk.

"Something must be done, Ellen," she said. "It must not be left lying there, at any rate. Who can we get to saw it?"

It was no wonder if she was a little astonished, to behold a handsome, bright-looking lad of some sixteen years, neatly clad, though with garments a little threadbare, step forward, saying, half eagerly, and yet with evident hesitancy, "Madam, if you wish, I will do it."

His voice trembled as he uttered these words. He seemed to grow pale as he awaited her answer.

She regarded him with curiosity and surprise. "You?" she said, involuntarily aloud, and with an accent of perplexed astonishment.

A burning blush covered the boy's brow for a moment, then faded away.

"Yes, madam," he answered.

She looked at him still, unable to reconcile the boy's appearance with his strange request. He was nothing less than a gentleman's son, and he offered to saw her wood! But he was waiting; and suppressing her astonishment, she answered:

"I should be very glad to have it done, if you are willing—and able. You will find it hard work, I am afraid. Ellen, bring the saw and the rest of the things from the cellar."

It was done. She told the boy he might throw the wood through the cellar window, which the maid had opened, then went in and shut the door.

Harry Selden's face burned again, as he took the saw in his hand, and that hand trembled like a leaf. But a moment, and he resolutely shook off the strange sensation his novel position led him to experience. "Nonsense!" he said to himself, "what a coward! No indeed! I am going to carry Mrs. Gray a portion of her rent money this afternoon."

He set out bravely to perform his task. It was a strange one, but he had watched men doing this work, hundreds of times. It was hard work, as he had been told, but he was not afraid of hard work, he was young and strong. It would take him a long time, but he would be willing to work twice as long, for the reward he should gain. He was only too glad to be permitted to do it at all. A stout, well-dressed, elderly gentleman who was passing while this little scene was progressing, regarded Harry with curious and attentive looks. In the boy's gentlemanly yet impoverished appearance, his eagerness to obtain this employment, humble as it was, and in the hot, evanescent blush, manifesting a brief feeling of shame, overcome by a strong will, and a truly sensible mind, he read Harry's story.

"There's a lad who'll make his way in the world!" he muttered, to himself, as he passed along.

Meanwhile, Harry had commenced his task, and though he handled it somewhat awkwardly, so that it gave him the greater trouble, he persevered and made tolerable progress. After awhile the saw no longer caught in the wood, and jerked, and stood still, but ran smoothly along, and began to give him some satisfaction. Stick after stick was severed, and added to the now rapidly growing pile down in the cellar. The labor was fatiguing, and Harry's arms ached; but he worked on.

Three hours passed away, and as he plied his task with an unwearied determination, there came along again the old gentleman of the morning. He halted, and looked steadily at the boy.

"You are working hard there, my lad," he observed.

"Rather—yes, sir," Harry answered, speaking quietly, but slightly coloring.

"Not doing it for amusement, eh?" he said.

"Hardly, sir," answered Harry, gently and respectfully; "no, not for amusement, certainly, but from necessity!"

"That same necessity is something of a tyrant! I have found it so myself. But your father might have hired a wood-sawyer" (the old gentleman pretended to be ignorant of the true state of affairs), "your father might have hired a wood-sawyer to do his work. You ought to be at school."

"It is not my father who lives here, sir," said Harry; "the people for whom I do this work are strangers to me, and they hired me, as they would have hired any one else. I needed work, and was seeking for it."

He said all this quietly and straight-forwardly, too manly to feel false shame because of his position.

"O—ah, yes—yes—yes! I comprehend now," said the old gentleman, nodding his head several times, "I comprehend now. So you were looking for work? Well, but you might have found employment of a higher grade than this, I should say?"

"I should have liked something different, of course, sir. I tried, and tried very earnestly; too, for several weeks, to get a place in an office, or a store, or something of the kind; but there were too many applicants already."

"All the places filled, eh? Well, even in that case, a good recommendation may do wonders. Had you no wealthy friend to help you?"

"None, sir. I am a stranger in the city."

This answer called two or three fresh questions from the old gentleman, which drew from Harry the history of his family fortunes and misfortunes; and to this account his auditor listened with the deepest attention. There were very few with whom the lad would have been so frank, but there was something in the countenance of his questioner, so much of kindness, of interest and sympathy, in that and in his manner of questioning, that Harry's confidence was at once gained. The old gentleman heard him to the end, and then seemed to fall into thought. Soon, however, he roused himself from his reverie.

"Yours is a very interesting history, my lad," he said. "You have truly fallen into sad circumstances; the exertions you have made to extricate yourself are truly creditable. But there are not many who in your place, would be willing to push those exertions so far; scarce one who would not consider himself degraded by doing what you are doing now. They would be ashamed to do it. How is it with you?"

"I do not feel myself degraded, sir," was Harry's quiet, respectful, yet dignified reply. "I am not ashamed of an honorable employment. I do not like it, it is true—this wood sawing; but it is an honest occupation at least, and as for those who would sneer at it, their opinion would not trouble me, for I should not for one moment think it worth caring for."

Harry continuing his task, did not see the expression of pleasure that the declaration of these independent sentiments caused to light up in the countenance of his hearer. But the old gentleman made no observation concerning them. However, after a moment's silence, he said:

"So, my boy, you would like something different from this to do? some occupation more congenial to your tastes? I think I may do something for you. If you will put on your jacket, now," (he watched Harry narrowly, as he made this proposition,) "if you will put on your jacket, throw aside these tools, and go with me to my office."

Harry had looked suddenly up, with an eager face, and had suspended his task at these delightful words.

"You are very good!" he said, smiling brightly, "you are very good indeed." Here, however, his glance turned, as he bethought himself at that moment, to the work upon which he was engaged. The smile half-faded from his face, lost in a thoughtful and slightly anxious look. "But, sir," he continued, "much as I should like to, I cannot go just now, anywhere. I have engaged to saw this wood, and I must not leave it until it is finished. You see, however, it is more than half done, already. I should be very glad to see you this afternoon, or in the evening, if you please."

"You consider yourself bound, then, to finish what you have engaged to do?" queried the old gentleman, without answering this last remark directly.

"O, yes, sir," answered Harry, in a subdued, yet somewhat surprised and anxious tone, "certainly I do."

The gentleman slightly smiled, a smile of secret satisfaction at the result of his clever test of Harry's principles.

"Well, well, my lad," he said, cheerfully, "go on with your work, finish it up well, and then go home. And instead of your coming to see me, I will come and see you, this evening at eight o'clock. Let me write down your address, if you please." And he took a pocket-book and pencil from his pocket.

Harry told him the street and the number; the old gentleman noted both, put up the book and pencil, and then gave his card to Harry. "And now," he said, with a smile, "let us shake hands, my young friend. People do shake hands over a bargain, don't they? And ours is almost that."

A cordial smile brightened Harry's face, too; and they shook hands like old friends and parted.

The boy would almost have thought it all a dream, when the gentleman was gone, but for the card that lay in his hand, and which he now examined for the first time. It bore the address of one of the most eminent merchants in the city. He finished his work, received a dollar and a half, and with a light and joyful heart, though with weary limbs, went home. His mother, who had been somewhat troubled at his long absence, welcomed him gladly, while, with a quick glance, reading the good news in his face, she inquired, with sanguine hopes, concerning his success. Her joy was no less than his as he told her.

"It is excellent, Harry!" she said, smiling. "Well, we will pay what you have received to Mrs. Gray. Then you shall have some supper; you need it sadly, my poor, tired boy! and we will talk over your new hopes."

Those hopes were sweet, they were destined not to be disappointed. That evening, according to appointment, and exactly at the set time, Harry's friend appeared. An hour's conversation he held with the lad and his mother, during which time Harry passed an extremely satisfactory examination of his qualifications for the office of merchant's clerk.

The day after, he was at his desk in the counting-room of Mr. R——, engaged at a salary sufficient to support himself and his mother comfortably; the first quarter being paid in advance. The rooms at Mrs. Gray's were abandoned, and a small but pretty house taken, situated in a pleasanter neighborhood.

This was the beginning of Harry's good fortune. The good impressions which he and his employer had received of each other at their first meeting, were strengthened and confirmed as time went by, and the merchant learned to prize his clerk, and the clerk his master. A few years from the time of his engagement there, Harry became a partner in the business; and at the present day, is one of the richest merchants in the city of his adoption.

SLEEPLESS NIGHTS IN INDIA.

During the nights in the month of May, it is impossible to sleep with closed windows, and nearly as impossible to do so with open ones. Thus sleep is almost hopeless. The beasts, the birds, the insects, the reptiles, appear to join in one universal tumult, and even human beings seem to take very little repose. In a temple, not far off, a priest is beating a drum, and I conclude, invoking the help of some god or goddess. When the drumming ceases I sink into a doze, but to be again roused by howling jackals, tearing over the flats in pursuit of prey, by the hooting of the "night hawk," (as it is called here, though it is, in fact, a screech-owl), then by the deep-toned note of an enormous frog, mingled with the "chip-chip" of many a grasshopper, and about daylight a lively bird, anxious to be "up and doing," begins a merry chirp, or a crow, with his vulgar "caw, caw," destroys all hope of rest. At last, as day dawns, I see, outside the bed, those little greedy mosquitoes clinging to the curtains, and staring at me, thinking how eatable I would be; and I rise, weary and little refreshed, to go to the launch of a ship at the dock-yard in the fort.—Journal by the Viscountess Falkland.

TO WINE DRINKERS.

General Cary, in the address which he delivered before the Sons of Temperance, stated that a friend of his, while travelling in Paris, thought he would take what is called in that city a wine bath. He found it to be very refreshing. He was waited upon by a colored servant who had fled from the United States to avoid the fugitive law. He asked the waiter how it was that such large quantities of wine could be used for such a purpose. "It must be very expensive," said he. "O," said the waiter, "the same wine which you have used is run through all the baths in the establishment."

"And what do you do with it then?" said the verdant American.

"O, we bottle it up and send it to the United States to be drank."—Medical Journal.

HAPPY AS A QUEEN.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

EVERY one has seen the beautiful engraving which bears the above title; yet perhaps not every one knows the history attached to it. The engraving itself is a perfect gem. A lovely English girl is returning from reaping. Her full apron is drawn up in one hand, and filled with wheat with the sickle resting upon it. But the glory of her harvest is upon her head, where she carries a full sheaf; and, around the top, her broad straw hat is coquettishly tied, just above where it would rest upon her brow. Her graceful foot is so cunningly arched, that a stream of water would flow within the hollow; and the hands bear no mark of hardship, yet are dark, as if the sun had smiled upon their original whiteness.

Mary Warwick was the daughter of an English clergyman, a man of strong sensibility, nay, of a sensitiveness too deep for his peace of mind, in a community like that in which he tried to dispense the word. They were a rough, unsympathizing, rude and unfeeling people; and the way in which Mr. Warwick's ministrations were received and commented upon, almost broke his sensitive heart.

Rude as they were, they were dear to him as human beings, as souls who were under his immediate pastoral charge; and towards whom he hoped and believed he had done his duty as far as they would accept his ministry. But health, as well as spirits, had given out; and with a beating heart and trembling voice, the worn-out pastor had stood up in the pulpit for the last time, and dissolved the connections which in many respects had been so painful to his feelings.

His wife, a tender-hearted woman, had borne this trial better than he had done. For trial it truly was, to give up the support of his declining years, and to see no way by which the maintenance could be sustained. He decided to retire to a small place which he inherited from his father, some fifty miles distant, and try to cultivate it sufficiently to keep life within them. It could hardly be called a farm, but if care were taken of the land, he hoped to make it productive enough for support. Every foot of it was planted, and they were waiting for the harvest, when Mr. Warwick was taken suddenly ill; and a rheumatic fever, caught in weeding, left him weak and lame.

Mary Warwick was in all this her father's stay and dependence. With her education—for her father had taught her all he knew, and her mother, an accomplished woman, had perfected the lighter part—she might have obtained almost any remuneration she had required, in some seminary; but she would never leave her father and mother, and preferred to share the poverty which she feared might come with swifter wing, if she were not there to avert it.

The house, which had belonged to Mr. Warwick's father, was an old one, of small dimensions, and with few conveniences. But it was pretty and picturesque notwithstanding, embowered in trees, and with the large flower garden in front, filled with rare and beautiful plants and shrubbery, and with a rustic summer house, made of twisted branches, and the pretty brook that ran gurgling at the foot of the garden. And Mary was almost always out of doors, with her broad straw hat and her loose morning dress, for she had only the assistance of an awkward country lad in performing all her gardening; and it was now a matter of doubt how she should ever get in the harvest. But a few kind friends, newly made, too, came forward and offered their services, and found them gladly accepted. Mary was the queen of the harvest, and she bound sheaves and tied her straw hat over them, and bore them home to her father's room, to let him see how well everything was done in his sickness.

Never had Mary looked so well, so graceful, or so animated, as on this afternoon. The exercise had brought a healthful glow to a cheek which, since her father's illness, had been too pale for beauty; and the graceful poising of the wheat upon her head, added new charms to her fine, free step, and the easy carriage of her whole figure.

Her father looked at her with an expression of deep love, almost amounting to reverence; for to him her face was so like the face of an angel, and Mr. Warwick had ever a sense of the divine in the human. Even in the unhappy boy who, years before, corrupted by the influences of that people over whom Mr. Warwick's vital energies had been worn out—even in him, unkind and ungrateful as he had been, his father recognized a spark of the heavenly fire which, he prayed God, might some day, gleam out into a better life, and bring home the wanderer.

Except for this one recollection of her unhappy brother, Mary Warwick's life passed as beautifully calm and serene, as if she had been cradled in luxury. She loved Nature, delighted alike in the sublime or beautiful manifestations of her presence; and her heart sought for no other home than this, in which to spend her days. The coarse and simple fare, the inexpensive clothing, the absence of all luxury, were matters of small account to her who found her best joys in family affections, in the study of Nature, and in the resources of a healthful, intellectual training, combined with a perfect and uninterrupted state of health. Reasoning like her father, that in the right time and right manner, Herbert Warwick would be restored, she left the event to God, and never, by giving way to a morbid and useless sensibility, embittered her own or her parent's life.

So, whoever marked the young girl returning on this said afternoon, from the narrow field which was to supply them with bread for a year, would have taken that bright, hopeful, yet serene look for perfect happiness. "Happy as a queen" is too poor an expression for the serene happiness which shone out in her countenance—the consciousness of doing and feeling rightly.

Happy as a queen! Ah, not a crowned head, from Philippa down to Victoria, but might have envied the wheat-crowned maiden of English Roseneath. So thought another person who was looking from an opposite point of view, as Mary began to ascend the little slope which led to the cottage. For lo, as she came between two rows of embowering trees, a pair of bright eyes were gazing with looks of undisguised admiration upon the being whom he had just been sketching.

"You have omitted my favorite tree," pointing to a willow that stood at the extreme end of the avenue where she had entered; and stooping down, she took the pencil, and with a few rapid touches, all encumbered as she was with wheat and sickle, she added the willow to his sketch. The artist looked up surprised, and she had then an opportunity of seeing him fully. He was not young; at least, he seemed somewhat past thirty. A bronzed cheek, and a brow somewhat darker than was probably natural, showed that he had not shunned the outer air; while his hair was not careless nor dishevelled, as is often the case with his class, but curled close to his head, in short, crisp curls. Then, observable above all other features, were the glorious brown eyes, bright yet soft, and bending upon her with a look that told plainly that he was astonished to find such a being, in such a place, and with such surroundings.

The moment that look met Mary's eye, she colored painfully and turned away. What possessed her, she thought, to display her knowledge of drawing to a stranger? She thought now that she would be almost willing to blot out from the landscape the beloved willow, if by so doing she could take back her hasty and inconsiderate act. What could he think of her? She walked off in the mortification of the moment, and hastening to her father's side, she told him the circumstances under which she had met the stranger.

"And left him thus inhospitably, my daughter? That is not like you at all. Go out to him again, darling, and if he thinks enough of our poor place to transfer it to paper, he must share its hospitalities."

Conscious that she had left the stranger too abruptly, she went back to him and delivered her father's message. He followed her to the house, where Mrs. Warwick had already prepared tea, and welcomed him with undisguised politeness. Her husband, with his large chair wheeled round beside her, met him with cordiality, and the four sat down to a meal seasoned with cheerful talk of harvests and autumnal scenery and country life. By the time tea was over, they seemed like the acquaintance of months at least.

Mr. Warwick had not been so cheerful for a long time; and when the stranger, who gave his name as Walsingham, arose to go, they urged him so strongly to stay all night and Mrs. Warwick seconded the invitation very warmly, that he accepted at once.

"It is so seldom," said Mr. Warwick, "that in these days, we find a cultivated person to talk to, that we esteem it as a great favor."

"Thank you for the compliment, which I can return with interest. It will give me great pleasure to stay."

And Mary Warwick, hard-working as she had been on that day, went cheerfully to prepare a room for the stranger; their only spare room in fact, but where everything was of the most delicate neatness, and where a hundred little specimens of Mary's industry were gathered.

Mr. Walsingham sat long by the window, after he went to his room, listening to the musical flow of the brook, and revolving in his mind both sweet and bitter memories. We will not look now at his past life, but let it develop itself gradually. It is enough to say, that, in his dearest and most deeply cherished hopes, he had been cruelly wounded and disappointed.

He sat long, and thought deeply. Here was his host, a man of superior education, his daughter evidently well educated, intellectual and accomplished, living in seclusion, and only keeping poverty from the door, by hard and unremitting labor on the part of the daughter. Yet he saw all this submitted to, not only with patience and resignation, but with a true and natural cheerfulness, which made every duty seem like a voluntary pleasure. With wants infinitely fewer and more circumscribed than he had ever dreamed of, there seemed to be a healthful life—a real heart and soul life, as much above the lofty ones of earth whom he had been accustomed to mate vid, as the heavens were above the earth. Much of this impression of Walsingham's arose from what was said by Mr. Warwick the previous evening, but still more was inferred by his own new power of perception. His was a mind that could seize at once upon the finer qualities of another mind, and placing the fragments together, could make the finest Mosaic—each part fitting just in the right place. Nor was he ever wrong in his estimate of character. Mary Warwick's was as transparent to him on that evening, as it was years afterwards. He saw her as she was:

"A spirit still, and bright
With something of an angel light."

And he asked his heart if the beings with whom he had associated, the gay, painted butterflies of wealth and fashion, could ever compete with a woman like this. Still, he had learned too much to commit himself. He remembered the time when a show of simplicity could deceive him, and he hardly dared to trust his maturer judgment.

He slept that night, but instead of dreaming of Mary Warwick, as he expected, his sleeping thoughts were far off in the past, that which had been so fruitful to him in bitterness. He was awakened by the broad sun pouring into his chamber window through thin muslin curtains, and on dressing and looking out into the garden, he saw Mary out, feeding the chickens, opening the large gate for the cows to pass out, and, with her own hands drawing water for the old horse who laid his head upon her arm, as if to express his thanks.

He sat still as he watched her tying up the falling trellises, cutting dead leaves and branches, and trying to cheat autumn into the semblance of another summer, by preserving all that was most blooming and beautiful from its fading treasures. When he joined them all at breakfast, he felt that he knew more of their life, internally and externally, than he should have learned of men, by months of intercourse.

It was the first day of England's merry month of May. Mary Warwick was out in the warm sunshine, scattering seeds, and here and there tying up some fallen perennial which the snow had bent too low. Her look was as cheerful as when we last saw her, but somehow, not quite so serene. Mr. Walsingham had come and gone, and had left a memory in her heart like a ripple on the bosom of the summer sea. She dared not ask herself if his presence was necessary to her happiness.

She did not know what a generous errand Walsingham had gone upon. She did not know that her father had told him what he had never named to any one before—his anxiety for Herbert. In the brief week which the artist had spent in their home the preceding autumn, he had so won upon the heart of her father, that he had unfolded to him his whole life. When, therefore, the old pastor had spoken freely of his son, Walsingham's resolution was taken. He was about to travel, and having an indistinct memory of meeting some one on his last tour, who answered the description of Herbert Warwick, he determined to seek, and if possible to restore him to his family.

In parting, he had been kind and friendly, but had said nothing feverlike or pointed; and Mary, her heart and thoughts full of the interesting stranger, had often wondered if this were the end of an intercourse so delightful as this had been. As if he had read her thoughts, and come to her at the call which her spirit had sent out towards him, Walsingham was at that moment lifting the latch of the garden gate, and stood before her! Blushing as deeply as if he could have read her thoughts for the last half hour, she stood among her rose trees, speechless and ashamed. Not so Walsingham. He met her with a warmth and even tenderness which his formal parting had hardly warranted; asked her twenty questions in a moment without waiting for an answer, and seemed like a man whose cup is absolutely running over with happiness. She thought him strange and incomprehensible; but was reassured when he begged her to conduct him to her father.

They were closeted long together; and Mary and her mother began to think they would never come to breakfast. These two sat in the breakfast room, which was densely shaded with vines creeping over the windows; and they did not see the stranger who, while they sat there, had entered the door, and gone straight to Mr. Warwick's room.

Tired of the long delay, Mrs. Warwick and Mary began impatiently to pace the hall, passing and re-passing Mr. Warwick's room, and musing over the probable spoiling of coffee and toast, when Mary, who knew she would be forgiven by her father for any interruption she could make, drew her mother close to the door and opened it, calling her father and Mr. Walsingham to come instantly to breakfast. Before the words had left her lips, she was aware that some other person was in the room.

On his knees beside Mr. Warwick's chair, was a thin, feeble-looking figure, whose head was bent down upon her father's lap; while Walsingham was standing with clasped hands, as if thanking God for the sight. The noise Mary made in opening the door, startled them all from their positions. The kneeling figure rose and turned round towards her. The face was pale as a snow-wreath, and made paler by the masses of black hair which hung around the temples, and the long, black beard that concealed the lower part of the face. But the eyes! Mary knew them to be Herbert's, and so did her mother, whom they would willingly have spared so abrupt a meeting. She rushed forward, and threw her arms about her son's neck with a fervor that told him how fully the dark past was forgiven.

"This was your work, Mr. Walsingham," when the excitement of the meeting had in some degree subsided. And the look which she gave him repaid him a thousand times over. He had taken, at least, the surest way to the hearts of the family in whom he had taken so strange an interest.

Herbert would tell his own version of the story, notwithstanding Walsingham's disclaimers. The latter had found the object of his search, by paying large sums of money to different people. He had discovered him at last, just recovering from a fever, which he had unfortunately caught when he was on the point of going home. The fever which had exhausted his strength, had shown him how foolish he had been ever to quit that home, and his resolution to return was strengthened. The follies of his youth had given way to a calm and reasonable manhood; but he had dreaded to test the affection he had so slighted, by returning before.

He had said to himself so many times, "I will go as soon as this, or that is attained!" But his sickness increased and his funds decreased; and he was fast sinking into utter despondency, when Walsingham, like a good angel, came to his relief, and assuming the care and kindness of a brother, he paid his debts, and hurried him off to England—to Roseneath—a great surprise to Herbert, who had not known of the removal from Landedowne. To Roseneath then, he bore him, every breath of his native air bringing new strength to his frame; and never rested till he saw him restored to the arms of the mother who had sorrowed for her child, almost as they who sorrow without hope.

In Mary's mind, there was yet a problem to be solved. How could the poor artist do all this for her brother? Only by the greatest sacrifices, surely; and she felt certain that Mr. Walsingham's next years must be years of toil for this generous interest in their family. The idea pained and troubled her, because they had nothing to repay it; but so far from entering new toils, Walsingham staid on at Roseneath, as if no haste was necessary.

May and June had passed. Herbert was fully recovered, radiant with health, and with a developed character which his early mistakes would hardly have warranted them to expect. An unknown friend had sent him the means of entering into a lucrative business, and he would henceforth live at Roseneath, to cheer and comfort the declining days of his parents, and be a protector to his beautiful sister.

There was one who would gladly take the latter character upon himself—the artist, Walsingham. And in a few brief words, by the pretty willow which hung over the silvery brook—the same willow which she had added to his sketch—he told her that she could make the happiness of his lonely life. The glow which overspread Mary's cheek was not caused by anger. It told him how truly he could trust the faithful heart, from whence it sprang into that speaking face.

When she had accepted the heart he offered, then, and not till then, did her artist lover tell her that he was no poor painter, toiling for daily bread, but a rich, independent gentleman, who, having an irresistible desire to travel, had determined to do so in a way most congenial to his taste. He had been bitterly disappointed in his first attachment, and he wished to find some one who could love him independently of his wealth and position, for himself alone.

Half the year the Walsinghams spend at Roseneath. The winter season finds them at a splendid dwelling of their own, and Mary's place is taken by Herbert's gentle and amiable wife, who is now only second to their children in the affections of Mr. Warwick and his wife. They all knew now who was Herbert's generous friend.

Over the fireplace at Roseneath, hangs a splendid portrait of Mary, as she came from the harvest-field on the afternoon in which she first saw her husband; and in Walsingham's portfolio, among his best treasures, lies the original sketch. Under the latter, is written, HAPPY AS A QUEEN.

PEACE OF MIND.

O peace of mind! thou lovely guest,
Thou softest soother of the breast,
Dispense thy balmy store!
Wing all our thoughts to reach the skies,
Till earth, diminished to our eyes,
Shall vanish as we soar.—GOLDSMITH.

When we take people as they are, we make them worse; when we take them as if they were what they should be, we improve them as far as they can be improved.

A YEAR AGO.

BY EDWARD S. ELLIS.

Day softly now is fading,
 And nature's voice low dies;
 The quiet air is laden
 With autumn's perfumed sighs;
 And at this hour of evening,
 When heaven's zephyrs flow,
 I'm full of mournful musings
 Of but a year ago.

A year ago 'twas only,
 My heart with joy was light;
 But now I'm sad and lonely,
 And day within is night;
 For then she stood beside me,
 And both of us were one;
 But she is taken from me,
 And I am left alone.

Though joined, soon rudely parted
 By cruel death's cold hand;
 And one doth, broken-hearted,
 Sigh for that distant land;
 And at this hour of evening,
 When heaven's zephyrs flow,
 I'm full of mournful musings
 Of but a year ago.

THE MINISTER OF WALFORD.

BY MARTIN A. LOMBARD.

THE quiet town of Walford was set in the most terrible commotion, by the advent of a new minister. Old Parson Springer had "dispensed with the gospel," as Mrs. Higgins said, for thirty-five or forty years; and all the prejudices of the elder portion of the congregation were aroused against having any innovation upon the pulpit, in the shape of a modern preacher. But Mr. Springer had evidently outlived his usefulness; and the greater number of the people were clamorous for a change.

Old Mrs. Hurley said it was a shame—so it was—to turn Mr. Springer out to die, like an old horse; and Squire Billings declared that "he nor his'n shouldn't have nothing to do with turning him out, nor getting another in." But the majority were in favor of a new minister, and a new church; and Mr. Springer had the mortification of knowing that a paper was actually in circulation, and funds already subscribed to get a new church built, when he had frequently been obliged to wait a long time for his scanty salary, on account of the alleged poverty of the first parish.

The old church was sold and removed, and the foundation laid for a new one; and the minister had leave given him to withdraw. He gathered together the little property which he had accumulated, sold his house, and bought a little place out of town, where he advertised for pupils to board and educate. Poor old man! his heart was too sorely crushed by the ingratitude he had met with from those whom he had christened, married, and whose dead he had buried, to allow of his seeking another congregation; so he compromised with the pride which he had left in his heart, and permitted the people of Ashland to think that he retired from the ministry for his own pleasure. In passing, I may as well say that he succeeded admirably and that "his last days were better than his first."

To return to the Walford church. Meetings were called, sewing-circles organized, and moneys raised; and, in as short a time as possible the church was completed. It cost two thousand dollars over the first computation; but then, after they had begun, they could not fall back. The ladies of the sewing-circles furnished the cushions, the Juvenile Society gave the new Bible and hymn-book for the pulpit, and now nothing remained but to get the minister; and this was a much greater task than building the church.

A large number of candidates appeared, preached their sermons, and were dismissed. The people of Walford first parish were growing fastidious. They expected a man of rare talents and superior oratorical powers, to preach in that new church; and the very people who made a difficulty of paying Mr. Springer four or five hundred dollars a year, now talked largely about a thousand or twelve hundred dollar minister. The number of candidates had now dwindled down to two, and the parish were to make choice between them. A great many would have liked the Reverend Mr. Haskins, a man who wore a turned collar, a shawl, and a white vest. He was very strenuous upon points of doctrine, and his discourses were rather prosy than otherwise. He was rivalled in the affections of the people, however, by Mr. Gray, a man of unpretending manners and address, and a thoroughly practical preacher. Notwithstanding the opposition of Mr. Haskins's friends, Mr. Gray carried the day, and was settled as pastor over the first parish. His salary was fixed at twelve hundred, and a handsome house was offered for his disposal at a reasonable rent, close to the church. He closed with the offer, and brought his sister, a pretty young lady, to keep house for him.

This disappointed a great many persons, who had each expected to have the minister to board; but some brightened up with the idea of having all his arrangements to make, supposing his sister to be a young and inexperienced girl. She proved, however, to be a lady of ripe years, perfectly accustomed to housekeeping, and refusing the first offers of assistance so promptly and decidedly, as to leave no chance to renew them.

Under her care the minister's house was kept in spotless neatness; at least so far as the parlor and study were concerned; for the parishioners never got beyond that part of the house; although many had tried to make some excuse for getting there. Miss Gray was an experienced soldier, and had no idea of having any surprise upon her movements.

In vain old Mrs. Twaddles asked what cooking stove they used, or Miss Finikin the parish dress maker wished to be informed as to the precise length of the bed chambers; Miss Gray gave the name of the stove maker, and the measure of the rooms, with the most provoking calmness, as if she did not know how anxious her questioners were to get a sight at her house, and report. With all this, there were yet several of the old school, who still continued to mourn the downfall of the old church, and the ancient ministerial sway of Mr. Springer; and by these people Mr. Gray was held in small repute. They sighed for the times when the minister was dressed differently and acted differently from other men; and were scandalized at Mr. Gray's waving hair, and his repudiation of the white "choker."

Nor was this the sum of his enormities. He had been known to ride out on horseback with a young lady who was visiting his sister; and what the old school did not find fault with, the new one was all ready to censure. Why couldn't he take a wife from his own parish? What were "out-of-town," girls brought here, to take the affections of the minister by force, when here were Susan Somers and Belinda Thayer and Anna Mulford, and a dozen more, that would have made better wives for him?

But Mr. Gray had no intention of marrying the pretty Ella Morse, his sister's intimate friend. She was engaged to a sailor—a bluff, but honest, good-natured sailor, who would have brought home gold and diamonds for her daily food, if she could have possibly eaten them. They were to be married when he came again; and this was her farewell visit to Walford, and then Horace Gray was to marry them, and his sister was to be bridesmaid—and then the brave sailor and his new wife were to sail for India.

No, this was not Horace Gray's love. Miss Finikin began seriously to believe that she herself was the object of the minister's attachment. In one of her almost daily visits to the minister's house, as she went back and forth on her dressmaking business, he had asked her about the state of the Sabbath school library, and had urged her to take charge of it as librarian. On another occasion, when she had happened in, as she was going to her work, and his carriage stood at the door, it began to rain, and he had politely taken her up to Mrs. Higgins's as she had no umbrella.

The sensitive heart of the spinster was completely subdued by these attentions, and her active imagination began to familiarize itself with the idea of becoming the minister's wife, so completely, that it would have been rash for any one to attempt disabusing her of her delusion. She was completely infatuated.

Mr. Gray had asked leave of absence for two successive Sabbaths, and Miss Finikin's susceptible heart was beating with the hope that she was to be the companion of his journey. But alas, the house was shut up in a most mysterious manner only an hour after she had made her morning call; in which she had vainly looked for the demonstrations of approaching travel, and as vainly asked when they were going, and still more vainly tried to beg the third place in their carriage.

The house was shut up, and the minister and his sister gone. They went on Monday, and could be absent nearly three weeks, by only returning on Saturday before the third Sabbath; and yet for this long absence Mr. Gray had not accounted to a single person in his parish! Floating murmurs of disapprobation were followed by louder and more open demonstrations of anger from the older members of his society, and as to Miss Finikin, she took to her bed. We who alone are in the secret, must whisper whither he went.

To hurry through the marriage ceremony that united Captain Ingalls and Ella Morse together, to leave his sister to make the bridal tour with them, and to make a brief call on his father and mother, was but the work of a single day, with the impatient minister. The glowing sunset of the next day found him walking slowly and wearily up a vine-covered walk that led to a rich and luxurious residence, on the banks of a beautiful river.

So calm and peaceful lay the river, that every object on its banks and the gorgeous sky itself was mirrored distinctly on its surface. It was like an enchanted stream; and that nothing might be wanting to complete the spell, there too was the water nymph—the Naiad—standing, half concealed by the beautiful willows that hung lovingly over its brim. A basket of fresh water-lilies, and her bare, dripping feet, told what her occupation had been. She looked at the wet feet shining like ivory, and blushed deeply. A hasty wave of the hand and a murmured excuse was all that she deigned to the weary-footed man, who had come far, and travelled long to see this very water nymph.

She returned in a few moments, and invited him into the house. Her manner seemed cold and stately, and the minister was evidently hurt, if not offended by it. He followed her into a room that was hung with crimson. The setting sun was shedding its last rays upon the windows, and heightened the effect of their deep red drape. It rested on the pale cheek of Isabel Maine, and imparted such a flush as the red camelia or rose sometimes does to an alabaster vase over which it hangs.

She did not relax at all from her proud look; and to do the minister justice, he did not look very humble or supplicating either. It was evident that some element had been at work, dividing two souls, which it would seem might come safely and easily together, and which of their own accord would never have parted. Isabel accorded him the same courtesy that she would have given to any stranger, and no more; but she was obviously ill at ease; and had to hide her emotion under pretence of arranging the lilies in dishes of Bohemian glass, making them borrow a tint from their red hue. It was like rosy wine in crystal goblets, in its effect, this mingling of red and white. Horace Gray perceived it, and spoke of its wondrous effect upon the mind, this rich blending of flowers artistically. From this, their conversation broadened into a wider sphere, embracing almost every combination of colors in art or in nature; from the arching of the rainbow, down to the tiny pink shell on the seashore, from the highest painting to the blending of the simplest flowers.

And the lovers—for they had been, nay, were still lovers—conversed calmly and coolly on all these things, and left, untouched, the great sentiment which was filling, absorbing, overwhelming both their hearts, under this cloud of estrangement. Once only they came near. Isabel's hand trembled until she came near dropping the beautiful red dish in which she was arranging the lilies; and Horace, as he saved it from falling, touched her hand. That pressure brought back old memories to each, but neither spoke; and Horace resumed his distant seat.

"You will stay with us to-night, Mr. Gray, of course," said Isabel; "it is too far to the Dale House for you to return."

"That depends—" said Mr. Gray. "I must know first whether my visit is welcome. If not, the longest walk or darkest night would of course be a better alternative."

"You will not pain me, Mr. Gray, I sincerely hope, by making any allusion to the past in any way. I invite you to stay, in all courtesy, and trust you will accept my hospitality in the same light. I am expecting papa from a journey, but he will not be here until late. We will take tea before he comes."

Not until late; then he would have an unlooked-for chance to renew his suit, or at least to clear off old scores, before Colonel Maine should make his appearance. He had come for a definitive talk with Isabel, and this would give him the opportunity. He acceded to her request to take tea, and followed her to the supper room.

Notwithstanding it was summer time, the trees and shrubs grew so thickly about the house at Bellevue as to make a fire desirable; and this want was met by a large, sparkling wood fire, blazing on the ample hearth of the supper room. It was a fine long room, with painted walls of a cool tint of drab, and hung with pictures. A tiny fountain sprang up near the table, and the light was subdued by shades of ground glass.

The supper table showed the delicate taste of Isabel, in its beautiful napery, and the wealth of her father in costly cut glass and silver.

"I can give her no gauds like these," sighed Horace to himself, as he surveyed the magnificence before him. "How much will she have to give up, if she should consent to share my lot. Ah, will she ever be contented to be the wife of a country minister?"

And truly, as he looked around and saw the luxury by which she was surrounded, he thought that even if their old feud could be made up, he would hardly dare to take her from that home, unless he could give her a corresponding one. Her tastes so refined and fastidious, her choice of society so almost exclusive as he knew it to be, how would she bear the companionship of Mrs. Higgins and Miss Finikin?

Almost for the first time, Horace felt the curse of poverty. This being, whom he would have enshrined if he could in a crystal palace, where no ruder touch should have visited her than the soft pressure of the water lilies she had been gathering, against her cheek; how could he subject her, if even she would consent to the self-denial, the absence of all luxury, the probable discomforts of a third rate parson's residence in a third rate village! He said this last sentence to himself with great bitterness. His eye was resting at that moment on a painting, whose cost would have almost doubled his own yearly salary, and he had come to ask Isabel to share that life!

It seemed at the moment, that it was too absurd to think of—this asking her voluntarily to make a change like that—and yet, how to give up the long dream of his youth! the dream that Isabel had herself encouraged until the last time they had met.

But even when he was a youth at college, and with no visible means of support, the distance between them did not seem so immeasurable as now, that his fate seemed fixed, chained down to mediocrity through life. It almost seemed to him that if Isabel should accept him now, that he should tremble on the threshold of his coming happiness, and dread to fasten her down to such a life as his. These thoughts flashed through his mind in the brief moment in which she had left him to himself.

They sat down to tea, Horace vainly trying to shut out the picture that would unconsciously fill his mind's eye, of Isabel sitting thus at his own table at Walford. The thought made him silent and abstracted, and Isabel seemed hardly equal to the task of playing hostess to her silent guest.

They had sat thus for some time, when a hasty footstep on the gravel walk proclaimed Colonel Maine's return. He entered, looking flushed and worried; and when forced by the sight of a guest to grow calmer, his face assumed a deadly pallor. Isabel hovered around her father, anxious and fearful, yet not daring to ask what was the cause of his discomposure. As she passed her hand caressingly over his hair, she started to find that it was dripping with wet. Surely, the dews had not fallen so heavily as that.

Her father had greeted Horace when he came in, but with a hand as cold as death; and he now sat down beside him and drank cup after cup of strong tea, but tasted nothing else. Horace remembered that this man's pride had partly influenced his daughter to withdraw her affection, or at least the show of affection from him. Had he not remembered, he could have pitied him more deeply than he did now.

Colonel Maine arose and left the table. His daughter and guest followed him to the wide fire-place, where they remained in silence, until the servant removed the tea things. Isabel looked mournfully at her father, and although some of her old affection for Horace was rising in her heart, she yet wished him away, so that her father might unburden the trouble which was evidently crushing his spirit.

She did not need to wish him away, for as soon as the doors were shut and all was still, her father, with the great drops of perspiration still beading his forehead, revealed the cause of his present state.

Bellevue, with all its manifold beauties of scenery, its model farm—the pride of Colonel Maine's heart, next to his daughter—his extensive city property, all had vanished away from his grasp, by the villany of a single man, and that man one whom he had befriended!

Isabel listened in tears. She could not at that moment command the heroism and fortitude which she had so often admired in Irving's admirable "Wife." Bellevue was dear to her heart. Here she had been born and reared; within its sacred wood the dust of her mother was sleeping; it would break her father's heart to leave it, for though apparently cold and stern, she knew the depth of feeling that lay beneath that proud exterior. She could not speak peace then to his troubled soul. Had Bellevue been spared, she could have borne all else; but this lay too near her heart's centre to be lightly given up.

Horace rose, but Colonel Maine's hand was on his arm. "Do not leave us, Mr. Gray," he said, "your province is to attend upon sorrow and trouble. Do not forsake your old friends now."

Horace was surprised into a sudden expression of sympathy which the moment before he would not have uttered for the world.

"Bless you, Mr. Gray, for this kind expression of feeling towards us. My poor Isabel, do not weep so. We are no worse off than many others. There, there, go to your room, my darling, and bathe that face, and come back to me smiling, if you can."

Isabel obeyed him, glad to relieve herself, by one powerful burst of tears, after which she hoped to go back, calm, if not smiling.

As soon as she was gone, Colonel Maine turned to his guest and thus addressed him, "Mr. Gray, I once treated you cavalierly, when you paid your addresses to my daughter. From my soul I ask you to forgive me for that pride which is now so completely humbled. Would to Heaven that I had acceded to your wishes then. Isabel would then have had a protector in this hour of trouble, which I feel will too surely deprive her of a parent's care. At my age, Mr. Gray, there can be no possible chance of retrieving a fortune so wholly dissipated to the winds as mine is. Mr. Gray, may I ask you if you came here to night with any intention of trying to shake the pride which I showed you when last we met, and which I enforced upon my daughter to imitate?"

"I came here to night, Colonel Maine, to tell Isabel that my lot in life was settled, that as a poor country minister, I could only hope for a bare subsistence to offer to any woman's acceptance; but that my heart was as devoted to her image as ever, and if pride, or any other obstacle still came between us, I would only look upon her once more, and then bid her farewell—but that no other could share my life; that the dream of my youth, visionary as it was, could never be renewed for another."

"By Heaven, Mr. Gray, I would almost offer Isabel to your acceptance now, so keenly do I feel her desolate situation, were it not that you would have reason to think that I would suffer a man to marry my daughter, whom I would not have received when she was in expectancy of a fortune at my death. But I am thankful that I have it in my power to destroy even that idea, if you should entertain it. Isabel has a letter from me, dated long before this calamity was dreamed of—as far back as January last, in which I distinctly gave her permission to accept you. Her answer I have here."

He took a crumpled letter from the private drawer of a desk, and folding down the commencement, he pointed to these sentences, "Your permission comes too late, dear father, as I shall probably never see Horace Gray again. I hear that he is settled in Walford. I will not blame you, but you do not know how much I have suffered."

"Nor," continued Mr. Maine, "can she know what I have suffered, for that hour of pride and selfishness. Mr. Gray, I was a father, eager and ambitious of honors for my only child. Say, if she were not worth that anxiety?"

Mr. Gray's impassioned assent was prevented by Isabel's entrance, calm and even smiling, as her father had wished. She sat down beside him, not daring to look in his face, lest her composure should again desert her. Colonel Maine rose and left them to themselves. What passed between the lovers that night, of acknowledgment of error, of the clearing up of a whole year's mistakes, of hope, and trust, and simple faith for the future, no one knew but themselves.

The minister returned to Walford as silently as he went. All that the people knew, was that his sister was there several days before him, and that his house underwent a thorough cleansing and freshening up. Bright summer flowers adorned the two rooms which were still the only ones into which even Miss Finikin was admitted. She had the entree of the study, to take books whenever she pleased, and she was now fluttering with excitement to welcome the minister, for she had seen his windows open that morning. How was she disappointed when she found he had not arrived. Alas, poor old girl! she had a greater than that, when on the next bright, dewy Sabbath morning, after the congregation were all seated, Mr. Gray was seen opening his pew door before he ascended the pulpit, to give entrance to his sister, and a young and beautiful woman, in spotless bridal white!

Fans and smelling-bottles were in requisition that day! Miss Finikin almost fainted, and Cordelia Bright, the deacon's daughter, who had been flattered into the belief that Mr. Gray liked her, actually burst into tears.

The next Sabbath after that, Colonel Maine was also present; and at the close of the last service, the whole society were invited to call on the minister the next evening.

It would perhaps be beyond belief, if it were stated that everybody liked the minister's wife; but it may be safely said that no minister's wife ever gave more general satisfaction.

Bellevue was lost to both father and daughter, but Colonel Maine gathered enough from the wreck of his fortune, to keep a comfortable room at the parsonage at his own expense; and in the decline of his life, he found that the cares and attentions of a son, as Horace Gray truly was to him, were better than houses and lands. And truly, the brightening roses on Isabel's cheeks were worth all he lost at Bellevue.

Mrs. Higgins shakes his head, and says "Well you'll never see such a piece of sculpter agin, as that old pulpit was!"

BROADEST AT THE BASE.

Young man, one of the first things you ought to consider is how to build up a character. Allow us to tell you one fact about it, which we have learned from observation: It must be built like pyramid to be firm and lasting—broad at the base. Then the foundation must be good, or even a pyramid would crack and fall to pieces. Get a reputation, from early boyhood, for truth, honesty, industry, obedience to parents and teachers, and above all, piety. By-and by your character will be as firm as a pyramid; a host of calumniators could not overthrow it. But if youth and early life is bad, to build a character on such a beginning would be almost as difficult as to build and poise a pyramid on its apex.—New York Independent.

GOOD NATURE.

Good nature redeems many faults. More than beauty, wealth, power, genius, it causes men and women to be loved. If there are no shining qualities whatever in the character, even should there be considerable intellectual deficiency, yet if a good temper beams bright on the countenance, we ask for nothing more. We pause not, we do not question or hesitate, but surrender at once to the fascinations of the good and honest soul that has set upon his face the seal of this admirable quality.—Boston Olive Branch.

THE HAZEL COPSE.

BY EDWIN L. LOTHROP.

You see that little gray-looking house yonder in the hazel copse, do you? Well, twenty or thirty years ago—I forget which—there was a garden and a farm attached to that house, which is now all cut up into building lots; and a poor set of houses they have put there too. The only picturesque, or even tolerable thing, is the gray house, after all. They have cut down the trees where the orchard stood, and the ground is covered with lime and bits of brick, and broken glass and stones, with all the shabby newness of recently built tenements “to let.” But for the determined will of the old woman, at the gray house, the hazel copse would have gone too; but when they attempted to cut that, she who for seven years had not left her bed, came to the door, and shook her withered hand at the woodcutters, and dared them to touch her property; not precisely the petitioning and pathetic mode of beseeching the woodman to “spare that tree,” but a regular, fierce defiance to the wight who would “touch but a single bough.”

It makes a pretty picture in the midst even of this intolerable newness, does it not? Well, as I said, twenty or thirty years ago, this spot was called Deering farm; and a happy family lived here—James Deering, his wife, daughter and nephew.

Lucy and her mother did all the inside work of the farm; Mr. Deering and the nephew performing the rest. The work prospered, and the “place” was thought to be worth five times as much as any in the neighborhood. Deering farm sent out the best butter and cheese; the best apples and potatoes, the cleanest oats and the finest wheat and rye and Indian corn, of any other round Southfield.

Matthew Holt usually carried the produce to market. He was the son of Mr. Deering’s sister; and was as dear to him as his own son could have been. Matthew was a smart, enterprising farmer, and could mow or reap more than any one in the neighborhood, in a day. Altogether, he was of invaluable service to his uncle, who disliked to hire strange servants, as much as his wife did. Everything about the farm was the perfection of neatness. Not a broken rail, nor an unmended plough, nor a wisp of straw, ever lay about the premises. And in the house, the milk pans and the tin platters shone like silver, and the floors and dressers were white as lilies. Still Lucy and her mother never seemed to work hard. They were always dressed neatly, and were seldom seen at any laborious or heavy occupation. The neighbors who went in early in the morning, found the same spotless cleanliness; and wondered, as they went home to their dingy floors, if the Deerings had been scouring theirs in the night.

They had their pleasures too, apart from their labor. They kept a good horse for family use, whose sleek sides showed his well-keeping; and with this, in a respectable light wagon, they explored the whole country round. Books, too, were plenty in their house, and the best and most useful papers; and Mr. Deering was not so wedded to his farm, as not to enjoy, and let his family enjoy rational and innocent amusements. Matthew and Lucy, therefore, went to the neighboring village to learn singing and dancing; and so excellent was the farmer’s judgment, in the eyes of his neighbors, that the most rigid and intolerant did not say a word.

There was little said between the cousins, as to any future relation. It was an understood matter, but scarcely ever expressed in words. Lucy glided in and about the farmhouse, with pleasant smiles at Matthew, when she encountered him; and he always thought of the time when she would brighten up his house, just so, but he never said it. Mrs. Deering sometimes wondered that nothing was fixed definitely; but she was a good, mild, easy woman, and she believed that all would come right, in the right time.

So she quietly made up and laid away a good stock of household linen, ostensibly for the use of the house, but really for Lucy’s future dower. It would have done one good to see the piles on piles of sheets, blankets and homemade quilts, which filled the large cupboard behind the chimney; and all there were designed, in her heart, for Lucy.

At the village adjoining, Lucy had become acquainted with a young girl, the daughter of a widow lady. Caroline Lydstone was a pretty, spoiled, indolent girl, the darling of her widowed mother, and a great favorite, because of her beauty and sprightliness. She had never been out of the village; and on her naming that fact one day to her new friend, Lucy earnestly insisted on her coming over to Deering Farm, and staying a week, at least.

She was delighted with the change; but she could not imagine how Lucy managed to do such a quantity of work. How strong she must be! She could never work at all. She was not even able to make her own bed!

Mrs. Deering looked at the bright, rosy cheeks, and the full, rounded arms, and smiled. There was strength enough, but the energy was wanting; and she wondered if the poor, slight mother, whom Lucy had represented as so thin and weakly, did not sometimes wish that she had brought Caroline up differently.

All the family liked the young girl. She had a sweet voice for singing, and a sweet temper also. She was never dull nor cross nor homesick; but went flitting round from morning till night, watching Lucy at work, but never offering to help her; or oftener still, out in the field, where Matthew was at work on the hay.

Lucy would watch her, as she stood busily before the window of the cheese room, and as Caroline sat on a fragrant mound of hay, or reclined beneath the great oak tree, with her straw hat thrown down carelessly beside her, she thought there was never anything half so pretty, nor half so useless, as her new friend.

She bounded in about tea time, one afternoon, clapping her hands with delight. Matthew was going to let her ride on Black Bess, to make a flying call upon her mother, and home again by moonlight.

"Alone, Caroline? Are you accustomed to riding?" asked Mrs. Deering.

"No—but then Matthew was going to take mother horse, and he would see that there was no danger."

Lucy saw that the arrangement did not include her; and she thought it would have been more kind in Matthew, to take them all in the wagon; but she did not say anything. She offered Caroline her own habit and cap, and she could not help acknowledging that she looked beautifully in the well-fitting riding dress. They set off from the door, while Lucy was taking care of the milk for the night; and after they were gone, she sat down more quietly than usual, and folded her hands listlessly, without either work or book. Mrs. Deering looked at her compassionately. She knew that Lucy felt Matthew's conduct deeply; but she dared not irritate the wound by touching it.

They sat there together until ten and even eleven struck; and then her mother insisted on her going to bed. Long after midnight, they returned; and Caroline, on going up to Lucy, found her still awake, and with a hot flush upon her cheek like fever.

Something closed Caroline's lips. She did not speak at all of her ride, nor did Lucy make any inquiry; and Matthew, in the morning, glanced all the eyes at the breakfast-table. But the incident passed away, and he was more than usually kind to Lucy. Caroline's visit was soon over, and now Matthew began seriously to talk of being married, Lucy's parents only stipula-ting that there should be no change in the household arrangements; unless indeed, Matthew might think proper to have some one to assist Lucy in the housework.

Lucy could smile now at the recollection of her nervousness on the night of the ride; and, casting all suspicion to the wind, she generously invited Caroline Lydstone to pass a month with her, previous to the marriage; and her free and unembarrassed manner of leaving her for hours alone with Matthew, proved that she had no feeling of jealousy towards her.

There was little of preparation to make. The house was always neat and clean, and the luxury of a new carpet and chairs, and a neat chamber set of plain furniture, was all that was needed. All was arranged, and everything ready for the wedding on the coming eve, except the cutting of the abundant roses which bloomed all over the garden. Lucy sat at the little window looking out upon the yard, when she saw Caroline glide softly out of the door and go down to the old oak tree. It was not long before Matthew joined her; and there was evidently a long conversation between them. When Caroline came back, she went up to her room stealthily; but not before Lucy had caught sight of tears upon her face. It was a sorrow which she evidently did not want Lucy to share.

It was near sunset, and Lucy was already in her own room, looking at the new white muslin dress and satin ribbons that lay on the bed. One little white rose-bud was in a glass of water, intended for the only ornament to her brown hair, and a delicate fan, Mrs. Lydstone's bridal gift, lay beside it.

She left the bedside, on hearing voices in the next room, ashamed lest any one should find her thus lingering over her bridal paraphernalia. She stood by the window, waiting for the persons, whoever they might be, to enter, and a bright blush came to her cheek. She was perfectly happy as she stood there, arranging the muslin curtain of this little bed room which she had occupied so long, with its little white quilt, now covered by a mass of thin, snowy drapery—her bridal dress. All at once, she heard Caroline's voice say:

"It must not be, Matthew. I must go before the wedding. I could not stay. I should die at the sight,"—and Matthew speaking low, soothing words, which she could not hear, as he was evidently weeping. She heard him clasp his hands together, as if in great trouble; and then Caroline seemed to be leaving him, for her voice sounded farther off.

"O, come back to me, once more!" was Matthew's cry, and she heard Caroline go back to where he stood. The room seemed to reel before her; but she controlled herself firmly, and went down to tea. She kept close to Caroline, so that she had no chance to go away, and soon called her to go up to dress, and insisted on her dressing first and letting her help her. She put the white rose in Caroline's hair, and then went back to her own room. Half an hour was spent by her, with her father and mother, and then she slipped back again to dress.

She looked very lovely. Her cheeks were flushed, and when Matthew and Caroline entered, as they did together, she was looking well and composed, but grave.

"Father has gone over to fetch your mother," she said to Caroline, who said simply that she was glad she was coming.

"Come out into this large chamber," said Lucy. "I am suffocating here," and she led the way to it. Her mother sat there in the white easy-chair, and she made room beside her for her daughter. Lucy, still controlling herself, said:

"Matthew, I heard your conversation this afternoon with Caroline. I do not wish to talk much about the matter, but she, not I, must be the bride. I will take her place, and she must take mine."

They sat as if turned to stone. Lucy cleared her voice, and began again very quietly.

"It is so much better that I should know this now, than to learn it afterwards. You should have been more candid, both of you. Think what it would have been when I was a wife, to know that another was preferred!"

She went up to Matthew who looked as if he were paralyzed. "You are only my cousin now, Matthew. You were very cruel to make me any thing nearer to you. If it is your wish, I will act as Caroline's bridesmaid."

Caroline had sunk, half-fainting, on a chair, and Matthew sat motionless, without offering to support her. Mrs. Deering ran to her with her own kindly manner; but when she turned from her as she revived, Lucy's lips were covered with blood that fell down over her snowy dress, in a crimson stream.

Matthew was aroused now, thoroughly. He laid her tenderly on the bed, and stopped the blood with his handkerchief. She looked up at him with a loving smile, and then closed her eyes. Soon her father and Mrs. Lydstone arrived, and a physician who had been sent for.

The latter ordered every one from the room but her father. Her mother was completely overcome, and was carried to her own chamber. A few words from Mr. Deering put the physician in possession of all the facts, and his first order was for Mrs. Lydstone and her daughter to be carried home; and for a person to be stationed at the gate, to prevent any one from coming into the house. Lucy's life depended upon quiet, and he thought Miss Lydstone would feel better at home, than in a house where so much trouble had arisen through her.

Lucy lived—but her life was never as before. Her color was gone, her strength departed, and she seemed the wreck of what she was. Matthew had entreated to be permitted to fulfil his engagement, but in vain. She had not seen him since her illness—nor would she.

"It can only cause pain to him and to me—and surely we have had enough," was her constant answer; and Matthew, lonely and desolate, and feeling that he was not wanted there, would go over to Mrs. Lydstone's, and talk it over with her and Caroline.

When the autumn leaves fell, they alighted on a narrow mound, beneath the great oak. No marble was there; but on the smooth trunk above, was deeply carved "Lucy, aged 20." Near this tree was the hazel copse. Matthew wrought no longer in sight of that grave. He could not—and he went away into a distant State; and everything seemed to go wrong with him. He never came to the cottage, although he was sometimes seen at Mrs. Lydstone's; and people said he looked shabby and miserable.

Mr. Deering and his wife soon followed their daughter, and Matthew became heir to the estate. But nothing would ever induce him to live there. He married Caroline, years afterwards, when both had lost the look of youth, and had become fretful and peevish. Lucy's name was never mentioned between them, nor did they ever go within sight of the hazel copse.

When Matthew died, Caroline, even then seeming like a woman of sixty, took up her abode here alone. She had outlived all sensibility upon the subject of the past, and had become avaricious and gasping. She sold the farm for building purposes, but she will not let any one touch the hazel copse, although the tree has been destroyed by lightning, and Lucy has been removed, long since, to the burying-ground, beside her father and mother.

Year after year, Caroline lives on in the old gray house, herself as old and gray; and yet nothing will induce her to enter the chamber where Lucy died. To her, hard and insensible as she has become, that room is peopled with the ghosts of the past. They who have had access to the house, when she has been ill, declare that the once white dresses hang in the chamber still, and one has dark stains upon it even now.

POOR ELEANOR!

BY FRANKLIN FORSTER.

Ever unquiet, never at rest,
Eleanor looks from her door;
Wild are her eyes, and her hair undrest
Falls unconfined o'er her silken vest,
Hands on her bosom tightly pressed,
And thus she gazes away to the west,
O'er the dreary, desolate moor.

"When will he come?—when will he come?
Here I wait day after day,
Sitting and sighing alone in the gloom
And cheerlessness of this lonely room,
Waiting for him who never comes home
Cruel lover! who went away
Ne'er to return—O, where does he roam?"

"Yet, methinks they told me a tale,
Many a year ago,
Of a body found in the lonely vale,
Frightful with blood—and with faces pale,
Looks of affright, and many a wail,
Told of the death of Egberto;
Cruel friends—to deceive me so!

"Yes, it was false—for he came that night,
Came and stood by my sleepless bed
With bleeding wounds, but his face was white,
Pallid and ghastly—a horrible sight!
And when I cried aloud in my fright,
Sadly, mournfully shaking his head,
Then and forever my lover fled!"

Thus she murmurs incessantly,
Mind a desert—reason fled,
Wandering unquietly
In haunts where he was wont to be,
Gazing around unheedingly,
Speaking thus of him long dead,
"I must wait—he will surely return to me!"

THE EMBROIDERED VEST.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

Not long since, some young officers dining at Versailles, were rejoicing at the idea of entering Spain and there taking their revenge for Saragossa. Colonel B., who was listening to them, began to smile, and said with dignity and experience:

"Before believing that an expedition beyond the Pyrenees will be a party of pleasure, let me relate to you a little episode of the war of 1810."

"Relate it! relate it!" replied the young people, already quieted by the smile of their superior officer.

Colonel B. emptied his glass, stroked his moustache, and commenced thus:

"At the age of twenty, I was consigned to the arsenal at Metz, in consequence of some nocturnal jokes. I had for a jailor the adjutant Pascal—a Cerberus with gray eyebrows over lynx eyes—or rather his young wife, an adorable woman of twenty-seven. She was the daughter of a celebrated beauty of the empire, and was called Malvina, in compliment to Mme. Cottin.

"There is no prison so narrow but it has its illusion; all prisoners will comprehend that. Did not Pelisson love a spider? What would he not have experienced for Mme. Pascal? Besides, my jailor's wife united to her charms two great moral virtues: I never wanted for cigars, and had always kirack at discretion.

"I went every morning to see her work beside her window, in a little boudoir which she had arranged with perfect taste, and which was contiguous to the corridor of my cell. The coquette, knowing how much the frame adds to the beauty of a picture, placed herself there in a bodice and flounced dress, with flowers on her neck and in her hair, and feet in Cinderella slippers, flanked by her cat unrolling her spools, and her little daughter dressed like a marchioness. An excellent housewife, she plied her needle with prodigious dexterity, looking at me a little oftener than at her work, and readily smiling at my foolish speeches, for she had twenty-two pearls in her mouth. A joyous captive like myself, a balfinch, was singing at the neighboring casement; the cat executed surprising gambols; the child drew, by a rose-colored ribbon, a wooden sheep on rollers; the Mocha was smoking in the cups. It was a picture worthy of a painter.

"Now I had admired the workwoman for a week, when I bethought myself to notice her work. It was a very handsome waistcoat of yellow silk, which she was embroidering with black braid, in the Spanish fashion. These details occasioned some surprise, for they had no connection with the habits of the adjutant. I looked Malvina in the eyes, and said to her:

"For whom is this waistcoat?"

"She did not reply, and seemed affected; so that my curiosity changed into a suspicion. Her husband entered at the same instant, and I thought she was about to conceal her work; but she embraced the adjutant with the best grace in the world, and said to me with her usual smile:

"Ask M. Pascal for the history of the waistcoat."

"The adjutant, as I have said, was a veteran of fifty years; an old guard, with white moustache, scarred brow, and the cross of honor—one of those crosses which smell of powder. One read in the depths of his gray eye forty years of misery, endured without complaint and without bitterness. The cross had paid for all.

"Here is the story as he related it to me, and which will edify you on the delights of Castile:

It was in the Sierra Morena, during the war of 1810. The regiment of Pascal, then a simple sergeant, had just arrived in the little town of A., exhausted, dying with hunger and thirst, decimated by fevers, cut to pieces by the guerillas. Pascal had taken nothing for twelve or fifteen hours, and yet he had still in his knapsack a piece of bread, the last he had received—this treasure that the famished soldier conceals from his companions for fear of being robbed, and which his own teeth dare not attack because it is his last hope. The regiment arranged itself on the square; billets of lodging were distributed, a rendezvous appointed in case of alarm, and each man went his way.

It was eight o'clock in the evening. The little town of A. had all the appearance of an enemy's town. Every door, closed before the hour, opened to the French like a trap. To see the eyes that sparkled behind the casements, one would have said as many poignards awaited their prey in the shadow. Scarcely did a few Spaniards pass along the streets, looking without turning their heads, enveloped to their noses in their mantles, exchanging signs of intelligence.

The coolness of the evening redoubled the fever of Pascal. His gun escaped from his hands; he was on the point of swooning. But he remembered that he had a fresh wound in his left wrist; he re-opened it in removing the bandages, and its bleeding exhausted him still more.

He arrived thus at the house designated. It occupied the centre of a gloomy and deserted square, admirably situated for deeds of darkness. There, the sound of a carbine would be lost in space, and the call of a dying man would awaken no echo.

"Well," said Pascal, philosophically, "if I am not to awake to-morrow, I shall at least sleep soundly."

He raised the knocker of the door. Nothing stirred. He struck it a second time; nothing yet. The butt of his gun made the house tremble; this time, an old woman opened the door.

By the light of an iron lamp, the sergeant saw a solemn and impassible countenance—one of those faces of dethroned queens which belong only to the Spanish. This one had still, at sixty years, the Oriental visage and unfathomable eyes of the Moors of Grenada. She cast a glance on Pascal and on his billet, allowed him to enter without speaking, pointed to a chair, and resumed her work beside the hearth.

The chamber was of Castilian bareness; four white walls, a table of ebony, a worm-eaten chest, the chair of the old woman and that of the sergeant—these were all.

"Ah!" said Pascal to himself; "am I to remain tete-a-tete with this taciturn mummy?"

But he perceived a carbine, and a sombrero with a long plume, suspended to the great beam of the ceiling.

"Very well," thought he, "here are men's trinkets; I shall not die like Holofernes."

The most profound silence reigned within and without. The sergeant shivered near the fire. The old woman was watching an olla podrida, the fragrance of which was most inviting.

Two hours passed away thus. Suddenly, the duenna raised her head and listened. The sergeant at first heard nothing; but soon steps approached. The knocker was lifted thrice with a firm hand, and a man entered the room.

This was a tall and handsome youth of from twenty-eight to thirty years; he had black eyes, bronze complexion, white teeth, waving hair, and austere face. His gaiters were in fragments, his clothes covered with dust. He had in his cloak, pointed at the bottom, certain round holes which Pascal readily recognized; balls had passed through them. The Spaniard draped himself in this national fragment with the majesty of an emperor.

"Good evening, Joachim!" said the mother.

"God keep you, Manuela!" replied the son.

And as he was about to embrace her, he perceived the Frenchman. He started and recoiled, then examined his carbine, then shook his head with a sigh, then began to sup with the old woman, without uttering a word or looking again at Pascal.

The latter had recognized by all these signs a mortal enemy—doubtless one of those guerillas who had harassed his regiment, and certainly one of those Spaniards who would massacre to the very last Frenchman. The sergeant might indeed be his guest to-day—but beware of the morrow's encounter, by the flash of two guns!

Meanwhile Pascal struck Joachim on the shoulder, and by a gesture asked of him a place at the table. By way of reply, the Spaniard pointed to the empty dish and gave it to his dog to lick. The Frenchman understood, pushed a stool before the fire, sat down upon it, opened his knapsack and took from it his last morsel of bread.

"I will dine to-morrow," said he to himself, "thanks to God and my bayonet!"

"Ah!" resumed he quickly again by pantomime, "and the bed? I am a man who lies down when he has an opportunity."

Joachim, still mute, and still without turning his head, pointed under the stairway, and slowly ascended, with his mother, to the upper story.

This gloomy and silent scene, but of formidable eloquence, had given a diversion to the sergeant's sufferings.

"The deuce!" thought he, when he found himself alone. "Castile is far from Scotland, in point of hospitality."

He arranged himself in his niche, for want of a better place. He took there his gun, his knapsack, his sabre and his chapeau, made his little military preparations, stretched himself upon his gray coat, and overcame with fatigue, fell asleep.

The next morning, at daybreak, the drum awoke him. It was the concerted signal of alarm. The guerillas had re-appeared on the horizon. Pascal heard their rallying cries on the neighboring mountains.

He rose and called his hosts. The old woman alone was there; Joachim had already gone out, and the carbine was no longer hanging from the ceiling.

"Ah! ah!" said the sergeant to himself, brightening up, "he has armed himself with his speaking-trumpet; we shall soon converse together!"

"Thank you for your attentions, mother; it is no matter," said he, gaily, to the duenna; "let the soup simmer and shake up the pillows for to-morrow."

An hour afterwards, the sergeant was in the ranks in the country, opposite a band of guerillas. The combat was bloody, terrible, merciless, and renewed ten times until evening. Pascal was drawn in and pursued between two hills, with the remnant of his regiment. He received there more than twenty balls in his uniform and chapeau, as if he had been a mark for all the carbines of the enemy. By a sort of miracle, he was only scratched in the ear and hand. On his side, he did not lose a cartridge, and never fired without seeing a Spaniard fall.

He aimed particularly at a brown cloak, which appeared before him on every height, and it was not until after he had overthrown that, that he could disengage his men and rejoin the main body.

The guerillas were beaten and dispersed in every direction. Pascal was mentioned in the order of the day, and praised as one of the authors of the victory. The French re-entered the town of A., and the sergeant regained his lodgings of the night before.

He found the duenna alone, and more gloomy, more silent than ever. She had but one thought and one movement—to listen and look out of the window to see whether Joachim had returned.

At the end of two hours he re-appeared, and his mother uttered a cry of joy, which quickly became a cry of anguish. The young man was pale, haggard, tottering, and blood was flowing from a large wound in his breast.

"It is nothing—calm yourself!" said he to the old woman. "My heart was not reached, but it wanted little of it."

And while his mother bathed his wound with cold water and her tears, he at last began to observe the sergeant, who on his part looked at him attentively. They seemed by degrees to recognize each other, and to be surprised at breathing under the same roof. Manuela followed this scene with a wild eye, assiduously washing the wound of Joachim. Suddenly she extracted from it an enormous ball.

"Saved! saved, my son!" exclaimed she, pressing him deliriously in her arms.

Then, picking up the ball, she examined it with curiosity. "It is a French ball!"

Pascal and Joachim breathed not a word, but they did not take their eyes off each other.

The old woman ran to the sergeant's gun, the arm of adventure and of booty, of which the bore was peculiar. She fitted to it the bloody lead, turned like a fury, and said to Pascal:

"It was you who shot my child! Joachim," added she, "there is your murderer! Let us avenge ourselves!"

At the same time, with the rapidity of lightning, she had closed the door, seized the carbine, and handed a cutlass to her son.

The only reply of the Frenchman was to put his hand to his sabre, and prepare to sell his life dearly. He also, and at the same instant, had just recognized in his host the brown cloak which he had aimed at all day and perforated with a shower of balls. The effect of this triple recognition would have furnished a worthy subject for Salvator or Ribiera.

Instead of taking the cutlass, Joachim rejected it with horror, and rising pale as a phantom, with the majesty of a Spanish grandee, with a gesture made the carbine drop from his mother's hands, and with another, extended his own hand to Pascal.

"After so warm a day," said he, "you must be hungry and thirsty. Serve the supper, Manuela, and make the bed in the green chamber."

The astonished sergeant restored his sabre to its scabbard and smilingly replied:

"There is no offence; I shall eat with a good appetite and sleep with a good heart."

The old woman was about to protest, but a look from her son silenced her.

"I did not know you yesterday; I know you to-day," said the Spaniard to the Frenchman.

And they supped together, talking over the events of the day.

The sergeant gave Joachim a sovereign balm for his wounds. Then the latter, tapping Pascal on the shoulder, said to him :

"Follow me to your room."

He rose, took a flambeau, and though he could with difficulty support himself, conducted his guest to the second story. It was the finest room in the house, destined for relatives and friends. A large alcove, with curtains of serge ; a high and good bed ; sheets of fine linen and soft counterpanes ; the perfumes of lavender and iris ; refreshments of chocolate and burnt almonds.

The sergeant thought himself in a dream, and had never been so entertained since his mother had for the last time tucked him in, in the old and soft family bed.

The Spaniard wished him good night, and went to bed saying : "To-morrow."

"Pardieu !" thought Pascal, "I have found a hidalgo. These Spaniards are all like their Cid Campeador !"

He fell asleep and did not awake until day-break, at a new summons from his regiment. Joachim, confined to his bed, and watched over by his mother, invited the sergeant to take chocolate at his bedside. They drank each other's health, and the Spaniard said to the stranger, as he bade him adieu :

"You are a brave man, and you fire admirably. Pray for me, if I die ; if I live, I will not forget you. Neither will my carbine, if it finds itself opposite yours. One belongs to his country ; so there shall not be a Frenchman in Spain, while there is a cartridge at my belt."

Two months afterward, as the soldiers of Napoleon were being exterminated at Saragossa, a Castilian, who had killed more than thirty of them, was about to perish under the blows of their avengers, when one of the latter recognized him, and exclaimed : "Joachim !"

It was Pascal, to whom Providence offered his revenge. He saved his ancient host at the peril of his life, concealed him, and kept him until the morrow, and did not leave the city until he had restored him to his mother.

"Remain a Spaniard," said he ; "I shall return to France. You are a thousand times right—one belongs to his country !" * * *

"And this is the reason why my wife is embroidering this waistcoat," concluded the adjutant Pascal, as he finished his narrative, "This will be my thirtieth birthday present to the Senor Joachim Morales y Hedo. When in 1813 Joseph Bonaparte had surrendered the throne to Ferdinand VII., Joachim wrote me first :

"You have seen how I honor the courage of my enemies ; learn how I retain the remembrance of my friends. The last Frenchman having left Spain, I have restored my carbine to the wall, and pray you to drink my health in these twenty-five bottles of Alicante wine.

"Your ancient host, now captain of the town of A. J. MORALES Y HEDO."

"I replied by a hundred bottles of champagne, and our correspondence has never ceased from that time."

"This story of the adjutant strongly affected me," said Colonel B., "and has never left my memory any more than the graceful image of Mme. Pascal. I see her always as I have described her to you, embroidering, between her daughter and her cat, the waistcoat of Senor Joachim. In my soul and conscience I inwardly made her the amende honorable for my unwarrantable suspicions, and kissed her pretty hand with the most profound respect, on leaving my prison, the arsenal of Metz.

"And now, gentlemen," said the colonel to the officers of Versailles, "go, conquer Spain, if the thing still tempts you, and if you do not think the price of Alicante wine too dear."

NATIONAL BEVERAGES.

All Europe has chosen its prevailing beverage. Spain and Italy delight in chocolate ; France, Germany, Sweden and Turkey, in coffee ; Russia, Holland, England, in tea ; while Ireland makes a warm drink from the husks of the cocoa, the refuse of the chocolate mills of Italy and Spain. All Asia feels the same want, and in different ways has long gratified it. Coffee, indigenous in Arabia or the adjoining countries, has followed the banner of the Prophet wherever his faith has triumphed. Tea, a native of China, has spread spontaneously over the hill country of the Himalayas, the table-lands of Tartary and Thibet, and the plains of Siberia—has climbed the Altai, overspread Russia, and is equally despot in Moscow as in St. Petersburg. In Sumatra, the coffee-leaf yields the favorite tea of the dark-skinned population, while Central Africa boasts of the Abyssinian chaat as the drink of its Ethiopian people.—Professor Johnston.

There is nothing innocent or good, that dies and is forgotten. Let us hold that faith, or none. An infant, a prattling child, dying in its cradle, will live again in the better thoughts of those who loved it ; and play its part, through them, in the redeeming actions of the world, though its body be burnt to ashes or drowned in the deepest sea. There is not an angel added to the host of heaven but does it ; blessed work on earth in those that it loved here.

HEALTH.

Nor love, nor honor, wealth, nor power,
Can give the heart a cheerful hour,
When health is lost. Be timely wise ;
With health all taste of pleasure flies.—GAY.

WHAT IS LOVE?

BY W. M. CARLETON.

I had a dream the other night:
I thought I sat by a maiden's side,
In a shady bower; midst many flowers
There grew the rose in all its pride.
And as we talked o'er sundry matters,
This question popped into my head:
What is love? I could not answer
No more than I could raise the dead.

"What is love?" I asked the maiden,
As she fanned her lovely brow;
She paused a moment, and then answered,
"Really, sir, I do not know.
Love, I think, is a little traitor,
Falling cheeks and causing sighs;
Breaking hearts that ne'er knew sorrow,
Drying tears from saddest eyes."

Just then I thought the earth did tremble,
The seat on which we sat did shake;
I started, rubbed my eyes, and murmured,
"I do believe I'm wide awake."
And so I was, so far as sleeping
Was concerned, sure enough;
But not enough to solve the question
What is love? O, what is love?

Courtly dame and merry dame,
Comely youth, come tell me true;
Man of years and understanding,
Tell me, for I want to know.
O Moon! who all night long supremely
Reignest, midst the stars above;
Tell me if thou knowest the secret,
Whisper softly, What is love?

What is love? my gentle reader,
With that sad and thoughtful brow;
Hast thou ever known the monest?
Has he cast his darts at you?
Gentle reader, love has never Touched this stony heart of mine,
This breast has never known a sorrow;
I hope it may be so with thine.

THE BACHELOR'S STAR.

BY HERBERT LINTON.

You asked me in your last, my good friend, to tell you something of the pretty widow, Mrs. Kingwood, whom you saw so intimate with my wife, at the watering place where you met us last summer. Louise thinks there is no one in this world so good, so perfect as her friend. She says that she must be good; for she is perfected by suffering. Although yet young, she has had an eventful life. To give you any history of that life, I must go back to the beginning; and Louise, sitting here by my side, promises to prompt me, when I forget my part.

Simon Hatfield was a farmer. He had broad lands under his feet, and look from whatever window he might, in his house, as far as he could see, it was all his own. He was fifty-five years old, and a bachelor. He married at last, but his brothers and sisters all deserted him, because his wife had been his servant.

Annie Leyden was a good and virtuous, and moreover, a lady-like and educated woman. Her father and mother dying suddenly, and leaving her no property she was induced to enter Mr. Hatfield's family as a servant, merely because no other situation presented itself. There were not then as now, places where a woman may earn her living respectably without being called a servant; and Annie was glad to find a home where she could be quiet, have her healthful food and her simple clothing, for her labor.

Mr. Hatfield was extremely kind to those under his control; and when this gentle little girl came into his house, and he saw how cheerfully she performed labors which were fit only for the strong and robust, he assigned her different and more acceptable tasks; gave her the use of his library, when he found how much she enjoyed reading, and gradually raised her to the dignity of his housekeeper.

His brothers and sisters raised a storm about his ears. They had calculated upon his property for their children, and seemed to feel that Simon transgressed his bounds, when he made any advances towards the married state, and this movement on his part seemed to betoken such advances.

Their violence precipitated the very matter which they were interested in preventing; and before three months had expired, he had taken the mild and gentle Annie for his wife. But as if the evil wishes of his relatives were bound to take effect, Simon began to experience a series of misfortunes, which threatened to crush him down entirely. Disabled by a terrible nervous disorder which painfully attacked him after riding in the wet about his farm, he lost all management of his estate; and Annie, whose whole care was bent upon soothing his bodily ailments, had little time to bestow upon his business affairs.

So farm after farm disappeared into the rapacious grasp of his brothers, until the old place was only a remnant of what it was in its palmy days. The noble forests, from which Simon would never before allow a tree to be taken, were laid low, and one by one, his possessions vanished, until scarcely enough remained to support the family.

Meantime Stephen and William Hatfield were building almost princely houses on the lands thus wrested from Simon; and enjoying the fruit of the labors which for nearly forty years he had been performing, to bring his estate to perfection. Fortunately, perhaps, he was unconscious of the extent of their encroachments; and when at the age of sixty (five years after he had married Annie Leyden), he suddenly grew worse, and died, the few lucid hours that preceded his death were not clouded by the knowledge that his widow and orphan would have little or nothing, save a house to shelter them. Even this shelter was grudged to them by the rapacious brethren; but Annie was firm in her resolution to keep this inheritance untouched for her little Ida.

I pass over Ida's youth. There is a painful circumstance connected with her marriage. Mr. Ellingwood was an old man, but very wealthy, and her mother, feeling as she did that Ida had been wronged out of her father's estate, was perhaps more solicitous that she should accept him. December and May were not more dissimilar than these two. But to Ida's praise be it spoken, she never appeared otherwise than as a kind and attentive wife. In Mr. Ellingwood's illness, she was a devoted nurse, and her conduct since his death has been most exemplary. Her mother still lives, and Ida resides with her, as well from the affection of a daughter, as from the consciousness that when a lady loses her husband, a parent's care and protection is the most desirable thing left her.

If my brief sketch does not satisfy you, come and see for yourself. The ladies are to be here to-night, on a visit of two weeks, to my wife. You can come as if unexpected; and I am sure that you will not go away without wishing to see Mrs. Ellingwood again. With the united regards of Louise and myself, I remain your friend,

E. TRACY.

Hugh Granville pondered long over the contents of this letter. It was true that he had asked his friend many questions about the fair young widow, whose mourning weeds were not yet left off, although he had understood that her husband had been long dead. Still, he rather shrank from the full history which Mr. Tracy seemed disposed to give him; as it implied that he had desired to be informed of every particular of her life. He felt almost compromised in his friend's overweening zeal to oblige him. It was very gratifying to him to know thus much of her, and yet very provoking that he should be thought of as wishing, or anxious to know it.

And then to be expressly asked to meet her! He, a bachelor, hitherto heart whole and fancy free—to be running after widows, and to be obliged to do the agreeable, and to come forward in propria persona, when he only wanted to borrow his friend's spectacles, and look at her for an hour or two without being suspected!

He knew very well that if he went to the Tracys, he would have a very severe gantlet to run, from them and others whom he believed they were just mischievous enough to invite, to see the sport of a bachelor's heart hunted down—of his heart in particular—for he had denounced matrimony a thousand times in their presence. He was half a mind not to go; and after a severe conflict with himself, it ended as such things usually do, by going straight into the enemy's camp with a defiant "Who's afraid!" look and manner.

There was a great deal that was purely imaginative and poetical in Hugh Granville. He was a man of the most delicate instincts, the quickest appreciation, and the strongest sympathy. He had been twice disappointed where he expected a reasonable share of womanly perfection; and the sudden awaking of his dream had rendered him shy and sensitive. He became nervous and irritable—and disposed to be angry with Edmund Tracy, Louise, and even with the unconscious subject of his thoughts, Ida herself. Then after indulging in his fit of spleen for a few hours, he finally slept it off, and, as might have been expected, had soon made up his mind to face the enemy.

Never had Hugh Granville been so particularly anxious about his apparel, neat and fastidious to a fault, as he always was, as when preparing for Ned Tracy's country house, where it might seem that a little negligence and freedom in dress would be pardonable; and when at last, he stepped forth from his own room, perfectly attired, and yet without a particle of foppishness, no one could have understood the overweening anxiety he experienced.

"Look forth from thy lattice," Ida Ellingwood! One cometh even now, who shall make thy heart beat as it never beat before; and yet his modesty will not believe it until it can be hidden no longer.

It was late in the afternoon when Mr. Granville entered his friend's domains. The setting sun shone brightly through the glancing leaves of the wooded avenue, through which he had to walk to the house; and as he emerged into the green lawn before the door, he heard sounds of music from within, and a sweet voice singing snatches of quaint old songs, such as he had not heard since he was a boy. It brought back one of the dearest memories of a man's heart—the memory of his mother; for it was her voice that had last sung those rare old melodies to his ear.

"Alas!" he said to himself, "we can never have but one mother."

"There is none
In all this cold and hollow world, no trust
Of deep, strong, deathless love, save that within A mother's heart."

And for a moment, Granville almost believed that he could never substitute another for that which had sufficed to him, until the past year, in which he had parted from that beloved mother.

"So good a son could not make a bad husband," Ida had said when Louise Tracy had related several instances of his remarkable devotion to this good mother; and Louise wisely made no comment, feeling that Ida's own mind instinctively grasped the very idea which she had intended.

His friend saw him from the window, and hastened to meet him; then, knowing his fastidiousness in regard to his appearance, he succeeded in hurrying him to the beautiful room appropriated to his use, before any one else was apprised of his arrival. Had the fairies built a bower for the lonely bachelor, it could not have touched his fancy more. Every spot on which a vase could stand, was adorned with flowers—not of a common or ordinary sort, but selected with rare delicacy, and arranged with special care and skill. The prettiest of furniture, carpet and hangings, the cool green of the walls, contrasting with the pure white of the dimity and lace, and the shady green blinds darkening the room to just a twilight dimness, were all noticed by Granville; for he was peculiar and delicate in his tastes as a woman.

A single plaster cast adorned one corner, a copy of the Egeria; and just beneath her, stood a large marble basin full of water, in which were gold and silver fishes. Outside of the window, an oriole had built his curious nest in the branches of a tree, where Granville could put forth his hand and touch the thick blooms that were hanging there in such profuse fragrance.

He thought of his dull, bachelor home; shut up within walls of brick and mortar, with no green thing to welcome in the summer, save a stunted rosebush, mildewing in the damp yard—no lady-like adornments of drapery to the dusty windows—no pretty ornaments scattered around. On the ample dressing bureau, lay a splendid silk-cashion, inscribed in gold letters "Ida to Louise," and with the sight of this, came back the object for which he had come. He arranged his dress, shook off the slight particles of dust which had annoyed him on his journey, and joined his friend in the hall, where he awaited his coming.

Tracy had not even told Louise that he was there; and he now entered the drawing-room, and introduced him unexpectedly. Louise welcomed him most cordially, and Ida met him with unaffected kindness and self-possession.

Granville breathed more freely. He found by her manner, that she knew nothing of Tracy's letter to him, and the knowledge that he was not expected to make himself agreeable to her rendered him more than ordinarily social and at ease.

Another visitor was there, whose beauty was much more striking than Ida's. Flora Harwood was a sweet looking girl, lovely as eyes ever looked upon. She was young—apparently not more than sixteen or seventeen, with bright hazel eyes and chestnut curls. Simply dressed in a plain white tarleton, with deep folds of the same, with no ornament but a single gold brooch, and plain gold bracelets encircling her matchless arms, she seemed as though attired in that which just suited her extraordinary beauty; so bright, fresh and glowing was her face—so pure and spotless was her attire. Beside Ida, whose pale face looked still paler in her mourning garb, she was a summer rose brought in contact with a lily.

Granville looked from one to the other. He had never seen two more beautiful women; and the heart which had been so long silent within him, now beat audibly. With that instinctive love of childhood and youth, which had always characterized him, it must be confessed that he looked oftenest at Flora—but a few moments' reflection convinced him how absurd it would be to expose himself to the unequal chances of rejection from this fair and youthful creature; and he turned with a sensation of relief from mortification, to the nobler figure and more mature countenance of Ida Ellingwood. So pale and statuesque she looked in her crape dress, revealing, by its thinness, her white arms; and above which the pure ivory throat looked whiter still, that unconsciously he gave the palm to her.

A few moments' conversation seemed to bring them into an intimacy which some might not attain for years; but to minds attuned to the same chords, it needs but a slight touch to make them vibrate together.

Tracy and his wife often exchanged glances as the conversation progressed.

"There is no need of any interference," said Louise.

"None at all, dear, they are getting along very well together."

Before the autumnal loveliness had begun to wane, Ida Ellingwood was the wife of Mr. Granville; and their home was made the scene of as perfect happiness as mortals are allowed to share. Flora Harwood is with them—for she is an orphan, fair, rich and unprotected by any relative—and Ida's kind heart could not bear to leave her thus alone in the world, with the beauty and wealth which would tempt the unprincipled to draw her, perhaps, into an unworthy marriage. The friends live side by side—for after that sweet taste of country air and freedom, Granville could not bear to go back to the city, except for his daily business. The day after the wedding, he showed Tracy's letter to Ida, of which she had never even heard before.

A RUNAWAY COUPLE.

A runaway couple, "true lovers" of the most fervent Yankee stamp, arrived at a small inn near Boston, and wanted the landlord to send for a minister to "splice 'em," and to be "quick about it." The landlord complied, and the "licensed minister" came.

"Be you the minister?" asked the bridegroom.

"I am," replied he.

"O you be, eh? What's your name?"

"Stiggins."

"Wal, neow, Stiggins," said the Yankee, "du it up brown, and your money is ready;" and forthwith the reverend gentleman commenced:

"You will please join hands."

The Yankee stood up with his lady-love, and seized her fervently by the hand.

"You promise, Mr. A—," said the parson, "to take this woman—"

"Yass!" said the bridegroom.

"To be your lawful and wedded wife?"

"Yass—yass!"

"That you will love and honor her in all things?"

"Sartin—yass, I tell yer!"

"That you will cling to her, and her only, as long as you both shall live?"

"Yass indeed—nothin' else!" continued the Yankee, in the most delighted and earnest manner.

But here the reverend gentleman halted, much to the surprise of all present, and to the especial annoyance and discomfort of the ardent bridegroom.

"One moment, my friend," responded the minister, slowly; for it occurred to him that the laws of his State did not permit this performance without the "publication of the bans" for a certain length of time.

"What—what—what in time is the matter? Don't stop here! Put her thru! What's split, parson? Anything gin eout?"

"Just at this moment, my friend, I have remembered that you cannot be married in Massachusetts, as the law—"

"Can't! Wot in natur's the reason? I like her and she likes me; what's to hender?"

"You have not been published, sir, I suspect."

"That's a fact—aint a-goin' to be, nuther; that's the reason why we crossed over into your 'little Rhody'" (the scene was on the border of Rhode Island) "on the sly, you see, parson."

"I really—sir—" said the minister.

"R-a-a-l-l-y!—wal, never mind; go ahead! 'Taint fair—don't you see 'taint? You married me, and haint teched her! Now don't stop here! 'Taint the fair thing—by gracious, 'taint now, and you know it!"

"I will consult," said the minister, hesitatingly.

"No, you wont—no, you don't! You don't consult nothin' nor nobody, until this 'ere business is concluded!" And with this, he turned the key and put it (amidst the titterings of the witnesses whom the landlord had called in) in his pocket.

Seizing the hand of his trembling bride, he said:

"Go on, now—straight from where you left off; put us through, and no dodging. It'll be all right; 'if it aint right, we'll make it right in the morning,' as the saying is."

After reflecting a moment, the parson concluded to run the risk of the informality. So he continued:

"You promise, madam, to take this man to be your lawful husband?"

"Yass," said the Yankee, as the lady bowed.

"That you will love, honor and obey him?"

"Them's 'em," said Jonathan, as the lady bowed again.

"And that you will cling to him as long as you both shall live?"

"That's the talk—stick to one another allers"—and the lady said "yes" again.

"Then, in the presence of these witnesses, I pronounce you man and wife."

"Hoorah!" shouted Jonathan, leaping half way to the ceiling with joy.

"And what God has joined together, let no man put asunder."

"Hoorah!" continued Jonathan. "What's the price?" (The parson seemed to hesitate.) "How much? Spit it out—don't be afeared. You did it like a book! Here's a V. Never mind the change! Send for a hack, landlord. Give us your bill. I've got her! Hail Columby!"

The poor fellow seemed to be entirely unable to control his joy; and ten minutes afterward, he was on his way to the railroad depot with his wife, "the happiest man out of jail," said the witnesses who described the scene.—New York Picayune.

OCULAR DEMONSTRATION.

Upon one occasion, when the Rev. Mr. Robinson was preaching, he dropped the immediate discourse and made this observation: "It is a rule with me never to use an expression which the humblest of my hearers cannot understand. I have just made use of the term 'ocular demonstration'—I will explain to you. I look into the table pew, and I see a young man in a blue coat and scarlet waistcoat, fast asleep." On pronouncing the last two words he raised his voice considerably, and all eyes being attracted to the unfortunate sleeper, he added in a lower tone, "Of that I have ocular demonstration." He then resumed his discourse in his accustomed manner.—The Pulpit.

THE SEWING MACHINE.

In a New England village, both thrifty and neat,
Of a learned divine is the quiet retreat.
The lilies are nodding each pretty bright plume;
And filling the air with their richest perfume;
Glees down by the meadow is rippling along
A river, that glides graceful willows among;
And the green-wooded hills that shut in the view
Here rise up abruptly, there fade into blue.
So fair was the spot where Dame Nature had taught her,
That, lovely and pure, grew the clergyman's daughter,
And there by the window that looks on the green,
Sits sweet pretty Jane, at her Sewing Machine.
One touch of her foot, add one turn of her hand—
From fairies you'd think she had borrowed a wand.

"Just look! Babies' dresses are done in a trice,
And the hems and the backs look so charmingly nice;
Those twenty-four towels, dear mother's demand,
Are folded, completed, and lie on the stand;
Twelve collars for Alfred, those kerchiefs for Joe,
Were finished last night, and placed all in a row:
Two dresses for Katie, my darling—and then
I will fly to the shirts, that are wanted for Ben.
How give me a book; I am free as a queen—
For do I not own this dear Sewing Machine?
A few months ago, of my life I was weary,
The future was all so laborious and dreary:
They told me, I know, I was pretty—but then,
Thou mayest let to be eldest of ten.
Let me do what I would—let me get up at dawn,
Let me work at my needle, at night, noon and morn—
These brothers, no matter how early I rose,
Would wear out, and tear out, and outgrow, their clothes,
And that mountain of garments grew mere and more high,
Until stitch upon stitch brought sigh upon sigh.
There's Mary, our fair one, so tall and so slender,
I really believe I did nothing but mend her;
When baby was born—I'm forced to confess it—
The last thing I dreamed of on earth was to bless it:
I thought of her dresses, wee ruffles and all—
She ruffled me sorely, that baby so small.
With bursters I own it, those brothers and sisters
To me were no more than just so many blisters.
When Willie, our eldest, from college returned,
My work for a moment I hastily spurned,
Then rushed to embrace him; how my feelings were torn!
For I saw at a glance that his bosoms were gone.
With oneness I tried to hide all my fears;
Put my hand on his shoulder, and burst into tears.
He tenderly twisted each wandering tress;
How well I was looking! how charming my dress!
Then laughingly asked that good brother of mine,
For the rest of the dear ones, the gay romping nine,
He whispered so kindly, 'A prize I have won;
Nay, praise me not, Jenny, 'twas easily done;
My rivals were lazy, or else from the start
They had not, poor fellows, such motives at heart;
And now with my earnings I've bought you a prize—
Your slave all the morning, your vassal all night.
To-morrow, dear sister, from sewing be free,
And begin, dearest Jenny, some reading with me.'
I poured out my thanks, while my heart beat with joy—
'Twas such a kind act of the dear, generous boy.
I'm the happiest maiden that ever was seen,
With this dear little, sweet little Sewing Machine."

Who deem that society's nothing but flaws;
Ye lady divines, and ye female M. D.'s,
Who preach to me sermons, and boast your degrees,
Who vow that this earth never safely can roll
Till you shall wear trousers, and go to the poll;
When you of your rights were raving and fighting,
Who think you the while injured woman was righting?

He who knows nothing, thinks he can teach

SIGNS AND FORERUNNERS:

—OR,—

WHAT CAME OF THOSE CHICKENS.

BY ELIA M. HALPINE.

"LET me see—here are nine, and three are twelve, and three are fifteen, and three more make just—"

"Never count your chickens till they are hatched, child," interrupted Grandmother Brown, the lady's afternoon visitor.

"But I am not counting the chickens, Mrs. Brown, I am only making a calculation of how many eggs I can spare, to put under the old speckled hen. As I was saying, three more make eighteen, and here are two which are cracked, which will make it up to twenty."

"I hope you don't intend to put her to setting on cracked eggs, Mrs. Lester?" said Grandma'am Brown, inquiringly.

"Why, Grandma'am Brown—what's the odds—aint they just as good?"

"Well, I don't know anything about your smart, Boston hens; mebbey they can hatch cracked eggs; but our old-fashioned, country biddies never would raise a chicken from a cracked egg if they set on it till doomsday."

"Well, I'm sure, I didn't suppose it made any difference," returned Mrs. Lester, looking slightly disconcerted.

Mrs. Lester was a native of the place so scornfully alluded to by Grandma'am Brown. Not that the good lady had anything against Boston in particular, but she regarded with inef-fable disdain all cities in general, and all city-bred people.

"A proud, lazy, shiftless set," she would say, "who get their living out of the hard-working country people. Never raise so much as a cab-bage, or a pound of pork; or make a pound of butter. But if I had my way I'd starve 'em to it."

Grandma'am Brown did not consider that the city fathers never would have consented to cattle and hogs being pastured in the city; otherwise, she never would have said so; for notwithstanding her oddities, she was one of the kindest hearted old ladies in the world. And as for veg-etables, there were no lack of cabbage heads, while other (than garden) sauce was liberally furnished by newsboys and cabdrivers.

Mrs. Lester, although she was city-born and city-bred, had become a great favorite with the old lady, since she left her city home, and came to reside at the old homestead, as Harry Lester's wife.

And a model farmer's wife she bade fair to be, in spite of all the ill-natured prognostications of the neighborhood gossips; who prophesied that no good would ever come of handsome Harry Lester bringing home a dainty, lily-handed city dame to be mistress of the old Lester homestead.

"Bat, la! child," continued the old lady, as she remarked that Mrs. Lester looked rather annoyed, at the betrayal of her ignorance in regard to the feasibility of raising poultry from cracked eggs. "I'm sure I don't wonder that you didn't know the odds; but, goodness me! you needn't go fur tu feeling a bit worked up about it, fur I presume tu say, that if I had lived in a corpulent city as long as you hev, I should hev been just about as big a fool."

"Well," replied Mrs. Lester, smiling, "as I shall be obliged to use some of them about cooking, I can take these; so it will make no particular difference. They'll raise cake if they will not raise chickens, I suppose, Grandma'am Brown?"

"Sartenly, sartenly, child, and save the trouble of breaking them."

"Well, then, four for some custard pies, and four more, I must have for some cake, for there actually isn't a crumb in the house, making eight; and eight from twenty leaves twelve; yes, I can spare twelve just as well as not, and if they turn out well, it will be as many chickens as I care to raise this spring."

"Gracious me! Mrs. Lester," exclaimed Grandma'am Brown, as she dropped her knitting-work, and with it more than a dozen stitches, "you don't ra'ly mean tu say that you are going to put that ere hen tu setting on twelve eggs."

"Why, yes; why not?"

"Because, child, it's a drestful unlucky number. Can't you spare thirteen?"

"No, grandma'am, I really don't see how I can, any way; you see there isn't a bit of pie or cake for supper."

"Well, then, make it eleven, child, and say no more about it; but mind what I tell you: if you vally having any luck with your chickens, don't put your hen tu setting on twelve eggs."

"But, for goodness' sake alive, Mrs. Brown, why isn't twelve as good a number as eleven or thirteen?"

"Because it's an even number, child; and an even number never brings any luck tu anybody. Any fool oughter know that."

"O, pahaw, Grandma'am Brown, that's nothing but an 'old wife's story.'"

"Well, mebbey it is, Mailda Jane, but it may be a true story fur all that. 'An old wife's story' is wuth as much as a young wife's story any day." And the old lady drew herself up with an air of offended dignity.

"Well, perhaps you are right, Mrs. Brown; you have had more experience about raising chickens than I have, you know," returned Mrs. Lester, soothingly. "Though for my part I don't see why one number isn't as good as another."

"Well, Mailda Jane, I expect I oughter know suthing or nuthar about it; for when I was a gal and lived up in Varmount, on father's farm, we girls used tu think nothing of raising between two and three hundred chickens every year; besides sights of turkeys, ducks and geese."

"What, and do all your own housework besides?" exclaimed Mrs. Lester.

"Sartenly, child, and that warnt all we used tu du, by considerable. We used tu wean all the calves, rake arter the cart in haying time, feed the pigs, look arter the colts, fodder the cattle, milk from twenty tu thirty cows, besides making heaps of butter and cheese, and choring around the house. And then in the fall, there was the making of pickles and preserves, biling down cider, and the apples, peaches and pumpkins to be cat up and dried; all the sage, peppers and sich like, roots and arbs tu be gathered and hung up in bundles tu dry; and the pork and beef tu be salted down in barrels, the lard and tallow tu be tried out, candles tu be dipped—"

"Good gracious! don't say any more for heaven's sake, Grandma'am Brown. Bless me, it makes me fairly tired to think of it." And Mrs. Lester sunk down in a chair, looking really quite exhausted. "But I suppose in the winter you did not have much of anything to do?"

"Well, child, what with the spinning and weaving I rather guess we warnt idle, nary one of us."

"Well, then, I am sure the women of your time must have been made of very different material from the women now-a-days, Grandma'am Brown."

"Child, child," replied the old lady, impressively raising the knitting needle which she had just drawn from her work, "they were made of very different sort of material; they were made of genuin flesh and blood, bone and muscle, and not got up with starch, hoops, corsets, bustles, and cotton batten. Yes," continued Grandmother Brown, "girls in them days were good for suthing. They warnt brought up tu fool away their time over worsteds and embroidery; reading novels and for everlastingly kicking, screeching by, and pounding an unfortunat piany."

And the good old lady, as she resumed her knitting, jerked the yarn with such energy, that the mammoth ball of mixed white and blue sprang from her capacious pocket to the floor, and was immediately appropriated by the kitten; who commenced industriously winding it around the legs of the tables and chairs.

"Scat, scat! shew, shew!" exclaimed Grand-ma'am Brown, in pursuit of her yarn. "Git out, you plague. There, now you have broken the yarn; take that, you scamp."

A sound box on the ears convinced puss at once of the expediency of relinquishing the ball and making good her escape; but bent upon accomplishing as much mischief as possible, she sprang upon the table, knocking off the basket of eggs, and a pile of teacups and tumblers, regained at length the open window, and from thence the branches of the old elm tree in the door-yard.

"O, dear me," exclaimed Mrs. Lester, "my eggs are all broken, every one of them!"

"So are your teacups and tumblers," replied the old lady, coolly, as she seated herself in a rocking-chair, and proceeded to unite the severed yarn by knitting the two ends together. "How-somever, it's no more than I expected, fur I never knowd any good to come of putting a hen to set on an even number of eggs—as I told you afore."

"But I have not put any eggs to set yet, and I don't see as I am likely to," said Mrs. Lester, in a tone of vexation.

"Well, child, you had made up your mind to, and it amounts to jest about the same thing; you oughter be thankful that it's no worse. Just think of what sights of trouble Mrs. Johnson had. You know Mrs. Johnson—Esquire Johnson's wife?"

"O, yes, and think a great deal of her."

"Well, jist about a year ago this spring, I went a visiting over there—we are great friends, Mrs. Johnson and I—and she was busy, same as you were, making calculation of how many chickens she would raise. She wanted to set just one more hen, and she hadn't but just twelve eggs left. I told her she had a good deal better throw them into the pig-pen; but between you and me, Mrs. Lester—though Mrs. Johnson is a proper nice woman, and I think a sight of her—still, she had her queer streaks; and one on 'em is never to believe in signs and forerunners. I remember, one night, when we watched with poor Sally—you remember Sally Stephens, she who died of the typhus last summer—well, I sot up the fore-end of the night, and then Mrs. Johnson took my place; but no sooner had I laid down on the blanket with my head agin the wall, than I heard the ticking of the death watch, as plain as I ken hear your clock on the mantel. I got up pretty quick, I ken tell you, and beckoned Mrs. Johnson to come out into the kitchen.

"'Fur goodness' sake alive! what is the matter, Mrs. Brown?" sez she.

"'It's all over with poor Sally, Mrs. Johnson,' sez I; 'there aint no kind o' use in tormenting the poor critter with any more doctor's stuff, fur Sally Stephens will never go out of the house till she's carried out in her winding sheet.'"

"'I think it's very doubtful about her recovery myself,' sez Mrs. Johnson, 'fur the doctor sez it's a very cricketical case. But hev you noticed any change?'"

"'No,' sez I; 'but the minute I laid down, I heard the death watch, and that you know is a sure sign.'"

"'La, me!' sez she, 'is that all? Why how you skered me; I r'ly thought suthing dreadful had happened.'"

"'All!' sez I, 'goodness gracious, I should think it was enough. Everybody knows that when the death watch is heered in a sick-room, they may calculate on the patient being as good as dead and buried.'"

"'O, sho!' sez she, 'I've heerd it thousands of times—specially in old decayed houses—and I never knowed it to amount to anything.'"

"'Well,' sez I, 'Mrs. Johnson, you just wait and see, and if Sally Stephens don't die some time or nuther, I lose my guess.'"

"Sure enough, the next time we met it was at Sally's funeral."

"'Well, Mrs. Johnson,' sez I, 'what du you think now about the sign of the death watch?'"

"'O, as to that, Mrs. Brown,' sez she, 'I haven't a bit more faith than I had afore. Sally had a slender constitution, and I never thought she would get well, when she was first taken down.'"

"I did r'ly think she would hev owned up when the facts stood out clear as noonday; but as I said before—though Mrs. Johnson is a proper nice woman and will ginerally hear to reason—when she once gets her head sot, she's just as obstinate as a donkey."

"But about those chickens, dear Mrs. Brown," interrupted Mrs. Lester.

"La, yes; I came nigh forgetting all about it. Well, you see, I happened to be a visiting over there that arternoon—the esquire, he was gone away; but then he's just as queer about not believing in signs and forerunners as his wife. Now it was only a week or to ago, the esquire came over to our house to get our Sam to help him about butchering his hog."

"'Goodness gracious! Esquire Johnson,' sez I, 'you aint ra'ly going tu hev your hog killed tu day, are you?'"

"'Well, yes,' sez he, 'if I can get any one tu help me about it.'"

"'O, as fur help,' sez I, 'you are welcome to Sam with all my heart; but I suppose you know that pork aint good fur nothing unless it's killed in the new of the moon?'"

"But he only laughed, and said he guessed he would risk it, as they were wanting some pork over to his house pretty bad. So in course I had nothing further tu say; but a day or two arterwards I happened tu drop in pretty arly in the morning. The breakfast table warnt cleared off, and there, on a platter, I seed sum of the pork. My stars and garters! it was all fried, shrunk, shrivelled and frizzled up; and looked tasteless as shoe leather, and brown as my silk gown. Arter I had sot a spell, and it, cum around handy, I jist axed him if he thought he hadn't missed it, killing his pork as he did."

"'Killing it how, Mrs. Brown?' sez he. 'I don't quite understand what you mean.'"

"'Why, having it killed in the old of the moon,' sez I. 'You may depend upon it, Esquire Johnson, that it's nothing else in the world that makes it shrink up, and fry all away.'"

"'Ho, ho, ho!' sez he, laughing, 'it's more my opinion, Mrs. Brown, that its present uninviting appearance is owing tu the sarcumstance of my wife's leaving it over the fire tu long, while she was up stairs tending to the children; for when I cum in from the barn, the kitchen was chuck full o' smoke, and the pork burned black as my boots.'"

"Now, Matilda Jane, I might hev talked till doomsday, and that man wouldn't hev thought any different. Sum folks never learn by experience, and Esquire Johnson is just one of them sort. Last year he actily planted his pertatoes in the new of the moon."

"'Esquire Johnson,' sez I, 'depend upon it, you wont hev more than half a crop. Pertatoes, and all sich like, had oughter be planted in the old of the moon, or instead of having bottoms, they'll all run to tops.'"

"And sure enough, in the fall when he cum tu dig 'em, the heft of 'em warnt bigger than walnuts. As usual he laid it tu suthing else; and I couldn't make him believe that the moon had anything to do with it—said it was owing to the dry weather, and could be flossically explained, and all that sort o' stuff. But sure as bugs, Mrs. Lester, here comes Jonas with the team, and I promised I wouldn't keep him waiting a minute. Just be good enough to reach me my bonnet and shawl off the bed in the bed-room?"

"O, Mrs. Brown, never mind about Jonas; stay and take tea with us, and Harry will take you home in the evening. I want to hear about those—"

"Come, grandma'am, aint you most ready?" said Jonas, putting his head in at the door.

"Yes, Jonas, I'm coming right along. Good-by, Mrs. Lester."

"But those chickens, Mrs. Brown, those chickens."

"Caught by a skunk afore they were a week old!" screamed Grandma'am Brown, as she rattled off.

HOW TO TELL A GOOD TEACHER.

A gentleman from Swampville, State of New York, was telling how many different occupations he had attempted. Among others he had tried school teaching.

"How long did you teach?" inquired a bystander.

"Well, I didn't teach long, that is, I only went to teach."

"Did you hire out?"

"Wal, I didn't hire out, I only went to hire out."

"Did you succeed?"

"Wal, I giv it up for some reason or another. You see I travelled into a district and inquired for trustees. Somebody said Mr. Snickless was the man I wanted to see. So I found Mr. Snickless—named my object—introduced myself—and asked him what he thought about letting me try my luck with the big unruly gals and boys of the district? He wanted to know if I really considered myself capable, and I told him I wouldn't mind his asking me a few questions in 'rithmetic or geography, or showing my handwriting. He said no, never mind, he could tell a good teacher by his gait."

"Let me see you walk off a little ways," said he, "I can tell jist as well as if I had heard you examined," says he.

He sat in the door as he spoke, and I thought he looked a little skittish, but I was considerably frustrated, and didn't mind it much, so I turned and walked on as smart as I know'd how. He said he would tell me when to stop, so I walked till I thought I had gone far enough—then I 'spected suthin' was to pay, and looked round. Wal, the door was shut, and Mr. Snickless had gone.

"Did you go back?"

"Wal, no, I didn't go back."

"Did you apply for another school?"

"Wal, no, I didn't apply for another school," said the gentleman from Swampville, "I rather think my appearance was against me."—Spirit of the Times.

Not to know at large of things remote
From use, obscure and subtle, but to know

Is the prime Wisdom; what is more, is fame,

ROCK RAYMOND.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITZS.

[This is a noted ledge of rock some two hundred rods west from the Merrimack. It is in itself a great curiosity. It is an outcropping of gneiss from the midst of a sandy plain, being an immense mass of that stone some three hundred feet in length, one hundred and fifty in width, and some seventy or eighty feet in height. The ledge extends nearly in a north and south direction, rising gradually from the north, so as to be of easy ascent in that direction, and ending in an abrupt precipice towards the south and southeast. This rock is seen at a considerable distance up and down the valley of the Merrimack, and from its top is a splendid view of the city of Manchester and its neighborhood. There are ledges on the eastern bank of the river equally high with Rock Raymond, but they are covered mostly with soil, while this, by some convulsion of nature, is left, projecting its frowning battlements to the skies.—Poet's History of Manchester, N. H.]

Bared is his rocky breast,
Hoary and gray.
Sunbeams at close of day
Stream from the golden west,
Long on his towering crest
Linger and play:
Silently, silently,
Die they away.

Winter winds round him roar,
Summer winds wall.
Vainly the torrents rail,
Hardly the ages score
High on the rock their tale:
Faint are the signs they wore.
Wearily, wearily,
Time makes assail.

Gaze on his giant side,
Mark well his mig. t.
Thus shall he stand in pride,
Watching the centuries fight;
Yes—when the earth shall hide
Millions now glad in light!
Steadfastly, steadfastly,
Shall he abide.

LORENZO Ghiberti.

BY GIDDINGS H. BALLOU.

You should hear the story as it was told to me—under the shade of the vine, with the glowing sun beating through the neighboring trees. Here, in this damp northern atmosphere, and in sight of that forbidding brick wall, I fear that I shall spoil it all.

More than five hundred years ago, Lorenzo Ghiberti came from Rimini to Florence. He was then a mere stripling in appearance, and scarcely more than that in age. He was of slender form, had flowing black hair, and eyes large and expressive, but rather deficient in the fiery energy with which many writers of romance like to adorn the orbs of their heroes. Ghiberti was a native of Rimini; and had first attracted the attention of its lord by his prettily-formed play-things, modelled in wood and clay for the amusement of the village children. Awakened to admiration at the talent which he could not but perceive, the Count Malatesta took the boy-peasant into his own house, and had him duly instructed in the rudiments of learning, and, as far as the circumstances would allow, in that art of sculpture toward which the genius of the boy inclined. The count was a widower, and childless—and had therefore adopted a niece of about the same age as Ghiberti. The latter, closely applied to his studies in a remote apartment of the castle, saw not much of Maria Malatesta till several months of his seclusion had passed. Nevertheless, the consciousness of her neighborhood gave a charm to the dull old walls; and, toiling at his book, or turning gladly to his clay models, an airy vision floated around the youth, in which golden-tinted ringlets, blue eyes, and archly-curved lips, bore a conspicuous part.

These scarce conscious reveries were, after all, of no moment—just such as are wont to befall every youth at the period of quitting the teens. So the time passed on. Ghiberti increased in the favor of the grim count, who every day spent a half-hour or so in the studio, watching the labor of his favorite, or chatting with him in a condescending way. Maria came with the count, occasionally. She was silent and demure, at these times; but her eyes would now and then speak, whether she chose or no. And thus a cousinly acquaintance was commenced. Afterward, once in a great while, the girl would steal, unheard, over Ghiberti's threshold, tweak his hair, or play some like mischievous prank, and then spring back into the gallery with a merry laugh, quickly escaping thence into the open air.

Two years went by. Ghiberti, grown to manhood, began to think it time for him to seek his fortune in the world. The lord of Rimini was by no means rich; and even had he been so, Ghiberti's pride would have revolted at the thought of remaining a mere dependant.

"They tell me," he said to himself, "that I have genius, and capacity for an honorable destiny. I will go to Florence. There I will see the famous artists. Who knows but that I also may by-and-by enter among the number? Such things have happened—why not to me?"

Then his thoughts lapsed, unawares, into reverie. In fancy, he beheld himself returning, years hence, to Rimini, dressed in rich costume, with a sword by his side, drawing on himself the envy of all the village youths. The old count and his niece stood ready to receive him at the castle gate with a cordial welcome. His name was famous throughout the land. After this, came dim fancies of a betrothal, in which he, and a fair young maid with laughing blue eyes, bore the chieftain part. From such imaginations, he was aroused by the approach of the count.

"Ho, sir dreamer!" said the patron. "Thou wilt to Florence then? Indeed, it is not so foolish a thought of thine, after all. Thou must have a few gold pieces in thy purse, and Father Clement's blessing, by way of a fair start, and to-morrow thou shalt be on the way. There is here no field for a youth like thee. So, so; and go take thy leave of Maria to-night—for I dare say that the girl will not be up by the time you depart in the morning."

In obedience to this counsel, Ghiberti arranged his little wardrobe, and laid aside a few drawings and pieces of carving which he desired to take with him. This done, he sought to find Maria. Near the hall entrance he discovered her, half hidden in an alcove, plaiting a bracelet of hair. As he approached her, he held in his hand a small moulding of the Virgin and Child, copied in relief from an old illuminated manuscript which the count had in possession.

"I am going to Florence to-morrow, Signora Maria," said Ghiberti, addressing the maiden with a bashful air.

She looked up, smiling and throwing back the ringlets from her brow.

"Ah, Master Ghiberti, you are to become a great artist—are you? Who then will furnish dolls for the little ones of the village? We shall miss you much. But no doubt one of these days, when you are become famous and rich, you will come and see us poor country people. But what have we here?"

Ghiberti placed in her hand the piece of carving.

"I made it for you," he said.

"For me! O how pretty it is! But then you should have knelt, in presenting it, and made a speech. I really should be angry with you, were not your present so very pretty in itself. However, I do not know that I shall give you anything in return. The old housekeeper knows everything that I possess even to that old brass brooch."

"What a beautiful braid of hair!" exclaimed Ghiberti, glancing at the object on which she had been employed.

"Fie, Master Artist!" replied the girl. "You must know that I am braiding this for my foster sister Giulia. But I care not, after all. You may as well have this, as to have nothing; and it will make no difference to her, as I have abundant material for another."

Maria appeared more careless of his departure than he could have wished. He passed a sleepless night, disturbed by a natural regret at quitting his home, and, possibly, still more by thoughts of the future on which he was now about to venture. On the morrow, at early daylight, the young artist commenced his journey to Florence. On the hill which gave to him the last view of Malatesta's castle, he paused and cast backward a lingering look. As he did so, perceived he not something white floating like a kerchief from Maria's window? He doubted. It might be the distant glimmering of the light, deceiving his vision. He went on; and as the towers of the castle drooped from sight, his last thought was of Maria.

Ghiberti entered Florence, and as soon as possible, presented himself at the studios of several well-known artists, among whom was the noted sculptor Luoga—to whom the youth bore a letter from the lord of Rimini. The old sculptor seized the letter abruptly, ran it hastily over, and then, sharply regarding Ghiberti, said:

"You come to an over-stocked market, my lad! So you have specimens of your skill to show me? Pretty—pretty! But it is hard telling what sort of flower will come from the bud! However, you need not to be cast down; I have known worse than you to become very tolerable workmen. There, then—go! go! You may come, if you like, some other day, and we will talk your affair over at more leisure, for I am quite busy just now."

Ghiberti left him with spirits sensibly lowered. On the whole, his various receptions were not too encouraging. Some praised him languidly; some warned him strenuously against imbibing the ideas and the style of their rivals, and were in turn equally denounced by others. The majority of those whom Ghiberti visited regarded him and his medallions with positive indifference—affording him few maxims for the guidance of his studies, and even these rather contradictory among themselves. The youth took counsel with himself. His funds were scanty—too much so to afford him a thorough course of instruction in the studio of Donatello, the only master to whom he as yet felt willing to commit himself. He determined for the present to attempt his own guidance, studying natural forms and the visible works of art around him. He procured a room, clay, a few tools, some small fragments of marble, and sat himself assiduously at work, living in the most frugal manner.

He had thus placed himself in a position which quickly dispelled all the flattering illusions of his imagination. He placed his medallions of carved fruit and flowers in the shop windows, and in the public places. Few stopped to gaze, and none to buy. Now and then he would procure from some tradesman an order for a carving to place above his door, or a florin or two for a sculptured head in relief of some townsman whose acquaintance he had formed. Thus starvation was kept from the door. Ghiberti's faith in himself had been strong; but it could not otherwise than yield to the slow and sure advances of discouraging adversity and neglect. In this condition were his fortunes, when the anniversary of his departure from Rimini arrived. The day found him sunk in melancholy. His labors were thrown aside; they were no longer attractive. Even necessity had lost its power. Despair had already usurped its place. Stretched at length on the floor of his poverty-stricken studio, his thoughts wandered far away, endeavoring to force themselves into an uneasy forgetfulness of the present. Plunged in this state of stupefaction, he heard the door of his apartment open, but marked it not. The rustle of a dress, a face bending over his own, and a cloud of soft ringlets, aroused him in astonishment.

"You here, Maria?"

"Why not, my poor little Ghiberti?" was the half gay, half sad, reply. "I have come to see how you were getting on. And such a toil as I have had to find you!"

"To see how I am getting on?" echoed Ghiberti, glancing about the apartment with an expressive look. "Very well; you perceive I am not yet famous!"

"Hush, my little one!" exclaimed the ardent girl, while the tears rushed to her eyes at the unintended bitterness of his tones. "All that you need is some one to cheer you, and spur you over the barrier that is already about to yield. Here, now, is a talisman which I bring you; use it for my sake, and see if it will not open to you good fortune."

With these words, she seized his hand suddenly and pressed within it a heavy gold coin. No sooner, however, did Ghiberti feel it, than he shrank quickly back, and the gold fell to the floor.

"This from you, Maria! No, no!"

His face was pale, his lips bloodless. Maria, trembling, regarded him for a moment in silence. Then, extending toward him her arms, the blood flowed over her face and neck, tinged all with a warm, impassioned glow.

"Ghiberti," she exclaimed, "I love you! You also love me! Will you then mistake my foolish offering? Hear me! I will be yours. We will work together; and I can give hope and love to inspire you in your efforts."

A bewildering haze for a moment obscured the eyes of Ghiberti. A vision of happiness glittered before his vision. But common sense, and the realities of the present, marshalled quickly against the flattering illusion.

"No, Maria," he exclaimed, with a cold but forced composure; "I am a poor and unknown carver, struggling for his daily bread. Were I to snatch you from your father's arms, from plenty and ease, the folly would bring ruin upon us both. I, who can scarce sustain myself—how should I find bread for two?"

Maria's pride was touched to the quick. She deemed that she had been deceived. That composed and icy manner repelled the advance which she now most earnestly repented having made.

"Pardon me, Ghiberti!" she said, turning away pallid as marble. "I must have been beside myself, truly. Let me then bid you farewell."

The door was already open for her departure, when Ghiberti, with a half-stifled cry, sprang forward.

"Dearest Maria," he said, "I have offended you. You know not—indeed you know not my heart. You misjudge me! I cannot with honor say more."

A smiling lustre again overspread her countenance.

"I am not, then, altogether in the wrong. Adieu, Ghiberti! You are right—I must go! But it will not be long before we meet again."

No sooner had the fair vision departed, than Ghiberti relapsed into dejection. But on the next day, his courage returned.

"At least," he said to himself, "I can endeavor to make myself worthy of her regard."

A new project presented itself to his fancy. Two days ago, the thought would have seemed to him the height of mad presumption. He would present himself as a competitor for the gates of the Church of St. John. More than ten years before, Andrew of Pisa had undertaken to make, in bronze, the southern gate of the ancient Church or Baptistry of St. John. So beautiful was the work which, after years of labor, he produced, that the magistrates of Florence, with all the foreign ambassadors, went in state to visit it. The skilful Andrew received the highest praise; the honor of citizenship was conferred upon him, and his name resounded throughout all Italy. So great was the admiration which this masterpiece received, that the government of the city resolved to offer the execution of the two remaining gates to the competition of artists of all nations. From those who should present themselves for the purpose, a certain limited number were to be selected as designers. These were to be allowed a year, each, for the execution of the designs. Each of these chosen competitors, furthermore, was to be allowed a sufficient sum for his maintenance in the meantime. At the end of the year, the final selection was to be made.

On this very day, those who desired to enter the list as designers, were to present themselves at the church before the judges. Of the claimants, Ghiberti resolved to be one. At the appointed hour he presented himself, amidst a number of illustrious persons, before a tribunal composed of two cardinals and thirty-four of the most excellent artists who had agreed to exclude themselves from the contest. These severe critics exercised a thorough examination of those who sought to enter the honorable list. Ghiberti could scarce sustain their questions.

"Who are you?" they asked. "Whence come you?—and what have you done?"

What could he answer? He had executed clay figures. He had made some small sculptures in marble. Possibly they might find some merit in one or two medallions which he had brought with him for examination. They barely glanced at these, and then, smiling at each other, summarily set him aside. He drew back covered with shame, and conscious of the derision of his companions. Before he had opportunity to depart, however, he was again summoned before the judges.

"Young sir," said one of their number, "your youth and unfriended situation, joined to some indications of talent, have induced us to recall our determination, and to admit you among the number of the designers. You will be furnished with a sum for your year's expenses. It may be well to add that you owe this directly to the intercession of that excellent artist Signor Simon de Bolle, who has himself entered the list. Nor (we are bound in justice to say) are we at all convinced that your qualifications exceed those of many others whom we have found it necessary to exclude. Nevertheless, your youth and want of advantage deserve all fitting encouragement, and we wish you all the success which you may be able to obtain."

It was but a sorry admittance, yet not to be despised by one in Ghiberti's condition. He returned home, and applied himself sedulously to his task. Maria, who had for a time found domicile with a Florentine kinswoman, whom she had left home ostensibly to visit, was not forgetful of the young student, but sent him little messages from time to time, sometimes looking in herself, cheering him with bright eyes and kindly words, and even occasionally adding a spur to his genius by her own suggestions. Ghiberti was happy for the time being. His necessary wants were provided for, he was absorbed in a congenial labor, and, whatever might be his success in the present undertaking, he could scarce fear that his fortunes should fall lower than they had been. Week after week, month after month, passed away, and found Ghiberti bringing forward his designs, laboring morning and evening with undiminished energy. Maria returned to Rimini; but the light of her presence seemed in a great degree to remain, for the artist still worked cheerfully on. At length the expected, the dreaded day, approached—arrived.

A platform had been raised for the judges near the centre of the church, and thither the contending artists came with their designs. A crowd of citizens and others, men and women, filled all the space around; for the contest excited the liveliest interest in the city and the region surrounding. Even the bustle-hating lord of Rimini had joined the concourse—having been induced by the much urging of the gentle Maria to adventure with her on a journey to Florence. One by one, the various contestants were called forward and their designs taken up for examination. Last of all Ghiberti was summoned, and placed his drawings in the hands of the judges. He who first received them eyed them closely, nodded to the next in order, shook his head gravely, and passed the drawings on. A cloud settled for a moment on Ghiberti's brain. His drawings had been rejected. Yet what else could he have expected? He resolved, if possible, to bear his fate without a single inward murmur. Was he not fortunate to have been afforded the honor of contending with such a number of illustrious artists? Looking about him, he caught sight of Maria. Her looks were fixed upon him earnestly, seeming to say—"whether thou fail or succeed, I care little, except it be for thy sake." At length, one of the judges arose and raised his hand. At the signal, all became silent as death.

"We have carefully examined the various designs which have been submitted to us," he said, "and very beautiful as some of them are, it is plain that the palm lies between those of Donatello, Bartoluccio, and Brunellesco. Between these three, we confess ourselves unable at present to decide. We must, therefore, retain them for further consideration. The other competitors will receive their designs forthwith."

The three great artists thus designated as rivals came forward and glanced at each other's designs in a friendly manner. As they were doing this, Donatello took up a drawing which lay by their side, examined it briefly, and gave it into the hands of his two companions. This action attracted the attention of Cardinal Narni, one of the judges.

"A very meritable drawing," he said, "when we consider the circumstances; and although it cannot compare with such designs as yours, yet we think there is some promise in it. Do you not agree with us?"

Donatello, who had been more particularly addressed, seemed not to observe the question.

"If your reverence and the other judges are willing," he said in return, "we would ask that you delay the dispersal of this assemblage for a few moments. We think it possible that we may adjust our respective claims among ourselves. If, therefore, you see fit, we would ask that our three designs may be delivered to us, that we may endeavor to come to some decision."

The request was speedily granted, and the three friends and rivals retired into a corner by themselves. The assemblage at large, albeit not fully understanding the scene, awaited their return in silence. They did not wait long. Donatello and his two companions stood before the judges. The sculptor paused an instant; then raising a paper high in the air, he said with a clear, loud voice:

"This, honored sirs, is the drawing which we have united in choosing. We have no doubt that it surpasses all others in excellence. On it I see written the name of Lorenzo Ghiberti."

Ghiberti was thunderstruck. He staggered, and would have fallen, had it not been for the ready support afforded by Brunellesco, near whom he had happened to approach. The multitude of spectators, with one impulse, filled the vast edifice with their acclamations. When the sound died away, the Cardinal Narni rose again.

"We must take fault to ourselves," he said, "that we have not sooner, and more fully appreciated that excellence which we can now so clearly perceive. Doubtless," he added, smiling, "our eyes were somewhat dazzled by the fame of these masters of art, who have, with so great magnanimity, awarded the prize to a youth hitherto unknown. To Lorenzo Ghiberti, we, the judges appointed, do now commit the task of forming the gates of St. John. And with the omen of that high approval which he has just received, we doubt not that he will worthily emulate the work which has made Andrew of Pisa immortal."

Again the lofty roof shook with applause, and the multitude began to disperse. But, by the side of the Count Malatesta, still delayed by the throng of people, Maria bent her head on her hands, and wept silently tears of mingled joy and sadness—an emotion inexplicable even to herself, now that Ghiberti had suddenly attained a success greater than she could have dared to hope for him. Meantime, Lorenzo hurried from the judges' stand. Eagerly he sought Maria with his eyes; and, forcing himself through the crowd, pressed on, unconscious of the complaints which he caused.

"Beware, malapert!" exclaimed a citizen whom he jostled. "Hast thou no fear, or thinkest thou that I am made of stone?"

"Hush!" replied a stout burgher. "Do you not see that it is young Ghiberti himself? We can afford to pardon him for once. 'Tis plain he scarce knows what he does; and no great wonder, considering all things."

Ghiberti bowed respectfully to his former patron, but at the same time audaciously seized the hand of Maria.

"I owe it all to you," he whispered.

"You will not forget us, now?" inquired Maria, in a broken voice.

Ghiberti's heart rose in his throat. He could only reply by a more fervent pressure. At this moment, another person joined the now isolated group. It was Donatello, who, with his arms close folded in his mantle, cast a significant glance at the count, as he addressed him aside.

"Worthy sir," said the sculptor, "I suspect that our artist has been aided by other inspiration than that of his art."

"In faith I begin to think so," replied the count, his features relaxing into a grim smile. "And since the youth has so well prospered, he may mate the girl if he will. But I should scarce have said it yesterday."

"Even so," replied Donatello. "Yesterday he was poverty-stricken and unknown. To-day, there is not a man in Florence but might envy him. His fame is sure; and both my name and yours will stand the brighter for the honor which he will reflect upon us."

Ghiberti toiled for years on the bronze gates, which, when finished, far excelled the work of his predecessor, and even the promise of his own designs. Their completion found him rich, and among the first in Italian fame. As he put the last stroke to the second gate (in a side panel of which he had joined his own head and that of his beautiful wife), he turned to his loved Maria, and letting fall the chisel from his hand, pointed to his finished work with the single exclamation: "I owe it all to you!"

The gay attire of the coxcomb makes him a leaden rapier in a golden sheath, a cork-leg in a silk stocking.

OUR MARTHA.

BY EDWIN L. RANSOM.

She grew in beauty by my side,
 A frail and tender blossom;
 Cherished, loved, ay, fondly loved,
 Within my youthful bosom;
 I loved the warm and sunny smile,
 To memory so dear;
 Bound by a sister's tender ties,
 Her heart was always near.

As from one parent tongue we learned
 Our simple, childish prattle,
 She, with a sister's words of love,
 Returned my boyish rattle.
 Where'er my childhood's fancy led,
 Her heart beat near to mine,
 With sympathy for every woe,
 Tender, true, and kind.

The pain I felt so keenly,
 The heart alone can speak,
 As I watched the youthful bloom depart
 From off her pallid cheek;
 O, sad disease, that nips the flower,
 That sips its early bloom,
 And bears its victim ever on
 In silence to the tomb!

Angels, who had only lent,
 Called us to restore her;
 And as I saw the cold, cold earth
 Close forever o'er her,
 The thought that that fond sister's arms
 Would clasp me never more,
 Was anguish to my fevered brain,
 And wrung my bosom's core.

Gone to a sainted mother's home,
 Beyond the starry clime,
 She waits, that loved one she has left
 May see the realms of time:
 Seraphs smile around her there,
 And chant their heavenly lay;
 Halo of immortal love,
 Heaven's brightest ray.

Her spirit's cold and earthly cell
 Lies deep from earthly calling,
 O'er which, an emblem of decay,
 The autumn leaves are falling:
 And soon, in turn, we must go down,
 To moulder, free from pain;
 For "dust thou art, and unto dust Shalt thou return again."

THE FIRST CZAR.

BY FRANCES P. PEPPERELL.

THE Slavonic tribes were, in the early ages of civilization, numerous, and as their name implied, full of glory. Inhabiting the vast plains of northern Europe and Asia, it was not seldom that they drove down, like hail-storms, over southern countries, ravaging, destroying, and returning triumphantly laden with spoils to their own homes. Divided into many branches, the largest, and at the same time the least noble and warlike, confined their stations within the great boundaries of what is now termed Russia. At this time the Norsemen, who in comparison with the Slavi, were civilized and gentle, were dispersing themselves almost imperceptibly in search of Asgard, the ancient city of Heaven, and thus by frequent expeditions across Russia to the Caucasus, became acquainted with and greatly revered by the barbarous tribes, while from their wanderings gaining the appellation of Varingians. During several years previous to the opening of our sketch, a company of gigantic warriors, not numerous beside the myriads of other bodies, but universally respected and feared, had been traversing Europe, now and then with expeditions to Angleland, wild, frolicking sails to Iceland and the North, or skimming in their elastic skiffs the foamy sea between the peninsulas and sharp, rocky islands of Denmark, of which latter realm Harald was king. In this company the youngest, bravest and noblest was Ruric, whose exploits were chanted in Runic rhymes by the prophetesses of the main tribe, and his name was already a terror to the Frank and Saxon. Over his brass corselet, graven, with many a dint, flowed the long locks of his golden hair, his eyes, which could be mild as a woman's, more frequently glistened like blue flame, and instead of a helmet he wore round his head only a narrow band of gold set with an immense ruby, like a star, above the forehead, at once an indication of his exceeding bravery and of his princedom, for young as he was, in his veins alone of all the warriors was said to flow the mythical blood of Odin, from whom he was lineally descended. Reverenced and idolized by all his followers, one in particular, old Troll, a staunch heart of war, guarded him, sleeping and waking, with a jealous care, bestowing upon him in double measure all the love and honor he had given in earlier life to his father.

It may be supposed that the presence of this redoubtable force in Denmark gave King Harald some uneasiness, and, though nothing was further from the Norseman's thoughts, that he constantly feared lest he should be deprived of his kingdom, and of course viewed them, while frequently making their abode in one of his woody promontories, with no favorable eye, and used a thousand stratagems to rid himself of them; but they, on the contrary, evinced no determination to leave till such time as should be convenient to themselves, and secure in their woody fastness, from whence, in case of trouble, they could easily take to their ships lying on the northern edge, or march boldly and conquering through the opposing land, they still made Denmark their head quarters.

Harald and his court had been hunting in another forest, somewhat distant, and having started a beast from its lair, were pursuing him at full speed up the long avenues of the forest, now separating through the devious paths, and now meeting in dark green glades and starting wildly off again with inspiring peals of the hunting horn. The king by courtesy had led the train, while many of the ladies, most fearless riders, were close behind, and his daughter Gerberta rode as became her nature, most generally at a tangent from the rest of the hunters, now in advance, and now beside him, and now with those lords and ladies in the rear. Thus it happened that the others had preceded her some distance, and she sat endeavoring to disengage her dress, which had been caught in some briars, while her restless steed pawed impatiently to follow the chase again. Most unlike the Danes in her beauty, for her mother (now long since dead) had been stolen in a foray from Italy, she inherited with their clear northern whiteness of skin the dusky, languishing eyes, fine, thin features, and dark, glossy curls of the South; while her form, slender, exquisite and erect, was like a reed beside the oaken growth of the North. Perhaps the little annoyance that parted the crimson lips and displayed the pearly teeth with impatience, did not at all diminish her beauty, and she was still continuing her task, when a musical voice beside her, often heard before, said—"Let me assist thee!"

"Ah, Prince Ruric, is't thou?" she answered, instantly relinquishing her occupation, which he did not immediately assume, perhaps in order to prolong the time. "I did not know," she resumed, "that thou hauntedst this forest, too. My father would give up the ghost this moment, if he dreamed it!"

"King Harald may keep his ghost. Indeed, princess, he greatly wrongs my race by fear and suspicion. We have no desire to harm him, even were not his beautiful daughter a safeguard through which no Norseman's sword would pierce!"

"So!" returned she, biting her lip with a look of disturbance. "Prince Ruric flatters! I, too, who have favored the Norse, shall begin to distrust them now!"

"What! are we not friends? Thou and I? Would any under my command then injure thee?"

Gerberta was silent a moment, and then said:

"How finely thou assistest me! See! my dress is quite free from the thorns!"

At which broad hint, Ruric at once, with his gauntleted hand, tore the thorns away, released her, and ungloving his hand, laid it on her horse's mane, while he said:

"There now, thy highness, I think my words will have detained thee no longer than the thorns would, had I not come!"

"Truly!" she answered. And then, surveying him a moment with her shadowy eyes, she exclaimed: "Pardon, Prince Ruric! but thou art the least like a Goth of any I ever saw!"

"Pardon!" returned he, proudly. "But I am no Goth!"

"And what then?"

"The invincible North gave me birth, and though all Goths are Norsemen, all Norsemen are by no means Goths. I am a knight of Asgard and a Varangian!"

"Shall I tell thee, Knight of Asgard! what I last night heard the counsellor tell my father?"

"If thou wishest, and thine honor allows."

"Bah! I have no honor—and honor need not be concerned in the affair! He said it at table. Now dost thou know the only punishment I ever received was through this man's telling of my fault—"

"Thou art therefore going to avenge thyself?"

"Thou art precise. Very well, my prince. then I sha'n't tell thee that the great Slavi nations are deliberating on the choice of a ruler, and that report says—"

"Thou'rt not telling now?" he asked, laughing.

"Ah well! If Prince Ruric doth not care to hear— When he is ruler of all that enormous Russ territory, I will tell his ambassadors to Denmark that my father's counsellor foretold it!"

"Thou hast taken, begging forgiveness, a roundabout way to break confidence!"

"Indeed! I have yet to learn that what a tipsy counsellor says over his wine is confidence!"

"And is what a tipsy counsellor says over his wine to be relied on, then?"

"Good morning, prince!" she returned, after a moment's pause, and then a laugh. "Since the day I first saw thee, thou proud one, at my father's court, I have believed that thou standest on some hilltop of the world to see all events an hour before they happen! There is to be a banquet and masque at the palace a week yea-treen, Prince Ruric!" And gathering up her reins, she dashed off, turning, however, to look at him where his magnificent and unbent stature towered in the sunlight, upon which, waving his hand, he disappeared in the shady intricacies of the wood.

What Gerberta had told him of the deliberations of the Slavi only confirmed what he already knew; but since their consultations might extend over several months, he judged it most becoming and prudent to remain silent and apart. Nevertheless, Troll, who was elated at the prospect and opportunity of power about to open before his lord, would have had him gone, as he said in that night's council, and put an end to their talk by taking forcibly the new sovereignty.

"And who knows," O Knight of Asgard!" said he, "but that somewhere in that vast unexplored region, the Heavenly City may stand illumining long wastes of territory by its splendor? Take it, prince!"

"Nay, Troll," was the answer. "Is it not a greater office to be prince over my handful of boldest warriors in the world, than to rule a race of cowards, though countless as the sands of the sea! Tell me, braves! could this sovereignty add a ray to the glory of him in whose veins runs Odin's blood?"

The shout of scorn on the Slavi, that answered him, sufficiently attested the coincidence of opinion.

"Then, my heroes, if this race call on us, we will go in to tell them what true wisdom and courage are, to make them like ourselves, and found an innumerable nation whose desires shall centre on the search for the Heavenly City. And if they do not want us, they do not deserve us, and we are happiest and most glorious as we are!"

He stood a little apart from the rest, and the soft moonlight that fell on him alone seemed to surround him with a halo and radiance that separated him from them and made him unapproachable till he should step from the magic circle, while in unspeakable reverence they bowed acquiescence. Perhaps this close judgment, calm power of self-denial, and keen eye for the glory of his race, constituted as much of his power over these grially warriors as the Odin's blood that ran in his veins.

That same night, Gerberta leaned over her balcony, half lost in thought, and half with an ear to the maudlin old counsellor who wandered with Harald through the garden walks.

"Surely," she thought to herself, "we are equals. To be sure, no Odin's blood runs in my veins, but then for hundreds of years all my fathers were kings—and so forsooth were his! And yet he is so great, so noble, there is a superiority about him which half awes me and makes me feel small. I know he kindly scorns me—I am too little and not half brave enough! O I never, never could deserve his love—and I love him with all my heart! Besides, if I were queen of Rome, I don't believe he would wed any woman who was not of the Norse. I'll ask him!" Here she paused. "Unmaidenly!" she began again, as if answering the suggestion of her thoughts. "Very well. Who cares! I've been maidenly and commonplace long enough; we'll try a little of the other, just for change."

Here the voice of the counsellor arrested her attention.

"But then, your majesty," said he, "the ambassadors declare that the King of Hungary only awaits your invitation to the mainland."

"But I've heard my daughter a hundred times declare her contempt for Olaf, and it's of no use inviting the king here unless she accepts him, which thou knowest it will be impossible to force her to do."

"The King of Hungary?" muttered Gerberta. "I rather think it will!"

"Impossible!" quoth the counsellor. "The King of Hungary is very powerful and a strengthening alliance, and since the maiden has been let dismiss some dozen suitors ere now—"

"Her head is so full of these cursed Varin-gians!"

"It is time that thou didst assert thy parental authority and make her accept Olaf!"

"Humph!" said Gerberta. "We'll see!" And she lightly swung herself down from the balcony, which was not over three feet from the ground, and confronted the pair of wise heads.

"I doubt much—" Harald had begun.

"There is no necessity for doubting at all, my father," said Gerberta, as they started back, "As for taking Olaf for a husband, rest assured I never will!—and red-hot irons shall not stir me from my resolution. And as for thee, Sir Counsellor, let me say, once for all, attend to thine own affairs, or if some night thy evening draught don't put thee to such sleep that thou never wakest again, I'm not Gerberta and thou'rt not a meddling simpleton!" So saying, she darted away again.

It was some time before the two regained their equanimity, but the next day messengers were sent, with an escort, inviting the Hungarian monarch to the metropolis of Harald, where he shortly after arrived, to be greeted with wondering eyes and utter disdain by the lady of his choice, which the crafty old counsellor assured him was the proper Danish way of receiving the first advances of courtship.

Meanwhile the great gathering of the tribes of the Slavi had not yet broken up, but encamped on one of the enormous steppes, continued the business of their assembly, and calmly drew on to the inevitable conclusion that there was no one among themselves capable of taking the exclusive rule of so great a kingdom. In the remarkable history of these wild tribes, this is, perhaps, taken in all its bearings, the most remarkable event; and we are not able to look back on their barbarism, in other respects, without a sentiment of earnest admiration at the decision so full of perfect self-knowledge, combined with rare self-denial and destruction of narrow, personal ambition, that, trusting to his magnanimity as they knew of his genius, called in a stranger to absolute control over themselves. Their resolves having finally settled on Ruric, they had arrived at the point of sending a courier to him, determined that if he was willing to trust himself, with only one other attendant, in their hands, they would not hesitate to swear allegiance to him. But all this had not transpired without many of the European sovereigns offering their services for the important post, and one after another having been laughed at and taunted by the bold Slavi. Harald, who always did everything a little too late, met with no better fate through his messenger dismissed in scorn, and Olaf of Hungary, who, thinking that a king in person might meet with more success, had entered the realm himself, was turned back in the direction whence he came, being assured with mock politeness that the sovereign whom the Slavi should choose must be as big at least as the smallest of them, which was rather reflecting on Olaf's extremely insignificant size. But Olaf's excursion had been the means of his learning on whom their choice was to fall, and with what conditions; and angry at his failure, he designed, if possible, to break up the whole affair, which he began to do by informing Harald of it. Immediately selecting two Danish servants, the king, on Olaf's arrival at Hurdurn, summoned them to receive his instructions, and bade them, when Ruric departed with the courier and the one attendant allowed him, to follow at no great distance, and then to join him in the great assembly, proclaiming themselves Varangians who dared not trust their prince alone with such savages.

"That will finish it!" said Olaf. "For these Slavi would die for one word misinterpreted, ere they'd allow themselves to be disobeyed. Of course Ruric will deny it, and then do you reproach him for ingratitude and adduce fictitious circumstances to prove your acquaintance."

"And if that fail?" asked one.

"Why, then," said Olaf, "threaten to raise every nation of Europe to war against him!"

"Nay," said Harald, who was not quite a fool, "in that case they will make common cause with Ruric and defy the whole world!—and they are strong enough to do it. Hearken! Kill him, if thou canst! I've hated him long, and now shall we see his empire large enough to swallow ours and not know it?"

It was the night of the grand banquet and masque, and Gerberta, who had offered the obtuse Olaf every manner of indignity, passed him now in her attire of black lace and diamonds, with her mask and mantle, like a diminutive tragedy queen, without in the least arousing his suspicion of her identity. The suite of rooms were brilliantly lighted and decorated, and the King Harald in his crown, and Olaf, not to be behind, in his, mingled familiarly among the revellers. The ladies of the princess made the scene gay with rainbow hues, with jest and laughter, and pleasant music floating over the scene, softened all the tumultuous sounds. The princess stood rather apart, in an alcove, overlooking the others, and as if expectant of some one, after having wandered up and down, now like a shadow and now like a sparkle, when some one, whom she suddenly perceived beside her, slipped her arm through his and remained still silent and looking at the dancers. At last, not at all embarrassed by the silence but tired of saying nothing, she turned and lifted her mask a little on one side.

"Well," said she, "Prince Ruric probably despises this frivolous gayety!"

Her companion in turn lifted his mask, with the Danish cap and plume he wore, and replied:

"On the contrary, I have joined many as frivolous in forest dells, by moon and starlight, or with some mountain tree blazing a grand illumination from trunk to spire."

"Ah? And report says thou'rt about to take one of the dancers and so dance through life with her?"

"Report is generous. But which one, pray? I have danced with many in every court we know of."

"Tell me, prince—I have summoned great courage to my aid this moment—canst thou marry out of thine own race?"

The prince, from behind the shield which his mask afforded as he held it before his face, looked down in wonder.

"O thou art dismayed!" she continued.

"Pardon—ten thousand pardons! But answer!"

"She who becomes my wife," said he, in a deep, low tone, "becomes also of my race."

The words thrilled through her. "Thou hast answered me," she said; and then relapsed into silence.

There was a singular contrast between the two forms, as they stood together—she so slender and matchless in her symmetry, he so massive and noble in height and structure. Her arm still resting on his, he drew her gently from the alcove, down the broad marble steps and into the dusky garden alleys, where the noise of the gayety came only in faint gusts of music.

"It is pleasanter here," said he. "One born and nursed in the free air can ill brook the crowded halls. Thou seest," he added, smiling, "how much of the barbarian clings to me."

"I see," she thought, "what a paradise thou canst make of a rude cavern in a hillside even!" But she said nothing.

"Thou art silent," he resumed, "and melancholy too, methinks."

"Thou knowest," was her reply, seeing he awaited it, "that Olaf of Hungary is here; that he leaves in twice seven days, and thinks to take me with him. Thou mayest well know, since, though weak and silly as I am, thou hast long condescended from thy beautiful loquacity of thought and freedom to be my friend, that I hate Olaf—that I had rather die, and yet cannot see how I may avoid him! I may well be melancholy." She felt a quick shiver pass through his arm while she spoke.

"Thou mayest well be melancholy," he echoed. "I am thy friend? Dost thou allow me that bliss? If I lack courtly phrase, believe well that my heart is in my words. Could I tear thy dark eyes and winning ways from my memory, I were wretched and lonely enough! Give not thy consent to this villanous Olaf!" He shut and set his teeth at the name. "Parry him for two weeks, and I will save thee! Canst thou trust?"

A strange, happy joy of hope, that she had never felt before, danced through her heart as she answered: "Thou shalt see how entirely."

"Some proof, Gerberta!" he added, bending over her.

She took a ring from her finger.

"It will go over no finger of mine!" he said, gaily. "Nevertheless I keep it, and when it comes back to thee, know I am near thee, and though thou be at the altar with Olaf, Ruric will save thee! Nor will he receive the ring again unless the giver go with the gift. Thinkest I shall wear the ring?"

He looked fixedly at her, till raising her eyes, she said: "Thou wilt receive the ring again."

The happy, contented smile that lit her brow, proclaimed the firmness of her belief in him.

"A singular thing, that a king's daughter should need protection of any!" he continued, as if to himself. "Will right and truth never rule the world?"

"But what takes thee off so long?" she said. "Art thou?"

"Ay, I go, and alone with Troll. Thinkest that Harald will grant to the knees of the Slavi, to the emperor, to the czar, to all the tides in creation, what he would laugh at the nobler prince of the Varangians for asking?"

"He will never grant thee anything!"

"Idle, then, were it in me to wait the banquet, and in an hour I am on my way. Notwithstanding, I fear treachery from these two kings—and if I adopt violent measures, and thou hearest of them, do not start, Gerberta."

A moment's silence, he folded her in his arms with a fervent pressure, one long kiss, he was gone, and she stood alone in the shadow. It seemed as if a happiness too deep for expression were opening before her, and in her trust she forgot the dangerous nearness of Olaf. With a different mien from the earlier part of the evening, she joined a group and entered the palace.

Mounting a swift charger, tied not far off, Ruric plied his spurs and galloped off in haste, shrouded soon by night and distance. After a few miles he overtook Troll, who lingered on the way, and as Ruric approached, drew from his mantle a bloody head, with staring, wide eyes and clotted hair. Ruric reined up in astonishment, since he knew of none with whom just now they were on hostile terms. But Troll, shaking it, whispered:

"Two of them, my prince, were sent to follow and spoil our journey by false swearing! Ha, ha, ha! Methinks I've shortened the way for one of them! I knew it from the first, but thought better to put an end to a cursed Dane, and so let them start!"

"But Troll—"

"Interrupt not! Hardly had I stepped into the skiff, when I saw them following close at hand. By Freya! My short sword did the work for him. And I've been bothering my head scrawling a billet to deck his head with. As for the other, he escaped. Therefore, dear prince, go alone, and defy Harald's plans!"

"And thou?"

"I go back to hurl this bloody missive on Olaf's plate!"

So saying, Troll galloped on the backward path, and Ruric went forward alone to his new kingdom.

The banquet was at its height, back in the palace of Harald; the wine was flowing freely, cheeks were crimsoned, eyes were sparkling; Gerberta had just ceased a song whose sweetness vibrated on the air, when another voice, harsh and strong, burst through the place.

"Prince Ruric's toast!" said the voice; and at the word, the gory head of one of the spies whirled through the air and rolled across the festive board to Olaf.

Dead silence and sharp consternation seized the guests.

"Balked!" cried the unpitiful Harald.

"Dead!" whispered the frightened Olaf, while the others, hardly breathing, neither spoke nor moved.

Harald rose and strode round. A piece of parchment, on which some rude characters were scratched in blood, clung to the ghastly forehead.

"Runic," said Harald, inspecting them. "Who reads them? By my sword, that is one thing I cannot do. Some insolent message! Who of you read Runic? Hither, Gerberta! Thou didst dabble in this once, somewhat. Read it!"

With a trembling hand, she took it and read audibly:

"Troll, frosted with winters seventy-and-three,
Troll, hating the tyrant and serving the free,
Troll, the old warrior, with sharp brand slew me!
Troll, great Ruric's captain, if he can will slay thee!"

"It seems, then," said Harald, when she had finished, "that we can do no more now. Let us wait. Time will curse him for us!"

And with all festivity and mirthfulness destroyed, the company separated, but not before the other messenger had bounded in among them, declaring the omnipotence of the Varin-gians, and his inability to proceed with that demon Troll hovering round. Thus it befell that Ruric reached the great Slavonic council, unarmed and, except the courier, quite alone. Delighted with this mark of utter confidence, as one noon the tall, young stranger appeared, followed by their messenger leading his horse, they hailed him with vociferous applause and exclamations of admiration at the beauty of his countenance, the symmetry of his great stature with its lithe erectness, and the whole kingliness of his commanding air, and before sunset they had formally invested him with all the honors of their seignory.

"Thou wantest but one thing now!" said the oldest and most privileged. "There is no maiden fair nor fine enough among us for thee, my czar. Thou wantest a wife."

And Ruric's answer was the despatch of an embassy to request the Princess of Denmark's hand.

"Hear it, Olaf!" said Harald, when they made known their business. "The Slavi humbly ask for my daughter. Too good by half!"

The old counsellor, plucking him by the sleeve, whispered that now Ruric was an emperor, it was as good an alliance as that with Hungary, and far nearer neighbors."

"And what of that?" demanded Harald. "I like Olaf—I hate Ruric. The fellow was too full of his pride when a Varin-gian, and now that he is emperor and has the very place I wanted, shall I add an iota to his pleasure, or not take my revenge? Trust me—not I! Tell thy master," he added, turning to the ambassadors, "that when Hurndurn is an island, he shall wed Gerberta, and not before!"

Gerberta, sitting at her embroidery, had heard the whole, but a quiet laugh, which a week before she could not have given, expressed her only care.

The festival of the twelve beggars had arrived, and the princess, as was her wont, with the king and court, were to go through the streets washing the feet of the twelve beggars. Already she had performed the slight ceremony to eleven, and approached the twelfth, a powerful, shaggy man, whom she remembered to have seen before. As she stooped, he dropped a ring into the basin; it was that she had given Ruric, and quietly slipping it on her finger, she wound her way back to the palace.

Meanwhile, full of indignation, the Slavi heard the rejection of their monarch by the petty Harald, and would have marched under his direction to destroy the Danes from off the face of the earth, had not Ruric persuaded them that his purpose could best be effected by a few, and rejoiced at what they considered the indomitable determination of both their leader and their race, muttered that they would have her yet.

The time fixed for his marriage by the impatient Olaf was drawing near, and still Ruric was neither seen nor heard of; but once in a while glancing at the ring she wore again, Gerberta's heart did not fail her, although not knowing any of the circumstances concerning the death of the spy, she had at first been filled with vague fears and questionings. But a chaplet of pure white roses thrown in at her lattice one night, revealed somewhat of the whereabouts of her lover, and a thousand delicate artifices seemed to spring up around her as she walked, to reassure her of safety, and fill her with certain hope. It was the day of great ceremony, and still Ruric did not appear, but all the night long, previously, strange sounds, in the channels outside the harbor on the isthmus that joined the peninsula of Hurndurn to the main land, were heard by those dwelling near, strong hammerings and heavy piling up of enormous tree trunks ; and with dawn a narrow rill was setting across the isthmus, increasing constantly every hour, while one of the Norse ships lay quietly at anchor in the offing. As the morning grew brighter, the vessel shook out a sail or two and bore down upon the shore nearer to the city, while the peasants, never thinking to identify her with the catastrophe, vainly strove to repair the damage and to stem the torrent rushing in from the sea. Intelligence of these events had not reached Harald when he sternly ordered his daughter to attire herself in the rich garments prepared for her, for two hours would see her the Queen of Hungary. Scornfully she obeyed, albeit each moment found her full of anticipation and disappointment. Listening to every sound, but without speaking, she sat patiently suffering her maidens to cluster her ringlets, and drop the heavy chains of pearl where they should drag her among them, to bind the ancestral tiara around her snowy forehead, and array her in the stiff silks and cloudy gossamers that so well became her ; and at last when she stood adorned before the public view in all the radiance of her own beauty, shrouded in lace, and glittering with gems, all the world would have confessed that never had such loveliness crossed the royal threshold of the Danes before. Harald surveyed her with just pride, and Olaf too, was there, triumphant and leering, and chuckling as he thought that this splendor was his property, and that before long he should exhibit it to coveting brother sovereigns at his own capital. Many a lady in the jubilant assemblage glanced pityingly at her, since her disgust and hatred of him were no secret ; many an elder thought of her young mother and blessed her as she passed, and many a noble heaved an unenvious sigh at thought of the sacrifice. All seemed ready for the final stroke, and for the first time a fear and a suspicion darted across her. Could it be possible that Olaf knew of Ruric's designs, had frustrated them, and in order to obtain her consent, had deceived her by those means which had hitherto kept warm her faith in Ruric's saving strength ? Her courage began to faint, her cheeks grew flushed with expectation, and her heart beat with great pulses, as the procession slowly started on foot to wind up the narrow, rocky street to the church. Scorning to touch Olaf, who stalked along with what dignity he could assume, beside her, Gerberta glided onward, now and then lifting her veil to peer out for one who did not come. Suddenly a great hue and cry arose on the left, and Troll, standing on a rude rostrum, waving the banner of the Varangians, and tearing that of Denmark to ribbons, was seen for one moment and then completely lost sight of.

While the whole procession, pausing, turned to look, a rider dashed down the stony path from above, tore through the amazed ranks, wound his arm round the destined bride's waist, and lifted her to the saddle before him.

"One cannot reckon at every bridal who shall bear off the bride, Sir King !" rang the clarion notes of Ruric's voice, as Gerberta's head lay tenderly on his bosom, and her sweet face smiled down on the throng. "Behold the channel on your isthmus ! Hurdurn is an island, and by thine own words, Gerberta is mine !"

Before the stupefied court and people could gather their wits, the hoofs of his lightning-like steed had clattered down the granite causeway, and Olaf, standing aghast with wide-gaping mouth, saw the white sails of the Norse ship winging across the straits, while they carried to Russia the first czar and his bride.

HINDOO PREJUDICES.

A little European child went, one forenoon, into his father's garden, just as the Hindoo gardener had finished cooking a large mess of chaples (unfermented cakes) for himself and a party of friends. The child touched the end of a plank, on which the food was placed, with a stick he held in his hand ; his doing this so highly offended the prejudices of the too scrupulous gardener, that he immediately threw the whole away as polluted, and with his friends fasted till evening. A Hindoo may be convicted of aggravated crime, still, on returning home, he is not excluded from the privileges of caste ; but were the same man to take a glass of water from the hands of a Christian, he would be considered an outcast ever after. Even the administration of remedies to native Hindoos in dangerous sickness, is often difficult, when Europeans have to compound for them ; some would prefer to take no medicine at all, rather than receive a remedy from the hands of an European.—Ledyard.

THE MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

You can always tell the mother by her boy. The urchin who draws back with double fists and lunges his playmate if he looks at him askance, has a very questionable mother. She may feed him and clothe him, and cram him with sweetmeats, and coax him with promises ; but if she gets mad, she fights. She will pull him by the jacket ; she will give him a knock on the back ; she will drag him by the hair ; she will call him all sorts of wicked names, while passion plays over her face in lambent flames that curl and writhe out at the corner of her eyes.—Mother's Magazine.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE.

BY MARY W. JANVRAIN.

"THEY used to say the old house was haunted, I believe, grandfather?" said Porter Weston, closing his Greek lexicon on the table, and coming closer to the fire blazing up the wide old-fashioned chimney-place. "Whew, how the wind rattles the shutters! It wouldn't be a great flight of imagination to fancy disembodied spirits abroad on such nights as this. No wonder they said the old place was haunted." And the lad brushed the brown curls from his white forehead, and got up a very comic assumption of terror, peeping meanwhile through his fingers at pretty Mary Ellery, busy with her work at the table.

"The house was haunted, lad," quietly replied Uncle Nathan, as the neighbors all termed him, taking his pipe from his mouth a moment, and puffing upward the cloud of smoke that enveloped his face.

"Was haunted, uncle? You speak in a very positive tone," exclaimed Porter, looking earnestly toward the old gentleman, who now sat smoking with renewed energy, his silver head resting on the high back of his arm-chair. "Why, grandfather, I didn't suppose that you gave credence to such old superstitions." And the lad transferred his gaze to pretty Mary, and straightened his tall form as if to disavow his belief in such superstition, and assert his manliness to his fair cousin.

Old Nathan Ellery sat erect, and laid down his pipe on his knee.

"Porter, I do believe in the ghosts, for I saw one once, and can't a man trust his own eyes? Sit down, my boy; and Mary, child, put by that flagstone work, and come here and sit down by my knee, while I tell you how I saw the ghost of the Ellery house. And mother, come, don't snap your knitting-needle at that rate, unless you mean to drown the story." And a roguish twinkle lurked in the old man's dim blue eyes as he glanced furtively toward the ancient, prim, yet slightly smiling partner of his fifty years' wedded life, who sat in the chimney nook opposite, and whom he always addressed as mother.

"Now Nathan—" began Aunt Sara; but a loud and prolonged "hem!" followed by a long clearing of his throat, preparatory to the story, effectually drowned the old lady's remonstrances, until she passively resumed her knitting.

"Here, granddaughter, sit here. Porter, push along that stool for your cousin, and now all's right; but what are you casting sheep's eyes at Mary for, you rogue? Be quiet there, sir, or no story of the haunted house to-night."

A few minutes more set all right again: with Mary Ellery's curly head on her old grandfather's knee, and Porter, the personification of repentance, in a high-backed chair opposite, and Aunt Sara plying the knitting-needles afresh, with a curious smile lurking in the corners of her handsome mouth. So Uncle Nathan began:

"It was on just such a night as this, upwards of fifty years ago, that—amidst the darkness and rain—Jerry Stetson and myself got home here at the old Ellery house. I say home, because I had never known any other. My mother I cannot remember; and my father died when I was a boy of four years, leaving me with a snug fortune, in charge of his cousin, Tom Ellery, as good a man and farmer as ever drew breath in New England. There was a great family of them: Tom, and Dick, and Harry, and Molly, and Martha. Tom, poor fellow, died in boyhood; Dick went to sea, and took the ship fever, and died in port, in sight of home a' most, poor Dick; and Harry, he was the genius and scholar of the family, and took to his books, and became a respected and wealthy doctor in Connecticut; and the girls married well off and moved away from the old homestead; but I tell you, Porter, there wasn't a happier or likelier family than the Ellerys, all together, found in old Vermont.

"I forgot to tell you, though, about little Sara, the youngest and handsomest of the flock, with curly rings of hair, and eyes as black as sloes; as full of fun and frolic as a wild colt, just such another witch as little Mary, here—eh, mother?" And Uncle Nathan gave a mysterious glance toward the old lady, knitting in her corner.

"I am not 'little Mary,' if you please, grandpapa," pouted the beauty. "I am fourteen to-morrow, and a great deal taller than grandma'am."

"So she is, and she shall have a bean, and go to the next ball in town," said Uncle Nathan, stroking her curly head fondly, with a low, chuckling laugh, whereat Miss Mary drew away quite offended, though blushing confusedly.

"The story, the ghost!" exclaimed Porter, rather impatiently; and secretly vexed at his grandfather for thus treating as a child his beautiful cousin, who, in his own eyes, was quite a full-grown and consequential young lady, already swaying (and rather vaingloriously too) her sceptre of incipient belledom.

"O, yes, the ghost, Master Impatience, your most gracious pardon; we will proceed with our story!" And the merry old patriarch went on. "Well, as I said, it was just such a stormy night as this that Jerry Stetson and myself got home to the Ellery house. Jerry lived in the next town; but the rain and darkness, and moreover the sparkling eyes of Molly Ellery, were sufficient excuses to detain him over night, and so he gladly jumped from the wagon and gave his fast horse into old Robert's hands to be stabled.

"We had both ridden far that day, for I had come from Montpelier early in the first stage—for I was in business for myself there, taking for capital the balance of my property left after my educational expenses were deducted—and meeting by chance with Jerry Stetson in an adjoining town where he had also gone on business, was glad enough to exchange the lumbering old coach for his light buggy, and a talk, as we rode along, of home.

"I had been away for upwards of a year—the family were not expecting me until the annual Thanksgiving; but taking advantage of the dull season, and leaving business to my partner, I concluded to run down and give them a surprise. Besides, Dick was just fitting out for sea, and Harry about to leave for college, and I couldn't bear the idea of not seeing the boys before they started. And so, luckily, I fell in with Jerry Stetson; and in the evening, amidst the storm which had come up at nightfall, we drove up at the old place—for we called it the old place then, children, full fifty years ago, and it don't look much older this day.

"It was in this very room—" and Uncle Nathan glanced around the dark panelled walls—"in this very room that we all met; and such hearty shakings of the hands as the old folks and the boys gave us; and then such kisses from the girls! I always thought Molly made the mistake on purpose, in kissing Jerry, and pretending she thought it was I. And little Sara, the rogue, I hadn't seen her for two years; when I used to take her on my knee, and call her my little wife—for they must needs send the pet of the family off to a fashionable boarding school—little Sara, grown handsomer than ever, really pouted because I hugged her as I had been used to in the old days!"

Grandma'am Ellery, in her arm-chair, blushed quite like a young girl. Mary laughed a little, and looked teasingly and triumphantly toward Porter, whom she had that very day denied a like cousinly favor, while the lad hurled back a very don't-care sort of glance, and pretended the deepest interest in his grandfather's recital.

"Well," went on Uncle Nathan, "we had a hearty supper, for which our ride among the mountains and the chilly storm gave us the keenest appetites; and then we all sat down around the fire and talked over old times, till the old folks grew sleepy and went to bed, leaving us young ones to our own gay, rattling conversation. Never before had I seen little Sara look so handsome, nor heard her rattle on so; and, certainly, I was head and shoulders in love before the evening was over, and wished I might call her my little wife in good earnest.

"Perhaps Dick thought as much, for happening to observe me slyly endeavoring to imprison the little white hand that lay so temptingly near me, while we sat in a circle around the fireplace, with the candles dying in their sockets, the hickory firelight leaping high every now and then, and the storm roaring at the windows—just such a storm as there is to-night, children—happening to spy me, he cried out roughly:

"'I warn you, Nat, to beware of that little demure puss at your side. We call her the family flirt—Miss Quicksilver—always shifting and changing. She boasts of the hearts she splintered to atoms off at boarding school. Says she never means to get married till the ghost of the west chamber is laid—and I've no doubt of that at all, for I prophesy she'll die an old maid!'

"Spite of Dick's warning tone and glance," went on the old man, "I ventured and succeeded in securing the little dimpled hand that Sara could not wrest free, spite of her struggles; and then, turning to Dick, queried an explanation of his words, 'the ghost of the west chamber.'

"'O, I forgot; it's something that turned up since you left us,' he replied. 'You see,' he went on, in a low voice, glancing around in the dark corners, 'on nights of storm, such as this—and by the way, Nat, perhaps you never heard the story of old Hugh Ellery, a miserly old hulk, and more's the shame, the progenitor of the respectable family of modern Ellerys; how one night of storm he was very unceremoniously sent to his account by a poor, desperate laborer whom he had wronged of his wages—well, on such nights as this, it is said the heavy tramp of old Hugh's thick boots are heard on the stairs, and his ghost, "all in white," as novels say, goes through the old west chamber, counts his hoarded gold, and then lingers by the bed which stands where he slept the night of his murder.

"'You don't suppose I believe it, Nat,' he went on, 'but the girls here have actually frightened father and mother; and Molly declares she saw the ghost "plain as day," the other night, and wouldn't sleep in the west chamber for the world! As for Sara, here, she vows she isn't afraid of any ghost—don't believe in 'em—but only yesterday, when Molly affirmed that she really "did see it," Sara gave in; and vowed, moreover, that she never would be married until the troubled spirit was laid. Suppose that you should take upon yourself that task, Nat, and sleep in the old west chamber to-night ?

"That is what I intend to do!" I answered.

"O, Nathan, you sha'n't—you mustn't—that is—'but Molly's look of fear and terror, as she turned pale and glanced from me to Jerry Simon, betrayed her.

"I laughed in high glee. 'Don't be afraid, Molly,' I said, 'that I shall let the old fellow's ghost get hold of Jerry, for I'm going to take Dick along for a bed fellow, and you can have a chance to linger here half the night and tell Jerry whether you've concluded to settle over at the Sisson farm, if you've a mind to. Come, Dick, I'm getting sleepy, and want to get a nap before the old fellow gets on his nocturnal spree. Suppose he don't get round before midnight, does he?' By that time I'll get in prime order to collar him—"lay him"—pretty effectually—and then we'll dance at your wedding, little Sara!" And with a stolen kiss, which, it must be confessed, my cousin did not resent very decidedly, we broke up the circle about the fireplace, leaving the two lovers, Molly and Jerry to themselves."

Tickle Nathan paused here; and Aunt Sara's knitting-needles clashed more furiously than ever, while that blush deepened over the old lady's still handsome, smiling face, and crept away into the silver gray hair banded over her forehead.

"Hey, mother, why don't you look up, and say something! The children here are all eyes and ears, but somehow you don't seem to care much about the ghost story," humorously ejaculated the old gentleman.

The children glanced toward their grandmother, noting the strange, confused look on her face; but they did not fathom the mystery yet.

"I suppose it is nothing new to grandma'am," said Mary. "Of course she has heard it many times before. I wonder you never told us about it, grandpapa."

The old man smiled, and the knitting-needles clattered afresh while the story proceeded.

"Well, Dick and I went to bed," went on the old gentleman, "and as I was pretty tired, and Dick was never troubled with wakefulness, it wasn't long before we both dropped off. I guess I had slept an hour or upwards—it was late when we went to bed, but I knew it must be past midnight—when suddenly I found myself wide awake, and sitting up in bed. This was unusual, for I scarcely ever awakened; but first I thought I was owing to the storm, though I found my mistake when I saw the clear starlight through the parted curtain; then I laid it to Dick's excessive nasal organs, for he lay snoring on his side, 'as the rate of ten knots an hour,' he said next day. I lay down, and endeavored to sleep again, but could not, and lay for some moments in silence. Suddenly came a sound on the staircase: a heavy tramp, tramp, as of iron boots coming directly up the stairs, along the gallery, and toward my door. I lay very still, and listened. The footsteps paused before my door, there was a momentary delay, but no sound, then the door softly opened, and, plain as I see your grandmother sitting yonder, children, a figure, clad in white, moved slowly across the floor, noiseless as a spirit, and approached the bed."

"O, grandpapa, I guess you were frightened!" exclaimed Mary; while Porter resolutely straightened himself in his chair, looking valiant enough to fight all the ghosts in Christendom.

"Well, children, I must confess that I was rather unnerved, not frightened; only a little nervous, that's all!" replied the old man. "Hey, mother's actually laughing, as if she doubts me."

And Aunt Sara really paused, laid down her knitting, and broke forth into the mellowest of laughs, though neither Porter nor Mary saw anything so remarkably funny in their grandfather's recital. At length the old lady resumed her knitting, and the story was continued.

"Yes, I was a bit nervous, lying there with that tall figure in white bending over me, and Dick all that while snoring furiously at my side. All at once the ghost bent lower, and a hand, cold as ice, was laid on my face. That broke the spell. I sprang upright—but to waken Dick with a furious shaking, and to watch the figure glide out of the door with a rustling sound.

"What the deuce is the matter, Nat?" inquired Dick. "Can't a fellow sleep without your taking the top of his head off, nudging your elbows into him? What's to pay?"

"It's come!" I whispered, 'the ghost!'

"Jerusalem! You don't say? Why didn't you speak to it?" he exclaimed.

"How do you know but I did?" I answered, the fear of being laughed at getting the better of my terror, I mean nervousness. 'You'd never hear me, if I carried on a conversation with all the defunct Ellerys that ever lived, snoring away like a saw mill under full headway.'

"Now, Nat Ellery, you don't mean to say that you've really seen the ghost?" asked Dick, now sitting up in bed, and shivering violently; whether in fear or laughter I never ascertained.

"But I suspected the latter, and immediately an idea flashed into my head: they had been playing some trick upon me—I would ascertain—and immediately I jumped from the bed.

"Don't go, he will certainly meet you again!"

"But his apparent unwillingness was but a new reason why I should brave the discovery of his ghostship; besides, at that moment, feeling very sure that Dick was cramming the pillow into his mouth in convulsions of laughter, I noiselessly slipped on my clothes, and quick as thought flung wide the door. The ghost was there, tall, white, immovable as a statue! I might have cowered; but the sound of Dick's smothered laughter came from the bed.

"Back, disturb not the dead! I am the spirit of Hugh Ellery!" said the spectre in a hollow voice.

"And I am stout flesh and blood, Nat Ellery, bound to clear up the mystery of your ghost-ship!" I exclaimed boldly.

"Whereat the figure turned and glided swiftly through the long, dim gallery. Stumbling over something lying on the threshold, I gave chase—my speed increasing, as shout after shout of laughter came from Dick in the west chamber—never losing sight of the flying figure, or ghost. Round and round the old galleries—you know, children, the old upper hall, where you have all played many and many a time at Christmas and Thanksgiving—round and round, I chased the white figure, till I gained it; caught it in my arms, and drew it near the great hall window, where the starlight came in. Already I had some faint suspicions how the ghost would turn out, and was not much surprised when I pulled away from its face the great white sheet which enveloped the figure, and saw—"

"Who, grandpapa?" breathlessly asked Mary.

"Why, can't you see?" rather scornfully inquired Porter, glancing toward her.

And then Mary followed the direction of his eyes, which were withdrawn from her own, and rested on—Aunt Sara Ellery!

"Yes, I see it all now—and—but, dear me, who'd have thought of such a thing: you a ghost, grandma'am!"

"Sure enough, nobody. Not one of the family, but madcap Dick, who was in her confidence, ever doubted but it was old Hugh Ellery's ghost, instead of a wild, romping school girl, full of fun and frolic. Even Molly, clinging to Jerry Stetson, came forth, pale as a ghost, from the sitting-room, where they had been 'sitting up' till long past midnight.

"But I forgot to tell you," said Uncle Nathan, laughing heartily, "that those were Dick's thick boots I stumbled over on the threshold where the gipsy had slipped them off before entering the west chamber. And moreover," he added, "that as I had laid the ghost, I claimed the reward, and on Thanksgiving night was married to your grandmother there, Sara Ellery."

DANIEL WEBSTER'S "DOUBLE:"

—OR, THE—

"DO"-INGS OF HIRAM BILKER.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

It was a cheerful, bracing, autumnal evening, towards the close of August, in the year 1846, when a solitary horseman rode up at full speed to the door of a tavern, recently built and commodious, which stood on the outskirts of a small town in Pennsylvania, about forty miles distant from the city of William Penn. He was a smart, dapper fellow, about thirty years of age, with a sort of confidential, domestic-servant air about him, a shrewd, restless, lively expression of countenance, and an unexceptionable appearance in the matter of dress. A one-eyed old stableman happening to be at the inn door when he arrived, the new-comer, with a consequential air, bade him take care of his horse, and then strutted into the office, where he was immediately welcomed by the clerk, who, judging from his appearance that he was either a Senator, or a member of the House of Representatives, on his way to Washington, awaited his orders with a respect not always vouchsafed to your commonplace travellers.

After hemming and hawing for a minute or two, during which his busy eyes travelled over every part of the office, which at that hour of the day was deserted, the stranger said, apparently satisfied with the result of his scrutiny:

"Yes, I think it will do; style of the accommodations better to all appearances than one could have expected; so I make no doubt Mr. Webster will—"

"Mr. Webster, did you say?" inquired the clerk, in his most deferential manner.

"Did I say Mr. Webster?" replied the stranger, coolly, "O, true, I believe I did say so. Mr. Webster—Mr. Daniel Webster, I mean, is a few miles behind on his way to Washington; he prefers quietly jogging along in his carriage to riding in the cars, and has sent me on to see if there is any good fishing in this neighborhood, and if so, whether he can have accommodations here for the night."

"Fishing! I believe you," exclaimed the delighted clerk. "Why, Johnny Frost, as they call him, took forty fine fellows out of Peachy Brook only yesterday, and as to accommodations, he can have the very best of—but perhaps I'd better call the proprietor. Here Mr. Bilker! you're wanted, sir. Daniel Webster! O Lor!"

The "proprietor," Mr. Hiram G. W. Bilker, a tall, long-nosed, sallow-faced man, with a keen gray eye, and a cigar in his mouth, quickly made his appearance, and having been informed of the cause of his being summoned, addressed the new-comer in such terms as these :

"This way, sir, if you please. Follow me up stairs, and I'll show you a set of rooms that I flatter myself will give satisfaction to Mr. Webster. I heard he was on his way to Washington. Wonderful man, sir! Stupendous man, sir! Speaks like a statesman, sir, and always to the point."

"Are you acquainted with his person?" inquired the stranger, carelessly.

"Never saw him in my life, except in the print-shop windows, so it will be quite a treat."

"Ah, then you have formed no proper idea of the man. Not one of the many portraits ever taken of him, represent the man exactly as he is. You wouldn't recognize him from any of the vile daubs passed off on the public as his likeness."

"Dear me," said Mr. Bilker, "these artists are queer fellows—not to be depended upon—I always thought so; but I shall have, I hope, the pleasure of seeing the great man—I'll wait on him myself. But here we are, sir," he added, throwing open the door of a spacious dining-room, which was separated from a suite of bedrooms by a long, narrow landing-place, at the extremity of which, facing the stairs, stood a statue of George Washington, flanked by a pair of table lamps.

Mr. Webster's domestic seemed well satisfied with the room, especially with its mahogany sideboard, which he suggested would show to advantage, if set out with a handsome service of plate, and then accompanied the landlord into an adjoining bed-chamber, one of whose windows looked out on a small yard, divided from an open field by a low wall.

"A cheerful, airy apartment enough," observed the stranger, attentively examining the lookout, "and one that will be sure to suit Mr. Webster. I see it communicates with the next room."

"Yes, but the door is always kept locked and bolted," observed the landlord.

"Indeed. Then pray let it be unfastened, and I'll take the room myself, so that in case Mr. Webster (who is somewhat of an invalid in consequence of his having over-studied some great speeches which he has to deliver during the coming session) should require my services in the night, I may be at hand to assist him. And now that the matter is settled, I must hasten back to him, for I left him at D—, awaiting my return, to determine whether or not he should go on to the next town."

"Go on to the next town!" exclaimed the alarmed Mr. Bilker. "Don't think of such a thing; it's a long way off—road hilly, and in wretched order, and so bleak that an invalid would be sure to catch his death of cold at so late an hour." And the shrewd speaker conjured up all sorts of horrors.

"Well, well, I agree with you; it would be better we should stay here for the night; so get everything ready against our coming, and let the dinner be served up in your very best style. Never mind expense, you know Mr. Webster never cares about money."

"I heard so," observed Mr. Bilker, gleefully.

"Do your best, that's all, and charge accordingly." So saying the speaker hurried down stairs, remounted his horse, and was out of sight in an instant.

All was now commotion throughout the establishment. Mr. Bilker went into his cellar, whence he issued speedily with sundry bottles of his choicest wines. The landlady paid a visit of inspection to her larder; but being dissatisfied with her scrutiny, ordered fresh poultry to be killed, and sent Johnny Frost to procure some fish from Peachy Brook. The servants were set to work rubbing up the dining-room furniture, and all the most valuable silver plate was taken from the safe, and arranged ostentatiously on the sideboard. The chambermaid was directed to put the best linen sheets on the bed, and one of the attendants was privately instructed to hire a few dollars' worth of mob to cheer the great orator as he came in, and also to present to the boys of the village money enough to enable them to buy gunpowder and fire-crackers.

Having seen these orders duly attended to, and the culinary operations put in a proper train, the landlord hastened to indulge in the luxury of a clean shave, and rig himself out in his best habiliments, while his wife exhibited to equal advantage in a showy flowered silk gown, and well oiled side-curls.

Twilight meantime fell, and the flies began to cluster about the elms that grew in front of the hotel, as Mr. Bilker stood at the door listening with evident anxiety for the sound of wheels.

At length, just as the village clock struck seven, two ragged little boys rushed frantically up to the hotel, and bursting through the crowd that was gathering in front, roared out at the top of their voices: "They're coming! they're coming!"

Instantly a loud shout was sent up by the loafers. "Hurrah for Daniel Webster!" cried one. "The constitution forever!" shouted a second. "Harra for Black Dan!" bawled a third, while the one-eyed stableman rendered himself conspicuous above all by waving the stamp of a broom in circular flourishes round his head.

"O, Hiram!" exclaimed the landlady, who was rather sentimentally inclined, clasping her husband's arm as if to support herself, "I do feel so agitated—so faint—I shall go off—I'm sure I shall!"

"It's an impressive moment, certainly," replied the landlord; "but hold on, hold on."

Scarcely had he spoken, when the tramp of horses was heard, and presently up dashed Mr. Webster's confidential servant on horseback, followed by a travelling carriage and four horses, wherein sat America's greatest orator and statesman, the great Expounder of the Constitution, the vanquisher of Hague—Daniel Webster!

And now the great man alights, amid cheers that you might have heard a mile off, and is received by Mr. Bilker at the door, with a reverence bordering on the idolatrous, while his equally awe-struck wife kept bobbing and curtsying as if she would disappear through the floor. It was, as the landlord justly observed, "an awful moment;" and all within and without the hotel felt that it was so, with the exception of the two ragged urchins above mentioned, who expressed a bitter sense of disappointment, at Mr. Webster looking just like any other man, when they had confidently reckoned on seeing him, to use their own emphatic phraseology, "as bright as a new dollar."

The instant Daniel Webster, the lower part of whose face was muffled in a thick, woollen comforter, had set foot in the passage, lights were brought, and preceded by Mr. Bilker, he ascended, bowing gracefully right and left, to the apartment prepared for his reception, on reaching which, he cast a smiling glance at the array of plate on the side-board; threw off his loose overcoat, and ordered dinner to be served forthwith. He then dismissed his servant to settle matters with the driver who had brought him on; but as he was unable to do so, owing to the landlord's inability to change a one hundred dollar note, it was agreed that Mr. Bilker himself should defray the charge, and place it to Mr. Webster's account.

During dinner, the landlord, who together with his own servant was in attendance upon Mr. Webster, was greatly struck with the good-humored and condescending manner in which he made known his several wants, and when he went into the kitchen, he assured his gaping audience that the great Daniel was a gentleman, every inch of him; adding, by way of climax, that he never saw a man pitch into victuals as he did, which the whole household agreed in considering as a great compliment to the establishment.

Dinner over, and the wine and fruit, each of the most delicious kind, placed upon the table, Mr. Webster dismissed his servant from further attendance, who therefore proceeded to consult his own creature comforts; and after feasting in the landlord's private apartment, scarcely less luxuriously than his master, he insisted on his host cracking a cool bottle of champagne with him.

"Take a scat," he said, motioning him to a chair. "Really, the wine's not amiss. Your health, Bilker!"

"I hope, sir, Mr. Webster found everything to his satisfaction."

"Perfectly so. The wine stands with you, I think."

"He's every inch a gentleman," continued the landlord, replenishing his glass. "Did you observe how he bowed to us all when he came in? Mrs. B. says she'll never forget his bow to her; it flustered her, the honor did. And no wonder, for she's very susceptible."

"She looks delicate," observed the other. "By-the-by do you snuff?" he added, taking a massive silver snuff box from his vest pocket. "If you do, I can recommend this mixture. I import it—at least Mr. Webster does from Macairabo."

Mr. Bilker applied a small portion of the titulating mixture to his nose, but being unused to it, he was seized with such a fit of sneezing as caused his nose and cheeks to assume the deep purple hue of a Dutch cabbage.

"The bottle stands with you again," said Mr. Webster's servant. "You seem afraid of it, as if it were physic. It always looks suspicious when a landlord fights shy of his own wine. Come, I'll give you Mr. Webster's health. You won't refuse to drink that, I think."

"With the greatest pleasure in life," replied Mr. Bilker.

"No heel-taps, remember."

"O, of course not," and the speaker filled his glass to the brim, and after duly acknowledging the toast, observed, "I had no idea Mr. Webster was so young a man. The prints make him look ten years older."

"That's because he's generally painted when making a speech, or studying one, which of course adds greatly to his appearance of age. Another pinch, Bilker? What, you won't? Well, I must. By-the-by, the bottle's out."

"Bottle out!" exclaimed the landlord; "well, have another, then!"

"Couldn't think of such a thing," replied the guest, with a delicate show of reluctance.

"Not a word—I won't hear a word."

"Well, since you're so pressing; but really I'm ashamed to—"

Before he could complete the sentence the landlord had quitted the room, and returned almost immediately with a fresh bottle, saying: "Ah, this is the right sort—the very best in my cellar. My service to you." And with a familiar nod to his companion, he filled his own glass, and then pushed his bottle to his guest.

"Capital indeed," said the latter, and he tossed off the sparkling wine with all the gusto of a connoisseur.

When the bottle was more than half emptied, the landlord's eyes began to twinkle, and his articulation to thicken; his face, too, assumed that shiny look peculiar to fuddled landlords, and a patch of fiery red glowed like a live coal on the top of his nose.

"Do you know," he said, "putting on a look of uncommon sagacity, such as men are apt to wear when about to be delivered of a bright conception; 'do you know, I've more than half a mind to call this hotel in future 'the Webster House!' The idea struck me when I was in the cellar just now; and I can't help thinking that Daniel would be pleased with the compliment!"

"Admirable idea—never heard a better!" And the servant pushed the bottle towards his host, himself discreetly avoiding it, like a sensible and respectable domestic who expected every moment to be summoned into his master's presence.

Gratified by his guest's approval, the landlord discussed the proposition with great eagerness, and was declaring his intention to have a sign painted without delay, when suddenly the good man's nether jaw dropped, and he exclaimed in tones of alarm, "That's my wife's voice, and now I shall catch it. Between you and me," he added, in a subdued whisper, "she's an excellent woman is Mrs. Bilker; sticks close to business—but such a vixen! Then, too, she's given to the 'sterics, always going off in some fit or other—"

He was here interrupted by the abrupt entrance of the lady in question, with her eyes flashing, and her cap half off her head.

"So, there you are, Bilker!" she exclaimed, in her shrillest tones; "I've been calling half over the house for you, and a precious condition I find you in! What will Mr. Webster think of you, when he sees you with that great, staring nose?"

"I can't help my nose, Mrs. B——; it was the gift of Providence, and it is a sin and a shame to find fault with it."

"Hold your tongue, Bilker, you're drunk!"

"Me drunk?" exclaimed the astonished landlord; "how can you stand there, Mrs. B——, and tell such a bouncer?"

"My dear madam!" exclaimed Mr. Webster's domestic, thinking it best for all parties to practise the soothing system, "I am sure a lady of your good sense and delicate feeling will see at once that your husband, as the head of this establishment, could hardly have done otherwise than take a cheerful glass, in honor of Mr. Webster's visit, more especially as Mr. Webster has expressed himself so highly delighted with his reception."

"Why, that certainly does alter the case a little," replied the mollified dame. "Nevertheless, Bilker, I can tell by your nose that you've drank quite enough; so go and wash your face and make yourself tidy, for there's a deputation come up to wait on Mr. Webster with a complimentary address. Perhaps, sir," addressing the servant, "you had better go and inquire Mr. Webster's pleasure on the subject."

"I fear, ma'am, indeed, I'm quite certain, that Mr. Webster will decline receiving the deputation, for he's travelling for his health, and as a private gentleman; however, I'll go up and ascertain his pleasure."

In a few minutes he returned, and informed the deputation, consisting of several respectable citizens, headed by a sly attorney with a smooth face, that Mr. Webster deeply regretted his inability to receive them, which he should have considered the "proudest moment of his life," but he was laboring under a partial indisposition, and must therefore postpone the honor until his return from Washington.

Having with difficulty digested this disappointment, the deputation quitted the hotel, and then the landlady, who had by this time got over the first awe of his lordship, bursting with the natural curiosity of her sex to see more of so celebrated an individual, took the opportunity of knocking gently at his door under the pretext of inquiring at what hour he would wish to have breakfast in the morning. She soon returned to the kitchen, slightly flushed, and simpering with supreme satisfaction, and informed her husband, who at Mr. Webster's servant's instigation was busy getting up an extempore supper for all his household, the cost of which was to be defrayed by the illustrious visitor, that Mr. Webster was by far the civillest and pleasantest spoken gentleman she ever saw, without an atom of pride in him.

While the delighted dame was thus running on, in praise of her celebrated guest, the chambermaid entered the kitchen, and drawing one of the helpers aside into an adjoining pantry, said :

"O, John ! I'm so shocked, you can't think."

"Indeed, what's the matter, Ella ?" inquired the surprised helper.

"Why, when I was coming out of Mr. Webster's bed-room just now, I heard him talking and laughing with Mrs. Bilker in the dining-room, the door of which was ajar, and just as she was coming away, what do you think he did ?"

"Can't imagine."

"Why, he actually kissed her !" and the chambermaid looked the very image of horror.

"What, the great Daniel Webster kiss Mistress Bilker ? Impossible."

"But, I'll swear he did ; for though I didn't see it, I heard the smack. O, John, John," added the moralizing chambermaid, "what will the world come to ?"

"Kiss Mrs. Bilker !" repeated the helper.
"The great Expounder of the Constitution kiss a tough old piece of goods like that ! No, I'd just as soon believe our minister did it !"

But the girl stuck stoutly to her text ; she had heard the smack, and as there can be no effect without a cause, her deduction was legitimate enough that the kiss was the cause of that smack. Finding her thus positive, the waiter did not contest the matter ; he was a man of the world, and had seen many extraordinary things in his time ; so after musing a few seconds, he exclaimed, with a philosophic shrug of the shoulders :

"Well, well, Ella, it's no affair of ours ; great geniuses are queer, very queer, and there's no accounting for tastes."

Further conversation was here put an end to by the summons to the supper table, at which the whole household were assembled, the landlord presiding over the entertainment. The great man's confidential servant took his post at the right hand of the landlady, having previously ascertained that Mr. Webster would not require his further attendance, and by his jests, his queer stories, and watchful civilities, speedily won the favor of the company. Such jokes as he cracked, such droll stories as he told ! The landlady simpered ; the landlord's nose blushed like a poppy ; the one-eyed stableman grinned from ear to ear with ecstasy. Bowls of strong drink disappeared like lightning, and it was not till nearly twelve o'clock that the revellers broke up, the servant remaining among the last ; and as he rose to quit the table, he warned the landlord not to be surprised or alarmed if he should happen to hear Mr. Webster stirring about his room in the night, as he was a very indifferent sleeper, and seldom enjoyed rest until an advanced hour in the morning. He then squeezed his host's hand and bade him a cordial good night ; and soon after all parties retired to their respective dormitories, where—thanks to their hearty supper—they dropped into instant slumber.

It was now deep midnight, and not a sound was to be heard within the hotel, but the melodious thorough-bass of the landlord's nose, as he snored a duet with his wife. Bright visions of the future passed through the good man's brain. He dreamed of fortune rapidly acquired through the influence of his illustrious guest, and of more delights than he could remember when he awoke next morning.

In the excess of joy occasioned by these flattering visions, the ambitious Bilker suddenly awoke, and suddenly started up, for he imagined that he heard a noise like the stealthy opening of a door in the chamber beneath him, which was the one occupied by Mr. Webster. He listens—hark ! there is a slight creaking of the boards ! Presently a footstep traverses the floor—and a minute or two afterwards the window is thrown up ! Could the great man be suddenly taken ill ? Was he restless and harassed by political anxieties, or was he merely walking in his sleep ? Mr. Bilker knew not what to think ; but being unwilling to interfere, after the caution given him by his valet, he rubbed his eyes, yawned, fell back on his pillow, and was soon again wandering in the phantom-peopled land of Nod.

At an early hour next morning, when the household were just beginning to stir, and the drowsy man-servant was taking down the shutters in the dining-room, and letting the fresh air into that close, heated apartment, a horseman, whose stoed seemed nearly spent with exhaustion, dismounted at the door of the hotel, and began thundering at it with all his might.

"Who's there ?" inquired the man, thrusting his head out of the dining-room window.

"What do you want ?"

"I want to speak with your master, Mr. Bilker," replied the stranger.

"He's not come down yet."

"No matter—I must see him, for I've come on business of importance which admits of no delay."

On hearing this, the man hastened to the door and let in the stranger, and then went to call his master, who hurried down directly in his slippers ; and no sooner saw the new-comer, than he recognised in him the landlord of the head inn at D—.

"Hey-day ! what's the matter now, Jackson ?" exclaimed the startled Mr. Bilker.

"Swindling's the matter—forgery's the matter—you're done, Bilker—done brown, as the saying is. Mr. Webster—"

"Well, well, what of him?—no bad family news, I hope?"

"Family news!" repeated Jackson, with a grim laugh. "Yes, family news enough and to spare. Mr. Webster, as he calls himself, is not only one of the 'Do' family, but one of its most distinguished members. He's a rank swindler, Bilker, and so is his sham servant."

"Impossible!" said the landlord, beginning, nevertheless, to turn exceedingly pale.

"Fact! They arranged, it seems to inform themselves accurately of the real Daniel Webster's movements, and learning that he was expected down the road about this time, they left Philadelphia yesterday, in a carriage and four, and by paying their way with counterfeit notes they contrived to escape detection till last night, when an express came to me from the livery stable keeper from whom they had procured their turn-out, acquainting us that he had discovered them to be swindlers, and requesting my aid in apprehending them, and also in exposing them as quickly as we could along the road. I had my suspicions of them when they changed horses yesterday at my house; but the fellow who played the part of Dan Webster looked so like him, and was, besides, so artfully muffled up, that I was afraid to take any decisive steps. However, the moment I learned how things were, I determined to lose as little time as possible in putting people on their guard. So I started off this morning just before it was light, thinking if they had passed the night here, as they were talking of doing, we might nab them before they were up."

"And so I will, by ——!" exclaimed the ferocious Bilker. "The infernal villains! If they'd only gone to any other hotel in the town, I shouldn't so much have minded; but to come and do me, who have been only six months in business—"

"Have they done you to any extent, then?" inquired Jackson, with a smile which he could not repress; for as Rouchefoucault has shrewdly remarked, there is something in the misfortunes of our friends which always causes us amusement.

"Done me?" thundered the exasperated Bilker. "Haven't they? I should think so, indeed! They've cleared my pantry, and cheated me out of some of the best wine in my cellar, and what makes the case still more aggravating, is that that valet, not content with drinking himself my best champagne, actually made me assist him in getting rid of it! The scoundrel got to the blind side of me by showing me a hundred dollar note, and telling me a story about Mr. Webster's being indisposed, though I might have known it was all gammon, for the fellow ate more like a horse than an invalid. And to think I should have gone bowing and scraping to such a scoundrel! Here, John, go instantly for the constable!"

"O, sir! Mr. Bilker, here's a pretty to do!" screamed the chambermaid, rushing along the passage where the above dialogue was held. "They've gone—both off—the bedroom's empty—the window's wide open, and a rope ladder's hanging out of it!"

"Gone?" gasped the bewildered Bilker, exhibiting serious indication of apoplexy. "Gone! that accounts for the noise I heard last night, and which I was told to take no notice of. Gone! O what an ass I've been!"

"O, Hiram! Hiram Bilker!" exclaimed the landlady, who now joined the group, "not only are the villains gone, but all the plate on the side board's gone too! O, Hiram! it's an awful blow! I shall go off; I'm sure I shall!"

"Go off!" roared the half-frenzied husband; "d'ye think there hasn't been enough going off already this morning?"

Stung to the quick by the sarcasm, so unusual in her generally placid husband, and forgetting even the loss of her plate in the affront offered her before a stranger, the indignant landlady rushed in a paroxysm into the kitchen; and as a family quarrel generally runs through a household, she immediately let loose the flood-gates of her wrath on the unoffending cook; the cook resolving not to be the only sufferer, lost no time in abusing the porter; the porter visited his indignation on the one-eyed stable-man, and finding no one else he could safely attack, consoled himself by flinging a broom at the cat; so that in a short time the whole establishment was in as pretty a state of uproar as could be desired.

The landlord, meanwhile, continued stamping and swearing in a way dreadful to think of; the whole of that day he kept on swearing in different directions, while his friend Jackson posted placards on every wall for miles round; but all was in vain, the rogues were never caught; and to this day, though so many years have elapsed, Mr. Bilker never hears Daniel Webster's name mentioned, without shivering as if he had got an ague fit.

All medical men unite in declaring that nothing is more beneficial to health than hearty laughter; and surely our benevolent Creator would not have provided, and made it a source of health and enjoyment to use it, and then have made it a sin to do so. The prevailing temper of the mind should be cheerful, yet serious; but there are times when relaxation and enjoyment are proper for all.

Curious Matters.

Ornithological Clock.

As botanists have constructed a flower clock, so (we read in the foreign journals) a German woodsman has recently invented an ornithological clock, by marking the hours of the waking and the first notes of the little singers. The signal is given by the chaffinch, the earliest riser among all the feathered tribes. Its song precedes the dawn, and is heard in summer from half-past one to two o'clock, A. M. Next, from two to half-past three o'clock, comes the black-cap (Sylvia atricapilla), whose warblings would equal those of the nightingale if they were not so very short. From half-past two to three o'clock the quail is heard. From three to half-past three the hedge sparrow. Then, from half-past three to four o'clock, we have the blackbird, the mocking-bird of our climates, which imitates all tunes so well that M. Deraud de La Malle made all the blackbirds of a French canton sing the Marseilles hymn, by letting loose a blackbird which had been taught that tune. From four to half-past four o'clock the lark pours forth its melodies; from half-past four to five o'clock the black-headed titmouse is heard. Lastly, from five to half-past five o'clock, the sparrow, the gamin of the skies, awakes and begins to chirp.

A romantic Case.

An interesting trial is about to take place in Bucharest. One of the great families of this country, that of Brankovan, was supposed to have become extinct some years ago, and the last member of it adopted the son of Prince Bibesco. An old man, seventy-five years of age, in the service of Russia, has, however, just put in a claim to the property, on the ground that he is the lawful successor to Catherine II., Prince of Brankovan, and Volvoide of Wallachia, a century ago. This person was, it appears, accused of high treason, and the Turkish government sent janissaries to his palace, who decapitated him, and carried off his children to Constantinople. There the children were ordered to be strangled, and they were all killed except one, who by some means escaped, a negro boy being killed in his place. The little Brankovan was conveyed to Georgia, and when he grew to man's estate married a princess of the country. By that princess he had a son, who is the person who has now come forward.

Curious Fact.

A proof of the well known fact in natural history, that a toad continues to live, although deprived of food, light and air, was witnessed at Kinnahaird, in Ross-shire. One of Mr. Ross's sons, on the 12th of August, 1866, placed a live toad in a box about four inches square, and buried it a foot and a half under ground. On the 12th of August, this year, the box was dug up, and, on removing the lid, the toad was found to be alive, and apparently in excellent health, and it walked off as if nothing had happened.

Strange Delusion.

Curious delusions as to the powers of sorcery still occur from time to time in criminal courts—witness the following instance which we clip from an exchange: "Hannah Banks admitted, recently, before the public tribunal at Hull, England, that she had roasted a toad alive, pounded it with the food of her fellow-servant, to induce him to love her—but alas! unavailingly."

A white Negro.

Once, and only once, during my life, says Waterton, I have had an opportunity of examining minutely an entirely white negro. In the year 1812, there lived in the town of Stabrock, the capital of Demerara, a man of this complexion. He was a robust young fellow—by no means what they called an Albino, as his eyes were just of the same color as those of his tribe. He went by the name of Buckra Jem, or White Jemmy, and was a tailor by trade. I found his skin in all respects the same as my own, saying that where the sun had given mine the appearance of mahogany, his was blotched with broad freckles of a lighter tint. In other respects he was in reality a negro from head to foot. He stood apparently about five feet nine inches in height, with a finely expanded chest, and a back as straight as an arrow. But he was deficient in the calves of his legs, while you could not help remarking the protrusion of his heels, so remarkable in the negro. Both his father and his mother were healthy jet black negroes. He appeared to be about twenty years old, and was probably the only white negro ever seen in Demerara.

A New Cannon.

The "Journal de Geneve" gives an account of an experiment made a short time since of a mechanical cannon, which loads itself and fires twenty shots a minute. The inventor thinks that he will be able to arrive at thirty. The balls crossed the Rhone without the gun, which was mounted on a plateau, making any recoil worth speaking of. This cannon is the invention of M. Ravel, a manufacturer of musical instruments; and among the persons present at the experiments was an old general of the empire, who proposes to send a report of the affair to the French Artillery Committee, as well as several other officers, engineers, etc., who were all astonished at what they saw, and warmly congratulated the inventor on his success.

Singular Grecian Antiquities.

The "Esperance," of Athens, states that near the village of Arnaouth, not far from Pharsalia, a tomb has just been discovered which has been ascertained to be that of Hippocrates, the great physician, an inscription clearly enunciating the fact. In the tomb a gold ring was found, representing a serpent—the symbol of the medical art in antiquity—as well as a small gold chain attached to a thin piece of gold having the appearance of a band for the head. There was also lying with these articles a bronze bust, supposed to be that of Hippocrates himself. These objects, as well as the stone which bears the inscription, were delivered up to Housin Pacha, Governor of Thessaly, who at once forwarded them to Constantinople.

A Curious Case.

A case came before the Surrogate's Court of New York, lately, in which a rare point occurred. Mr. McLooney, a gentleman worth some $150,000, dying in Paris, left $9000 to a niece in Dubuque, Iowa. The niece or legatee died on the same day as the testator. If the hour of her death preceded his, the legacy lapsed; if it succeeded his, the legacy is vested in her. The time of their decease was so nicely identical that it is supposed it will have to be determined by the difference between solar and true time, the legacy thereby depending upon a question of longitude.

An Odd Adventure.

A curious circumstance took place recently near Paris. A nobleman driving hitherwards with his family from his chateau, had alighted to walk, while the carriage went on. Suddenly a man attacked him, pistol in hand, with the usual polite invitation to yield up his "tin" under pain of extermination, to which our count agreed, surrendering his effects with as good a grace as possible. The robber thereupon demanded his elegant paletot, considerably offering his own somewhat tattered garment in exchange; even this unreasonable barter was agreed to. Salutes were exchanged, and the count made the best of his way to his carriage, much to the amazement of his lady, who nearly took him for a highwayman. Shortly after, on putting his hand into one of his coat pockets, he was agreeably astonished to find his own gold watch, and in the others all the articles he had given up, besides a gold snuff box and other valuables which had evidently been stolen from some other victim. The robber had forgotten the contents of his pockets when he exchanged his old garment for the count's paletot!

An extraordinary Surgical Triumph.

The Lowell News says that some twenty-seven months ago, a young man named W. K. Foster had the whole of one elbow joint torn out by an accident. He was taken to the hospital, where Dr. Kimball, advised by Doctors Graves and Dickey, proceeded to saw off the fragmentary bones, shortening them some two and a half inches, and then uniting them so as to make a new joint and arm. He moves the joint with perfect ease, though not quite so fully as the other, and can, as he says, hold out twenty and a half pounds with the hand at arm's length. The arm is now nearly three and a half inches shorter than the other, and is a good and reliable arm for all the purposes of labor to which Mr. Foster is called.

Remarkable Discovery.

Among other remarkable stories we have a wonderful "fish story." While a company of miners were working a river claim on the middle fork of the American River, California, they came upon a bed of quicksand, in which they found imbedded seven fish suckers, which, upon being taken out and put into a pump hole, which contained some four feet of water, immediately plunged to the bottom, and in their movements exhibited every evidence of being again in their native element. The quicksand in which they were imbedded was twenty-two feet below the present river bed, and was overlaid by a strata of red clay, as well as sand, and boulders large and small.

Strange Proclamation.

There is a proclamation extant, addressed by Russia to the Circassian chiefs, in 1837, in which it is asked: "Are you aware that if the heavens should fall, Russia could prop them up with her bayonets? The English may be very good mechanic artisans, but power dwells only with Russia. No country ever waged successful war against her. If you desire peace, you must be convinced that there are but two powers in existence—God in heaven and the Emperor upon earth."

Singular Idea.

In the cemetery at Nuremberg is a tomb to the memory of a beautiful girl, who was killed as she lay asleep in her father's garden, by a lizard creeping into her mouth. The story is represented in bronze bas relief, and the lizard is so constructed as to move when touched?

Curious Law Question.

As the late Earl Fitzhardinge's rent roll is supposed to have been about £40,000 a year, a nice point, it is remarked, may arise on the question of the precise hour of his death, which is announced as having taken place "about midnight" between the 10th and 11th of October. His rents were payable at "old time," that is, Old Lady Day and Old Michaelmas Day. Old Michaelmas Day fell this year on Sunday, the 11th of October, and the day begins at midnight. Now, the rent is due upon the first moment of the day it becomes due, so that at one second beyond twelve o'clock of the 10th, rent payable at Michaelmas Day is in law due. If the earl died before twelve, the rents belong to the parties taking the estate, but if after twelve, then they belong to, and form part of, his personal estate, so that the difference of one minute might involve a question as to the title of about £20,000.

Instability of Fortune.

Mr. Beeton, a timber merchant of Bristol, some years ago, retired on a fortune of nearly £4000 a year, the proceeds of a landed estate which he had bought in Herefordshire. Unfortunately for Mr. Beeton, he did not spend all his income, and wanting more money, he put a few thousands into the firm of Brisford, Byer & Co., a mercantile house, by which he became a sleeping partner though his name did not appear before the public. Recently this firm broke, and Mr. Beeton was summoned to Bristol, and found that every shilling of his fortune was swallowed up in the debts of the house.

Strange Disease.

French papers state that in the southern portion of the province of Helsingland, in Sweden, a singular disease has lately manifested itself in the pine forests. The leaves and branches of the tree gradually change their ordinary color for a reddish brown. Life ceases at the same time, and one after another the trees die. The disease was first noticed a couple of years ago, since which time it has spread over the whole district. It causes much alarm among the inhabitants.

Remarkable Tree.

An apricot tree, at Hantewille, has for many years past given a produce which would be incredible, if the fact were not notorious. In the year 1855 this tree yielded no less than 16,000 apricots, and this year the produce has been at least 10,000 full-sized and perfectly-ripened apricots. The tree, which is, we believe, upwards of forty years old, measures twenty feet in height, and has a span of sixty feet, thus covering a surface of 1200 feet.

Perfumery among the Ancients.

Homer but twice alludes to anything of the sort being in use among the Greeks; and centuries after the Jews had been commanded to make incense, the Athenians were forbidden by Solon to use perfumery. Among the Lacedaemonians the luxury was always discountenanced, and perfumers were expelled from the city as wasteful of oil, upon the same principle that they dismissed all who dyed wool because they destroyed its whiteness.

Natural Indicators.

Munkrat, it is said, proportion the thickness of their cell walls to the temperature of the coming winter; and as they are building them very thin this year, a mild winter may be expected.

The Florist.

Madonna, wherefore hast thou sent to me
Sweet basil and nightshade?
Emblem of love and health, which never yet
In the same wreath might be.—SHAKESPEARE.

Flowers.

Many of these are excellent indicators of approaching changes by their opening and shutting, and other motions. We wish some observing friend would note these, and give us the result. For instance, the evening primrose, opens at sunset, and closes at daybreak. Linnaeus has enumerated forty-six flowers that possess sensibility to the weather. 1. Meteoric flowers, which less accurately observe the hour of feeling, but are expanded sooner or later, according to cloudiness, moisture, or pressure of the air. 2. Tropical flowers, that open in the morning, and close before evening, every day; their hour of expanding becoming earlier or later, as the length of the day increases or decreases. 3. Equinoctial flowers, which open at an exact hour of the day, and, for the most part, close at another determinate hour.

The Pistol Plant.

There is a hot-house plant, Pilea allitrichoides, of tender, brittle, and juicy aspect, which looks as if it would be good to eat in a cooling salad, but which is really of so explosive a temperament that it might fairly be called the pistol plant. When near flowering, and with its tiny buds ready to open, if the plant is either dipped in water, or abundantly watered, each bud will explode successively, keeping up a mimic Sebastopol bombardment, sending forth a puff of gunpowder smoke, or a little cloud of dusty pollen, as its stamens suddenly start forth to take their place and form a cross. It is no novelty; but it is still an amusing toy.

The Persian Iris.

This is a low plant which sends up a stem shorter than the leaves, a single, very powerfully-scented flower, washed with blue on a light ground. It is propagated with difficulty either from seeds or offsets, and does better in a pot under a frame, in the same compost as is used for hyacinths, than in the open ground. The Scorpion Iris is a curious and striking plant, producing in early spring two or three sweet-scented bright blue flowers, on a very short stem.

Bulbs in Glasses.

For growing in glasses the narcissus, hyacinth, early dwarf tulip, jonquil, Dutch and common iris, Persian and dwarf Scotch crocus are suitable. Dark bulb-glasses are most congenial to the formation of roots, but the transparent glasses exhibit the progress of growth, which is an interesting spectacle. The water should be soft, and the bulbs just reach through the neck to the upper chamber, so that the bottom of the bulb should be a little immersed. Fresh water should be given every few days.

Verbenas.

No family of plants better rewards the care of the cultivator, and none can be more beautiful than the Verbenas. The old scarlet Verbena melindres is the most brilliant of all kinds, though one of the most tender: it is a prostrate plant, and when pegged down, it is well adapted for covering a bed in a geometric flower garden; or it may be planted in a vase, or rustic flower-basket.

Camellia Japonicas.

The superb appearance of this shrub, with its persistent foliage of glossy green, and splendid flowers, place it without dispute in the first rank among greenhouse plants. It is a plant of hardy habit, and will sustain a slight frost without injury of a serious nature; but it is liable to disease and ultimate death in a greenhouse or sitting-room, where the temperature greatly varies—as is frequently the case with dwelling-rooms, where the heat is high by day and low by night. Indeed there are few plants more susceptible to change, and the buds will from such transitions frequently become discolored and fall.

Aloysia.

This is a half-hardy shrub, with panicles of small pinkish white flowers and very fragrant leaves, which fall off in winter. It requires rich but light soil, well drained; and when grown in pots, it should never have water kept in the saucer. In winter, after the leaves fall, it should be kept quite dry till the buds begin to swell, then watered frequently and abundantly, but water should never be allowed to remain round the roots. It is easily propagated by cuttings, and only requires to be protected from severe frosts.

Primula Sinensis.

A pretty plant, flowering all winter, giving a variety of shades in its blossoms, varying from red to blush, and even white. It will grow in any soil, and may be propagated by side shoots, which manner of propagation will preserve any particularly handsome variety. The plants seed easily, and the seeds may be sown in any season. There is a double variety of rose color and white.

Transplanting.

The points to be attended to in transplanting, are—care in taking up, to avoid injuring the spongy roots of the roots; planting firmly, to enable the plant to take secure hold of the soil; shading, to prevent the evaporation from the leaves from being greater than the plant in its enfeebled state can support; and watering, that it may be abundantly supplied with food in its new abode.

Indian Jasmine.

A beautiful parlor plant, which gives out its odor only by night, and is the flower alluded to by Moore in the following well known lines:

The timid Jasmine buds, that keep Their odor to themselves all day;
But when the sunlight dies away,
Let the delicious fragrance out
To every breeze that roams about.

Warratah.

A very beautiful plant, so called because its bright crimson color resembles the true Warratah plant or Telepea of Botany Bay. It should be regularly watered in the flowering season; but it may be kept almost dry during the winter months. It is propagated by cuttings or suckers, which it has in abundance.

Order.

In a botanical point of view the word Order signifies a number of genus, which coincide in several important particulars. As for example, according to the natural system, the order Cruciferae includes all the plants that have their flowers like a Greek cross; and according to the Linnæan system, the order Trigynia includes all the plants belonging to any particular class, the flowers of which have these styles, etc.

Gathering the Perfumes of Flowers.

The perfume of flowers may be gathered in a very simple manner, and without apparatus. Gather the flowers with as little stalk as possible, and place them in a jar, three parts full of olive or almond oil. After being in the oil twenty-four hours, put them into a coarse cloth, and squeeze the oil from them. This process, with fresh flowers, is to be repeated, according to the strength of the perfume desired. The oil, being thus thoroughly perfumed with the volatile principle of the flowers, is to be mixed with an equal quantity of pure rectified spirits, and shaken every day for a fortnight; then it may be poured off, ready for use.

Spring Flowers.

Following the early bulbous flowers, comes next in succession, several very early herbaceous perennials, among which are the Claytonia, the Hepatica, Adonis, wood anemone, Phlox subulata or moss pink, pansies, cowslip, sweet-scented violet, creeping Phlox, Dodecatheon, and Erythronium. About the same time with some of these appear the hyacinth, daffodils, jonquils, and the brilliant varieties of tulip.

Dwarf Plants.

Take a cutting of the plant you wish to dwarf, say a myrtle, for instance, and having set it in a pot, wait until you are satisfied that it has taken root; then take a cutting from it, and place it in a miniature flower pot, taking care to fill it more than three parts with fine sand, the remainder with mould. Put it under a glass, on the chimney-piece, or in any warm place, and give it very small quantities of water.

Heath-mould.

Heath-mould is very often confounded with peat-bog, by amateur gardeners; but the fact is, they are naturally different. Black peat consists of vegetable fibre prevented from decomposing by a superabundance of water, but heath-mould is peat mixed with sand.

Other Perennials.

The tulip is followed by a rapid succession of herbaceous perennials, some of the finest of which are the Veronicas, the earlier Phloxes, the Lupins, Iris of many sorts, Columbines, Oriental and Caucasian poppy, and the magnificent varieties of the herbaceous Paeonia.

Autumn Flowers.

These are obtained largely from the successful culture of annuals, and from the hardier green-house plants, among the most successful and desirable of which are the verbenas and salvias. The blue salvia is a splendid flower, and contrasts finely with the scarlet.

Chrysanthemums.

The chrysanthemums, including the dwarf or "pom-pom" flower almost every winter. They are hardy, and will succeed, if planted in open ground, with a shelter, and full exposure to the sun during the latter part of autumn.

Midsummer Flowers.

The Spiraea, the Cypripediums, the Lychuis, Chinese lily, peach-leaved and large-flowered Campanulas, Chenitis erecta, the Aconites, several Pentstemons, Dianthus, Coreopsis, etc.

Leaf Printing.

After warming the leaf between the hands, apply printing ink, by means of a small leather ball containing cotton, or some soft substance, or with the end of the finger. The leather ball (and the finger when used for that purpose), after the ink is applied to it, should be pressed several times on a piece of leather, or some smooth surface, before each application to the leaf, that the ink may be smoothly and evenly applied. After the under surface of the leaf has been sufficiently inked, apply it to the paper, where you wish the impression; and, after covering it with a slip of paper, use the hand or roller to press upon it, as described in the former process.

Hollyhocks.

The hollyhock is a showy and brilliant flower, and used to be the glory of old-fashioned gardens. It was then banished by fastidious taste, but has again come into favor. The Dutch, however, make a pot plant of it, growing it as a dwarf. It is a gross feeder, and requires rich, unctuous soil. It is chiefly valuable as an out-door plant, and fine groupings may be made with it in gardens, interspersed with the shrubbery.

Early Flowers.

The earliest bulbous flowers are Snowdrop, single and double, Bulbocodium vernum, Crocus, several colors, and Siberian squill, all of which appear in bloom as soon as the snow disappears from the ground. It seems premature to speak of this occurrence, but now is the time to lay plans for the ensuing year, when there is plenty of time to deliberate.

Villa-Shrubby Creasroohet.

This is one of the few Cruceiferae shrubs. It is evergreen, and only grows two or three feet high, with glaucous leaves and bright yellow flowers, which appear in April and May. It will thrive in any garden soil. It is propagated by cuttings of the young wood planted in sand under glass.

Chorosema.

One of the prettiest of the pea-flowering family, C. varium or varia; has a leaf almost like holly, and when raised from the seed, scarcely two will be alike in foliage. It thrives in one-third loam and two-thirds turfy peat. This variety is naturally shrubby and handsome.

Monopsis—Lobeliaceae.

A very beautiful trailing plant, having dark blue flowers with conspicuous yellow anthers, and the flowers on long fort stalks. It is a native of the Cape of Good Hope, and should be grown in sandy peat. It is suitable for rock work.

Brachysema.

A very ornamental New Holland climber, with fine large glaucous leaves and crimson flowers; it grows freely in loam and peat, flowering abundantly, and ripening seeds; by which, or by layers or cuttings it may be easily propagated.

Fothergilla.

American dwarf shrubs, with large, handsome leaves, and white, fragrant flowers. The plants should be grown in a moist, peaty soil, and are injured by severe frosts. The flowers appear before the leaves.

The Housewife.

Economy in Eating.

Hall's Journal of Health makes some timely remarks on economy in eating. It says: "When the best beef steak is selling at twenty cents a pound, the butchers are glad to sell the 'rein' piece at eight or ten cents a pound. It has no bone or fat. Three pounds of this for twenty-five cents will make soup enough for a family of eight or ten persons two days, besides the meat for one dinner; it is a hundred per cent cheaper than the purchase of a knee joint, at forty cents, for soup. Of all the parts of corned beef, that is the most nutritious and cheapest which is called the round, which has neither bone nor gristle, nor waste fat worth naming. Both in the purchase of meat and fish, persons are generally falsely economical in choosing an article with bone in it, at two or three, or more cents a pound less than a piece which has none.

Syrups of Fruit.

These are prepared in a similar manner to capillaire, substituting the juices of the fruit in place of the water; in this way it is very easy to make syrup of oranges. Before the oranges are squeezed, to express their juice, each orange should be well rubbed or grated with the lump sugar—by so doing the fine flavor of the rind is preserved. All these syrups are drunk by diluting them with water. About a wine-glassful of syrup to a tumbler of water will be found to make a pleasant draught.

To whiten Linen that has become yellow.

Cut up a pound of fine white soap into a gallon of milk, and hang it over the fire in a wash-kettle. When the soap has entirely melted, put in the linen, and boil it half an hour. Then take it out; have ready a lather of soap and warm water, wash the linen in it, and then rinse it through two cold waters, with a very little blue in the last.

Turkey hashed.

Cut up the remains of a roasted turkey; put it into a stewpan with half a gill of Sherry wine, shallots, truffles, mushrooms, chopped parsley, salt, pepper, two spoonful of culls, and a little stock; boil half an hour, and reduce to a thick sauce; when ready, add a pound of anchovies and a squeeze of lemon; skim the sauce free from fat, and serve altogether.

Forced Turkey or Fowl.

Take all the bones from the turkey; fill it again with either good sausage meat or veal forcemeat, with or without truffles, as may be required; braise it in a cloth, keeping it a good shape; when done, glaze the breast a good color; use silver skewers to ornament with, and any of the sauces named, or a fricandeau sauce, under it.

Candied Orange Peel.

Soak the peels in cold water, which change frequently, till they lose their bitterness; then put them into syrup till they become soft and transparent. Then they are to be taken out and drained.

To bake Apples.

Gouge out the eyes and fill them with sugar; set the apples in a pie plate, pour in a teaspoonful of water, and bake. Eat with cream and the juice found in the dish when done.

Art of Tea-Making.

Use soft water, and be sure it boils. If you are compelled to use hard water, throw into the kettle a piece of carbonate of soda; but the latter should never be used unless the water requires correction, and then very moderately, for it is apt to destroy the delicate roughness of the flavor. Put your tea into the empty pot, and be sure you use enough. Some persons practise a foolish economy in this matter, and use so little that the product is not much better than plain hot water. Then place the pot before the fire, or on the hob, or, still better, on the hot plate of an oven, till the tea is well heated, but, of course, not burnt; then pour upon it the boiling water; and a fragrant infusion of good strength is instantly produced.

Apple Sauce.

Pare and core three good-sized baking apples, put them into a well-tinned pint saucepan, with two table-spoonful of cold water; cover the saucepan close, and set it on a trivet over a slow fire a couple of hours before dinner,—some apples will take a long time stewing,—others will be ready in a quarter of an hour; when the apples are done enough, pour off the water, let them stand a few minutes to get dry; then beat them up with a fork, with a bit of butter about as big as a nutmeg, and a teaspoonful of powdered sugar. Some add lemon-peel, grated, or minced fine,—or boil a bit with the apples. Some are fond of apple sauce with cold pork.

To give a fine Color to Mahogany.

Let the tables be washed perfectly clean with vinegar, having first taken out any ink-stains there may be with spirits of salt. Use the following liquid: Into a pint of cold-drawn linseed oil, put a mixture of alkanet-root and rose pink, in an earthen vessel; let it remain all night, then, stirring well, rub some of it all over the tables with a linen rag; when it has lain some time, rub it bright with linen cloths.

Bologna Sausages.

Take equal quantities of bacon, fat and lean, beef, veal, pork, and beef suet; chop them small, season with pepper, salt, etc., sweet herbs and sage rubbed fine. Have a well-washed intestine, fill, and prick it; boil gently for an hour, and lay on straw to dry. They may be smoked the same as hams.

Tripe.

After being thoroughly scoured, tripe should be soaked in salt and water about a week, shifting the water every eight and forty hours; then boil till tender, or from eight to ten hours; then pickle, fry or broil. Pickle it the same as soups.

Cure for Corns.

Take two ounces of gum-ammoniac, two ounces of yellow wax and six drachms of verdigris, melt them together, and spread the composition on soft leather. Cut away so much of the corn as you can, then apply the plaster, and renew it every fortnight till the corn is away.

Excellent China Ink.

Finest lamp-black, 75 parts; thick mucilage, 15 parts; strong ink, pale new, 50 parts; ox gall, 12 parts. Grind them well together, and if too soft evaporate a little of the water by a gentle heat; if too thick add more ink.

Apple Island.

Stew apple enough to make two quarts, strain it through a sieve, sweeten it with fine white sugar, and flavor it with lemon or rose. Beat the whites of twelve eggs to a hard froth, and stir into the apple slowly; but do not do this till just before it is to be served. The apples should be stewed with as little water as possible, and those that are not very juicy are to be chosen. Put it into a glass dish. Serve a nice boiled custard, made of the yolks of the eggs; or the imperial cream to eat with it. Half this quantity makes a large dish full.

The Knickerbocker Pickle.

To three gallons of soft water, put four pounds and a half of salt, coarse and fine, mixed; a pound and a half of brown sugar, an ounce and a half of saltpetre, half an ounce of saleratus, and two quarts of good molasses. Boil the mixture, skim it well, and when cold pour it over the hams or beef. Beef laid down in this pickle does not become hard, and is very fine, when boiled gently and long. Some persons consider this the best of all methods for curing beef and hams.

Victoria Fritters.

Take a loaf of baker's bread, slice it into pieces an inch thick, cut each slice in the centre, trimming off the crust, and place the bread on a flat dish. Take a quart of rich milk, a salt-spoonful of salt, eight beaten eggs, stir the whole together, strain it, and pour it over the bread several hours before dinner, that the bread may be equally moistened. Fry in hot butter a delicate brown, and eat with a sweet wine-sauce.

Fruit Stains in Linen.

To remove them, rub the part on each side with yellow soap, then tie up a piece of pearl-ash in the cloth, etc., and soak well in hot water, or boil; afterwards expose the stained part to the sun and air until removed.

To sharpen Razors.

Water half a pint, auratic or sulphuric acid three drachms: mix; and steep the razor in this for half an hour, wipe it, and set it on the hone. A saturated solution of oxalic acid is also recommended.

To renovate black Crape.

Skim-milk and water, with a little bit of glue in it, made scalding hot, will restore old rusty black Italian crape. If clapped and pulled dry, like fine muslin, it will look as good as new.

Rheumatism.

Flannel waistcoats, after being washed, should be fumigated by burning sulphur in a box, such as is used by bonnet cleaners. Scarlet flannel should be preferred.

Relaxed Muscles and Nerves.

Rhubarb powder, seven grains; powdered Peruvian bark, two scruples; cascarrilla bark, ten grains; mix with a glass of port wine or water. To be taken twice a day.

Vanilla Chocolate.

This beverage is apt to affect many constitutions, exciting the nervous system by tremors not unlike those caused by drinking spirits.

Universal Liniment.

The following liniment is useful for rheumatism, lumbago, sprains, bruises, unbroken chilblains, and insect bites. Take one raw egg, well beaten up, half a pint of vinegar, one ounce of spirits of turpentine, a quarter of an ounce of spirits of wine, and a quarter of an ounce of camphor. Beat these ingredients well up together, then put them in a bottle, cork it, and shake them for ten minutes, or till they are thoroughly mixed. Then cork very tightly in order to exclude the air. For rheumatism in the head, rub the back of the head and behind the ears, and for other complaints the parts affected.

Rice Balls.

Put a pound of rice into three half-pints of cold water, with a little salt. Boil it very soft, adding more water, if necessary, to swell it perfectly. Stir in a teaspoon full of butter while hot, and grate in half a nutmeg. Set it aside till cold, and then beat two eggs; make the rice into balls, and dip them in the egg; then roll them in fine cracker crumbs, and fry them in hot fat.

Scurf in the Head.

A simple and effectual remedy is to drop a lump of fresh quicklime, the size of a walnut, into a pint of water; let it stand all night, then pour the water off clear from the sediment or deposit, add a quarter of a pint of the best vinegar, and wash the head with the mixture. Perfectly harmless; only wet the roots of the hair.

Dr. Clark's Pills for Nervous Headache.

Scottrine aloes, powdered rhubarb, of each one drachm; compound powder of cinnamon, one scruple; hard soap, half a drachm; syrup enough to form the mass. To be divided into fifty pills, of which two will be sufficient for a dose; to be taken occasionally.

Calf's Foot Broth.

Boil two feet in three quarts of water, until it is wasted to three pints. Strain it, and set it aside in a cool place. When cold, take off the fat. Heat a little at a time as it is wanted, and add salt, nutmeg, and, if approved, a spoonful of good wine.

Horseradish Powder.

The time to make this is during November and December; slice it the thickness of a shilling, and lay it to dry very gradually in a Dutch oven (a strong heat soon evaporates its flavor); when dry enough, pound it and bottle.

To cure Spasms.

Take two pennyworth of camphor, and infuse it in one pint of brandy. Let it stand forty-eight hours, and then it is fit for use. When the attack comes on, take one teaspoonful in a wine-glass of water.

To cure a Cold.

Take the juice of two lemons, three-quarters of a pound of loaf sugar, simmer it half an hour, then add two table-spoonful of paregoric. Teaspoonful three times a day.

To cure Hiccough.

It is not generally known that a piece of loaf-sugar will instantly stop the most troublesome hiccough.

Candied Lemon-Peel.

This is made by boiling lemon-peel with sugar, and then exposing it to the air until the sugar crystallizes.

Editor's Table.

MEDICAL FREAKS.

Il Medico Poeta (the Physician and Poet) is the title of a folio by Dr. Cammillo Brunori, published at Fabriano in 1726. The leading object of his work is to prove that there is nothing in the nature of things to forbid the banns of marriage between poetry and medicine; that an excellent physician may be an excellent poet, and vice versa. The example of Dr. O. W. Holmes, of this city, who has written some exquisite poetry, and who is equally distinguished as a son of Esculapius, will occur to our readers as substantiating the doctor's position. But his own heavy work, in twelve ponderous cantos, tells rather against him. It is a sort of medical ars poetica; and it is followed by a hundred and seventy-two sonnets, on all diseases, drugs, parts of the body, functions of them, and curative means. We have a sonnet on apoplexy, a sonnet on blisters, etc., with a compendious account in prose of the subject in hand appended to each on the opposite page.

In this strange mess, among other curious notions, the medical uses of the human skull are gravely insisted upon. All skulls, Dr. Brunori informs us, are not of equal value. Indeed, those of persons who have died a natural death are good for little or nothing. The reason of this is, that the disease of which they died has consumed or dissipated the essential spirit! The skulls of murderers and bandits are particularly efficacious. And this is clearly because not only the essential spirit of the cranium is concentrated therein by the nature of their violent death, but also the force of it is increased by the long exposure to the atmosphere occasioned by the heads of such persons being ordinarily placed on spikes over the gates of cities! Such skulls are used in various ways. Preparations of volatile salt, spirit, gelatine, essence, etc., are made from them, and are very useful in epilepsy and hemorrhage. The notion that soldiers have, that drinking out of a skull renders them invulnerable in battle, is a mere superstition—though respectable writers do mention that such a practice is a preventive against scrofula. Verily medical science in Italy in the beginning of the last century must have been at a very low ebb indeed!

ROSSINI.

Rossini has lived to see his own creations undiminished in public favor through a period which embraces a Bellini, a Donizetti, and a Verdi. The old man is often seen strolling along the Boulevards, Paris, his restless and still brilliant eye never failing to recognize the approach of a friend. Time has been wonderfully sparing with that rare mind. Rossini is still in possession of all his mental faculties, and converses with the animation and enthusiasm of a temperament winged with a joyous elasticity, such as one might imagine was in full vigor when the "Barbiere de Siviglia" was created. He takes a lively interest in the political condition of Italy, and will speculate on the regeneration of his native land in the language of a patriot. He never visits the theatres, and seldom speaks of music; but whenever he does refer to the art of which he is so brilliant a star, it is ever to bestow a kind word on those who have followed him. Another noble feature in the character of Rossini is his kindness in receiving unknown artists and composers. It may easily be imagined how many aspirants of the musical art are anxious to be presented to the immortal Rossini, and how much value they place on his opinions and advice; yet he seldom refuses the request of a friend to present any artist of promising talents. He is very charitable, and although possessing limited means, frequently performs acts of charity, only a few of which are known to the world. His habits are simple, and his intercourse with the world exceedingly limited. He receives a small musical circle once a week, the evening hours being occupied with conversation and occasionally a little music. Rossini himself seldom touches the piano. We do not hope that he will ever write again; he has frequently said that he has done his best, and has no wish to give the world anything after the "Stabat," which was the solemn heaven-painted sunset of his glorious day; it is the religious hymn of a soul conscious of its approaching flight. We do not remember any great man who has lived so many years after the consolidation of his fame as Rossini.

SATIRISTS.—They are ever the least in talent who become malignant and abusive.

THE ROBIN RED-BREAST.

The gay, bold, flaunting robin of our gardens and orchards, though a beautiful bird, is a very different creature from the little gentle robin red-breast of England, which a young Briton would no more think of shooting than he would of killing his grandmother. The sacredness of the English bird is attributable to the part he is represented as playing in the touching old ballad of the "Children in the Wood:"

"No burial this pretty pair
Of any man needeth,
Till Robin Red-breast plonely
Did cover them with leaves."

It is not uncommon to find in poets of all ages some allusion to the pious care of these birds for the bodies of the dead. Thus Collins, in his "Dirge on Cymbeline," says:

"The red-breast oft, at evening hours,
Shall kindly lend his little aid,
With heavy moss and gathered flowers,
To deck the ground where thou art laid."

In the earlier edition of "Gray's Elegy," the following exquisite lines were inserted before the epitaph:

"These scattered oft, the earliest of the year,
By hands unseen, are showers of violets found;
The red breast loves to build and warble there,
And hither footstep lightly print the ground."

In a book entitled "Communications with the Unseen World," an allusion is made to a "sweet superstition current in Brittany, which would explain the cause why the robin red-breast has always been a favorite and protégé of man. While our Saviour was bearing his cross, one of these birds, they say, took one thorn from his crown, which dyed its breast; and ever since that time, robin red-breasts have been the friends of man."

NATIONAL PARADOXES.—Somebody once remarked, that the Englishman is never happy but when he is miserable; the Scotchman and Frenchman is never at home but when he is abroad; and the Irishman is never at peace but when he is fighting; while the Yankee is never easy unless he is driven to death by business.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.—Why were we, in the easy times of last winter, like a man whose father secretly leaves him a tin-shop in his will? Because we didn't know that there was a Pannikin-store for us!

A WEALTHY ACTRESS.—Miss Charlotte Cushman is said to be worth a quarter of a million of dollars—and she deserves it.

VERY GOOD.—Punch speaks of venison as the deer departed. 'Taint nothing else.

ANIMAL FOOD.

Housekeepers have had their wits and their purses well probed for several years, on the question of how to keep up with the increasing price of animal food. According to the statistics from 1840 to 1850, the increase of our population was more than 35 per cent., while the increase of stock to supply food was only 172.3 per cent. In New England and the Middle States, during the above decade, while the population has steadily augmented, the stock has decreased nearly 8,500,000 head. In the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky and Missouri, there has been an increase of 7,500,000 head of stock, but the rate of increase in people has been vastly greater. At the same time, the export of provisions was in 1845 to 1846 inclusive, $110,521,000, and from 1852 to 1856 inclusive, $233,079,000. To account, then, for the high cost of provisions, we have an immense increase in population, decrease in stock, and a vast increase in exportation. The business of farming is therefore not yet overdone.

FIRST DISCOVERERS.—There is a penalty for doing more or better than your neighbors. Galileo gained only imprisonment by his discoveries. The inventors of printing did not fare much better. The first who discovered the power of steam was confined in the Bicetre, at Paris. Dr. Darwin was considered almost insane because, in his inflated verse, he predicted the uses to which it would be applied. These were all discoveries of men who, rising above their fellows, toiled at the shadows of the great things their minds conceived or saw. Statues and bronzes now celebrate the merit that was denied them at the time.

OHIO.—We see by a statistical pamphlet, which some western friend has sent to us, that Ohio produces a crop of wool this year worth $6,000,000. This is real wealth, no stock bug, about six million dollars worth of wool.

A DUTCHMAN'S PIG.—A lawyer asked a Dutchman in court, what ear-marks a pig had that was in dispute. "Vell, he has no ear marks except a very short tail."

A QUERY.—When the poet speaks of "striking the trembling lyre," does it not suggest the image of a schoolmaster flogging a quaking urchin for uttering a falsehood?

THE TIES OF INTEREST.—The trade of England with the United States represents an annual total of £40,000,000, or $200,000,000.

FIGHTING AND PRAYING MEN.

Among the sternest duties that devolve upon mankind is the occasional necessity of taking up arms, and going forth to slay or to be slain in some great cause. War, from whatever point of view it be contemplated, is a frightful evil. It is accompanied by immediate and followed by remote and permanent misery, too well understood, alas! to be commented and dilated on. That many wars have been unnecessary and unjustifiable is also well understood—unholy wars that have been called holy, but from which the inexorable hand of history tears away the veil that conceals the abhorred features of the Moloch. But amidst the mist arising from innumerable fields of carnage tower some forms of warriors clad in the panoply of truth, before whom the muse of history kneels in admiration and respect, at whose feet she lays laurels ever green and fresh, and glorious, though the crimson drop may rest on their enameled leaves. There are the Washingtons, the Tells, the Hampdens, who have drawn the sword only at the call of their country, in whose hands the shining weapons are the rods with which God chastises the tyrants and oppressors. While condemning and deploring war in general, we must except many an individual struggle, such as that of our own Revolution, in which the shedding of blood was justified by the national conscience and the voice of religion.

And who, it may be asked, have ever been found the bravest among the brave, the most fearless, the most reliable, the most lenient in victory? Not the Dugald Dalgettys of military service—not the paid Hessians and the hiring Switzers, but the men of principle and prayer. Sternest and bravest in battle, were the iron followers of Cromwell—the men of the “Bible and the sword”—the followers of Gustavus Adolphus, the Huguenots who trod in the wake of the “white plume of Navarre,” and the descendants of the rigid Puritans of New England; men who planted the starred and striped banner on the topmost heights of glory. Nor are there wanting examples of these praying and fighting warriors in our time. At a meeting of the Hibernian Bible Society, held in Belfast a few weeks since, the Rev. Mr. Graham, of Bonn, one of the missionaries of the Irish Presbyterian Church to the Jews, mentioned this fact: He had to tell them that General Havelock, who is now so distinguished in India, although a Baptist, was a member of his (Mr. Graham’s) Missionary Church at Bonn, and his wife and daughter were members of it for seven years. He could also narrate an anecdote regarding the great and good man, which he had heard from the lips of Lady Havelock. When General Havelock, as colonel of his regiment, was travelling through India, he always took with him a Bethel tent, in which he preached the gospel; and when Sunday came in India he usually hoisted the Bethel flag, and invited all men to come and hear the gospel—a fact; he even baptized some. He was reported for this at head-quarters, for acting in a non-military and disorderly manner—and the commander-in-chief, General Lord Gough, entertained the charge, but, with the true spirit of a generous military man, he caused the state of Colonel Havelock’s regiment to be examined. He caused the reports of the moral state of the various regiments to be read for some time back, and he found that Colonel Havelock’s stood at the head of the list; there was less drunkenness, less flogging, less imprisonment in it than any other. When that was done, the commander-in-chief said, “Go and tell Colonel Havelock, with my compliments, to baptize the whole army.”

And what influence over his men such a character obtains, may be seen in the following letter from a sergeant in the 78th Highlanders, to a brother in Scotland: “Cawnpore, August 17—Cholera, etc., breaking out amongst us, we were obliged to put back for Cawnpore. It has been justly said, ‘The British soldier should never show his back,’ and so it seems, for no sooner had we done so than we were assailed by a legion of these black devils, accompanied by a battery of cannon, in overwhelming numbers. We immediately showed our foes a bold front, and, as our regiment was reduced to one hundred and twenty men, you may fancy what a contemptible appearance we made. But appearances are deceitful. All eyes were turned on our noble general (Havelock) to see what his orders were; and I still think I see the peculiar look he gave us, and in which the man appeared to triumph over the soldier. I felt as if he said, ‘78th, I know that these guns must be taken, yet Heaven knows how. At the same time I am exposing you to certain death; duty bids me give the order “forward,” and humanity bids me stay—what say you, Highlanders?’ But, as if an electric shock had passed through us, a simultaneous movement was felt throughout our columns as each grasped his musket and rushed on to take the guns. Onward we flew, and so decisive was our attack that the rebels appeared stupefied as we captured the guns, and returned, strange to tell, without losing a man. I think I can never forget old Havelock as he gazed upon us, his eyes filled with tears, and his voice tremulous with emotion, while, in the fulness of his heart, he exclaimed, 'Thank, you, 78th, you have saved the army!' Such words, from such a man and at such a time, will never be forgotten."

The moral of this is, that religion, instead of unfitting men for the practical duties of life, renders them in the highest degree serviceable and efficient—in fact that religion is the vital element of every true character.

TO CHOOSE A HUSBAND.

Dickens tells the following story of an American sea captain: "On his last voyage home the captain had on board a young lady of remarkable personal attractions—a phrase I use as one being entirely new, and one you never met with in the newspapers. This young lady was beloved intensely by five young gentlemen passengers, and in return she was in love with them all very ardently, but without any particular preference for either. Not knowing how to make up her determination in this dilemma, she consulted my friend the captain. The captain being a man of an original turn of mind, says to the young lady, 'Jump overboard, and marry the man that jumps after you.' The young lady, struck with the idea, and being naturally fond of bathing, especially in warm weather, as it then was, took the advice of the captain, who had a boat manned in case of accident. Accordingly, next morning, the five lovers being on deck, and looking devotedly at the young lady, she plunged into the sea, head foremost. Four of the lovers immediately jumped in after her. When the young lady and her four lovers were got out again, she says to the captain, 'What am I to do with them now, they are so wet?' Says the captain, 'Take the dry one!' And the young lady did, and she married him."

THE TEACHINGS OF SORROW.—Sorrow is God's school. Even God's own Son was not made perfect without it; though a Son, yet learned his obedience by the things that he suffered.

HOT BREAD.—Don't eat hot bread—we beg ye want. Do you wish to know the reason why? Because it never digests. Now go and cut a slice off that stale loaf.

CONVERSATION.—The business of conversation is a very serious matter. There are men that it weakens one to talk with an hour, more than a day's fasting would do.

WAR USELESS.—The race that shortens its weapons, lengthens its boundaries.

EARLY PRINTING.

In the infancy of the art its results were comparatively very rude. The type used was intended to imitate writing, and partook of the character of gothic and script. In punctuating, they employed no marks at first other than the period and colon; an oblique stroke was afterwards introduced, and fulfilled the purpose of our comma. Pages had neither running title nor number. The divisions of words and sentences were very imperfect, and the language was not divided into paragraphs. Capital letters were not used to commence a sentence, nor in proper names. No rules seem to have regulated their orthography, which was entirely without method, and their abbreviations were so numerous as to cause the necessity, in time, of publishing a book, by the directions in which they could be read. But one kind of letter was used throughout. A space was left at the beginning of chapters for the illuminator, who wrote in various colored ink the initial letter. These were often elaborately ornamental, and very costly, being embellished with flowers and figures, and sometimes variegated with gold and silver. The first presses were fashioned after the common wine press. For a short time the paper was printed on but one side, the blank leaves being pasted together. The only forms of books were the folio and quarto. Two or three hundred copies were then considered a large edition. Dates were often omitted, and the name of the printer, when given, was placed at the end of the book.

DRY GOODS.

When our friends come to Boston to purchase dry goods, let them not fail to call on S. J. WILCOX & Co., our next door neighbor, at No. 24 Winter Street. The great advantage possessed by this extensive establishment is, that they purchase their goods for cash, and can sell their goods so much cheaper in proportion to their customers. We venture to say that a greater variety of ladies' wearing material, or a more excellent stock as to quality, cannot be found in Boston or New York, while the prices defy competition! Messrs. Wilcox & Co. have a splendid new store, and an entire new stock of goods.

THEN AND NOW.—The Territory of the United States in the year 1785 was about 800,000 square miles, and now it covers an area of little less than 3,000,000.

A BAD BILL.—A bill (Wm.) that promises to pay and does not, is a liar-Bill-ity.

THE TOIL FOR GOLD.

Until long after the great gold discovery in California, when all the world flocked to the shores of the Pacific, and the thirst for mining seemed to seize on every one, high and low, cultivated and uncultivated, and those who were prevented from following the tide were regarded with the deepest commiseration, very erroneous ideas with regard to the nature of the labor were universally prevalent. We saw the glittering dust, or the flakes of virgin gold sent home as specimens by our friends, and we fancied they were obtained as easily as one might scoop up the sand from Nahant beach, or gather the pebbles at high-water mark. Alas! with few exceptions, the gold is obtained only by the severest labor. Thousands of broken hearts and ruined constitutions have swelled up the cost of the gold poured in from California. Here, on the Atlantic seaboard, we see the effect, but not the cause. We rejoice at the timely arrival of a million and a half of specie from the golden gate, but fancy does not picture the racking toil by which it has been wrenched from the bowels of the earth. Much of it has been attained by hard manual labor, compared to which ditching and building railroad embankments is pastime; much by aid of ponderous machinery that crushes up rocks in its jaws as a Dutch nutcracker crunches almond shells. Let us take an example of a costly and laborious process, river-mining, premising that the facts are furnished by Hutchings's California Magazine, and those of our readers who have "truant dispositions," will no longer envy the miner in his distant home.

When it becomes desirable to chain the mountain torrent which is heedlessly rushing past, and turn it out of its natural channel to obtain the gold lying in its bed, the miner talks the matter over with a few trusty and hard-working camp-miners, and they mutually agree to make an effort to obtain the glittering Oro. The ways and means are accordingly devised; sometimes by making up a company of eight, or ten, or twenty, or any other desirable number; and as the cost will be about so much, each member of the company has to contribute his share of the amount agreed upon, as the work progresses. Should it cost less or more—generally it is the latter—the proportion is diminished, or increased by assessments according to the number of shares. At other times a number of men who live together on the same bar, and who, being well acquainted with each other, and tolerably well informed of what the other possesses, will raise whatever timber or tools may be required, from among themselves, and "get along as well as they can for the balance"—which often is but very indifferently—and go to work with a will to accomplish their object. To do this, sometimes a race has to be dug; at others, a flume has to be built, requiring to be of sufficient capacity to take in the whole amount of water running in the river. This being done, a dam has to be constructed across the river, that shall be water-tight, or nearly so. To build this dam, very often requires that men work in the water, which is generally very cold, for, as it comes from the melting snows, it cannot be expected to be very warm; at least, before the river is very low, and men seldom wait for that—they therefore enter the river; and by rolling up large boulders into a line for building a wall, they turn the water from the one side towards the flume on the other, and when one wall is thus rudely but substantially constructed, another is built behind it; when all the light and floating sand is cleaned out, that it may not be in the way of making the space water-tight between the walls; a clayey soil is then filled in and well tramped, until the dam is tight; and the water is running through the race or flume. Sometimes a tree or log is felled across the stream (if one can be found long enough to reach, and in the right place), when slabs or split timbers are put in, in an inclined position, and either nailed or pinned to the log, when the whole space in front is filled up with clayey soil and fine boughs of trees, until it is made water-tight. The river now being turned into the race, wheels are erected across it; and pumps are attached by which the water still remaining in the river's bed is pumped out. Now river mining is commenced in real earnest; men begin to remove boulders, wheel out rocks, fix toms, or sluices, and take out the precious metal—if there is any. Five thousand two hundred and twenty-seven dollars have been taken out from behind a boulder, in a single pan of dirt. Should the fall rains be late before commencing, every opportunity is given to work out the river claims to advantage—or at least to test them sufficiently either to work or abandon them. If on the contrary—as frequently occurs—the rains should come early, the whole of the summer's labor and expense are swept away before a dollar can be taken out. Many men are thus left penniless, after the toil and hope of a long and scorching summer. Taking the losses with the gains, it is very questionable if more gold has not actually been invested in river mining than has ever been taken out.

When men speak ill of you, says Burke, live so that nobody will believe them.

CHURCHYARD GLEANINGS.

Very many volumes, entertaining and instructive, have been made of curious epitaphs, faithfully transcribed from the records of the cities of the dead. A large proportion of epitaphs provoke a smile in the reader, however grave the subject. Many are designedly ludicrous, but many more unintentionally so. It would seem as if epitaph-writing were the most difficult species of composition, to judge by the numerous failures.

The following is in the churchyard of Crayford, Kent, England:

"To the memory of PETER IZOD, who was thirty-five years clerk of the parish, and always proved himself a pious and mirthful man.

"The life of this clerk was just threescore and ten,
During half of which time he had sung out Amen.
He married when young, like other young men;
His wife died one day, so he chanted Amen,
A second he took, she departed—what then?
He married, and buried a third with Amen.
Thus his joys and his sorrows were treble, but then
His voice was deep bass, as he chaunted Amen.
On the horn he could blow as well as most men,
But his horn was exalted in blowing Amen.
He lost all his wind after threescore and ten,
And here with three wives he waits till again
The trumpet shall rouse him to sing out Amen."

The following is from the churchyard of Melton Mowbray:

"This world's an Inn, and I her guest;
I've eat and drank and took my rest
With her awhile, and now I pay
Her lavish bill, and go my way."

One of the most curious epitaphs extant is on a tablet in Limerick cathedral:

"MEMENTO MORI.
—Here lieth Little Samuel Barrinton, that great Under Taker
Of Famous Citty Clock and Chime Maker;
He made his one Time goe Early and Latter,
But now He is returned to God his Creator.
The 19 of November Then He Seest,
And for His Memory this Here is Pleast
By his son Ben 1693."

ETERNITY.—A Yankee discoursing on the sublime and bewildering subject of eternity, said, by way of illustration: "My friends, after millions and trillions of years have passed away in the morning of eternity, it will be a hundred thousand years to breakfast time."

SHAVING NOTES.—Mrs. Partington inquires in the New York Picayune what kind of razors are employed in shaving notes. Mr. Pic respectfully informs her that they are generally razors of money.

RAILROAD SENTIMENT.—The following sentiment was given at a recent railroad festival in Cleveland, Ohio: "Our mothers,—The only faithful tenders who never misplaced a switch."

THE WAY HE DID IT.

A Philadelphia paper relates an amusing incident which occurred in one of the banks in that city, during a recent run. In the crowd of anxious holders of checks, notes, etc., was a plain-looking individual, with something under his arm. The people in his immediate neighborhood seemed to think that he had a large bundle of promises to pay, and of course each man was interested in keeping him out until every other one had got the shiners. At last the man with the bundle exclaimed, in a loud voice: "Look here, gentlemen, if you only knew that I had ten thousand dollars in gold under my arm for your use, instead of keeping me out, you would push me in." The way he went into the bank after that was illustrative of the truth that not only "money makes the mare go," but the man also.

A NEW PROCESS.

A patent has been taken out in England for splitting rocks by heat without explosion. The mixture used for the purpose is said to be composed of 100 parts sulphur, 100 saltpetre, 50 sawdust, 50 horse manure, and 10 common salt. The saltpetre and common salt are dissolved in hot water and mixed with molasses. The other ingredients are then added, the whole stirred until thoroughly incorporated, and the mass thus produced rendered fit for use by being dried at a gentle heat. The composition, prepared in this manner, is introduced into holes bored in the rock in the same way as blasting powder, and is ignited by means of a fuse. It does not explode like gunpowder, but generates heat of sufficient intensity to split the rock.

POVERTY.—"What is poverty," beautifully says Jean Paul, in an allusion to his own stern experience, "that a man should whine under it? It is but like the pain of piercing the ears of a maiden, and you hang precious jewels in the wound!"

JOHN BULL AT DINNER.—At a harvest-home dinner, given by the Messrs. Roper, in Kent, fifty-six persons disposed of 133 pounds of beef.

RUSSIAN INDEBTEDNESS.—The public debt of Russia is said to amount to 6,933,000,000 francs, about $1,386,600,000.

EARLY RISING.—Tom Hood said:

"He that's fond of early stirring Must be a spoon."

STATISTICAL.—We see that the aggregate wealth of Georgia is estimated at $328,927,618.

BIRMAH AND ITS INHABITANTS.

MENDOTH-MEN, EMPEROR OF BIRMAH.

Before proceeding to a description of the various spirited engravings on the first few pages of the present number, let us rapidly glance at the far-distant country we have selected for our theme, and pass in review its position, physical aspect, productions, government, etc. Our details of peculiar manners may then prove more intelligible and instructive. Birma is the most westerly of the Indo-Chinese states, and is bounded as follows:—north by Assam, east by Yun-nan, a Chinese province, and Siam, south by Pegu, and west by Bengal, Chittagong and Aracan, comprising an area of 120,000 square miles. The empire is composed of a series of longitudinal valleys sloping to the south, and traversed by the Irawaddy, and its affluent, the Kyen-dwen, by the Setang, and by the Salnen, which last stream forms the eastern boundary. These valleys are formed by spurs of the Himalaya Mountains, which decrease in elevation as they proceed south. The most important are the chain of Amoopectoomoo, forming the western frontier, and terminating in Cape Negrais, in the south, and the chain which separates the basin of the Irawaddy from that of the Salnen. The highest point of the former chain is 8202 feet, and of the latter, 12,434 feet. The southern part of the empire is a comparatively level country, interspersed with lakes, and intersected by branches of the Irawaddy and Setang. The northerly part is quite elevated and broken, but interspersed by delightful and fertile valleys; but the extreme north has all the characteristics of a wild mountain region. The largest river of the empire, the Irawaddy, rises in the Himalayas, flows south, near the western frontier, receives its affluent, the Kyen-dwen, near latitude 21° , passes through Pegu, and falls by numerous mouths into the Gulf of Martaban. The main river is navigable at all seasons for vessels of 200 tons as far up as Ava, and during the rainy season, as far as Bhamo, 800 miles from the sea. The other navigable affluents of the Irawaddy are, the Bhamo, Langt-chuen, Mukiaung and Myeen-gaga, all of which enter it above the Kyen-dwen. The Setang rises in Lake Gnaungrue (latitude 21°), is a comparatively small stream, and has a course of 300 miles to the gulf, which it reaches through a broad estuary and several small offsets.

It has no continuous channel of greater depth than four feet. The Saluen, or Thanluy, ranks next to the Irawaddy in volume, and falls into the sea between Martaban and Moulmein. It rises in Lake Bonka, in Thibet, and is a river of great length. There are numerous small lakes, but the only ones of considerable importance are Nandokando, north of Ava, more than forty miles long by twelve in breadth, and Gnaungrue, which is ten miles long and five broad.

The geology and mineralogy of Birman present many interesting features. The northern and easterly parts, as far as seventeen degrees south, are of crystalline schistose formation; a belt of tertiary stretches from the north of Ava to the southeast, and near the confluence of the Kyen-dwen is a patch of the transition series, including the carboniferous formation. All the rest of the country, south and west, seems to be composed of alluvium, apparently covering limestone in various states. The low hills in the delta of the Irawaddy are composed of blue limestone, calcareous sandstone, breccia, quartz and orange-colored iron ore. The minerals known to exist are gold, silver, tin, iron, antimony, lead, arsenic and sulphur, all except the first two said to be abundant; besides these, marble, nitre, salt and precious stones, including rubies, sapphires, amethysts, garnets, chrysolites and jasper. Coal is abundant, and also petroleum; and in the northern parts of the empire there are valuable mines of pure amber.

In the lower districts there are two seasons, a dry and a wet one, similar to those of Hindostan, the latter season being from April to October, during which from 150 to 200 inches of rain fall, and the former from November to April. North of the delta there are three seasons, viz., cold from November to February, hot from March to June, and rainy the rest of the year. All the lower parts of the valley of the Irawaddy are subject to annual inundations, which continue from May to October. In the south earthquakes are frequent. The climate, however, is healthy, where the land is cleared. The vegetation is rich and varied. In marshy places, rice, which constitutes the staple food of the people, is produced in abundance, and maize and millet are raised in the dry ground. Around Ava, and some of the larger towns, and in the more elevated spots, wheat and tobacco are grown, and also indigo, sugar and cotton. The "lapet," a Birman tea-plant, is grown on the hills in Ava, also tumeric and various dye-stuffs. Timber is abundant, including teak, soondry, oak of several kinds, fir and ebony. Elephants are numerous in the low country, but are never used as beasts of burthen, except in times of war; and the white elephant, occasionally met with, is an object of superstitious veneration. The king always possesses one, which is considered the second dignitary of the state, and has a regular cabinet of ministers, with numerous attendants and guards. Rhinoceroses, tigers, leopards, buffaloes, hogs, civets, wild cats, apes, deer, antelopes, otters, etc., are more or less numerous. The domestic animals are oxen and buffaloes, used extensively for agricultural purposes; horses, small but vigorous, and used only for the saddle; hogs, sheep, goats and common fowls.

The inhabitants of Birman belong to a common stock, the Indo-Chinese, and are divided into several tribes. The most important of these are the Birmans, occupying the middle portion of the basin of the Irawaddy; the Shans, in the east and northeastern provinces; the Kyens, spread over the centre of the country; and the Karians, between the Setang and the Sal-men. Tartar and Thibetan tribes occupy the northern parts. Siamese slaves are numerous, and the mines are wrought by the industrious Chinese. The Burmese are a short, stout, active and well-proportioned race, of dark-brown color. Station is designated by dress; that of the priests is yellow—a color held so sacred that it is sacrilege for any other class to wear it. Tattooing, chiefly in the legs and lower parts of the body, is practised by the Burmese and some of the other tribes, and the chewing of betel, and the smoking of tobacco, is almost universal. The dwellings are generally made of timber or bamboo. The total population may be stated at about four millions.

The manufactures of the empire are unimportant and inferior. The cottons manufactured by no means equal those of the Hindoos and Chinese. Durable though coarse silks are also made, and pottery-ware glazed and unglazed; sword-blades, coarse cutlery, and clumsy gold and silver jewelry. The Burmese also understand gilding and dyeing, and make paper, umbrellas, cordage, sandals and inferior gunpowder. They are famous as bell-casters. Commerce, individually, is on a small scale, but in the aggregate considerable. In the lower provinces, internal traffic is conducted chiefly by water-conveyances; in the hilly districts, by land communication, oxen being the beasts of burden. The principal articles of export are teak-wood, catechu, sticklac, beeswax, elephants' teeth, raw cotton, orpiment, gold and silver. The cotton is principally sent to Dacca, where it is manufactured into the fabrics of that place. The principal imports are European manufactures, and the cotton piece goods of India.

The government is despotic. The king is styled "Lord of Life and Property," and he rules by a council called "Lat d'han," composed of from four to six officers, which exercises legislative, executive and judicial functions, acting for the king, whose name never appears. The laws are taken from the celebrated Menu code, and are, in many respects, distinguished for the wisdom of their provisions. The only hereditary public officers are the Taubwas, the tributary princes of the conquered provinces. The revenue is derived from a tax upon cultivated lands, fisheries, mines, petroleum wells, exports, etc. There being no military class, and the standing army being small, general levies are made in time of war. The troops have no regular pay, but are maintained at the public expense.

Excepting some of the barbarous mountaineers, the inhabitants of Birma are half-civilized, and adhere to Buddhism, worshipping Guadama, one of the incarnations of Buddha. The priests are numerous, vowed to celibacy, and eat but once a day. There are monasteries for both priests and priestesses. To the priests is committed exclusively the charge of public institutions, and nearly every person receives an elementary education. The principal spoken idiom is Birman, but Pali is the language of religion and literature.

Manchobo, the capital, is built on the west branch of Lake Nandokando, 28 miles northwest of Ava. It is enclosed by a wall of brick and mud, with an external dry ditch. It was selected as the seat of government after the earthquake of March 23, 1839, which destroyed the cities of Ava, Amarapura, and others. Population, 14,000. Ava, the old capital, lies on the left bank of the Irrawady, and is divided into an inner and outer town, each surrounded by a brick wall and ditch, the circuit of the whole being five or six miles. The houses in general are mere huts, but a few are of superior construction. The inner town, about a mile in circuit, is chiefly occupied by the palace, government offices, arsenal, etc. Ava contains also some dilapidated monasteries. The bazaar, including one without the walls, are eleven in number, and were at one time richly stocked with merchandise. The population, in 1826, was 30,000, but it is now much less, as every substantial edifice in the city was destroyed by the earthquake of 1839. Sagainy is a straggling town of mean houses on the opposite side of the Irawaddy, and may be considered as a suburb of Ava. Amarapura, 10 miles northeast of Ava, lies about three quarters of a mile east of the Irawaddy, and consists of a large fortress with extensive suburbs, stretching for about four miles along the river. Throughout the city are numerous temples and pagodas, with golden roofs. Before the removal of the government to Ava, in 1819, it contained 175,000 inhabitants—the present population is about 30,000. Bhamo, a large trading town and seat of a viceroy, is situated on the upper Irawaddy, 179 miles north-northeast of Ava, and 35 from the frontier of the Chinese province Yun-nan. Bhamo is the chief entrepot between Birma and China. Population, 20,000. Magaung, in the vicinity of which are the famous amber mines, is about 70 miles north-northwest of Bhamo.

We derive many interesting particulars with regard to the Burmese from General Orgoni, a French officer in the Burmese service, who was created at Ava, a bagie, that is, cousin to the emperor, whose portrait forms the subject of our first illustration. Mendoh-men, emperor of the Birmans, ascended the throne the 20th December, 1852, at the age of thirty-three years. He succeeded the emperor Pagham, his older brother, who was forced to abdicate because of incapacity; incapacity which had favored the invasion of Pegu by the East India Company. The emperor, Mendoh-men, is descended in a direct line from the grand Alompra, or Aloung P'Honra, founder, in 1753, of the present dynasty, which, since that time, has reigned without interruption in this great Indo-Chinese empire. The characteristic traits which General Orgoni attributes to Mendoh-men are: high intelligence, a truly royal liberality, great justice, mild temper, courteousness, sincere piety, and even a tendency towards Catholicism. The prince, Ayeh-men, whose portrait we also give, is his younger brother, two years younger, and although the emperor has thirty-eight children, it is this prince who is heir-presumptive to the crown, in virtue of a nearly general custom which prevails in Asia, which wills that the succession belongs to the oldest of the family. The character of this imperial prince, writes General Orgoni, is distinguished by very great energy, a marked taste for military operations; and he promises, the opportunity offering, to show himself a great and terribly resolute and enterprising man. His enemies will find him indomitable in adversity. Everywhere is reproduced the spectacle which the war in the East gives us; everywhere Asia is forced to bow before the civilization of the West; everywhere is she calling upon the Europeans to aid her to defend herself against the Europeans. It is to this fatal law that General Orgoni, whose portrait succeeds that of the emperor, owes the brilliant fortune which he had at the court of Mendoh-men, in spite of the traditions of national pride, which until then had excluded strangers. The East is still a country of adventure, and the history of Orgoni is more romantic than many fictions. At twenty-two he had already been a captain of cavalry and knight of two military orders. He was seized one day with a curiosity to study the military and political organization of that gigantic house of commerce, which, under the name of the East India Company, governed a hundred thousand souls; and for this secret end he travelled, during many years, over Hindostan, thus preparing himself for the struggle which, at a later period, he was obliged to sustain with his counsels and his sword, against the invasion of India, under the standard of the emperor of Birma. It was to this perseverance—this fatiguing and dangerous work—that the “daring Frenchman,” as he was called by Anglo-Indian journals, owes all the honor he now enjoys. It was thus that he rose, at the age of forty-three years, from captain to general of forty thousand men and prince of the Birman empire. The “Yangoun Chronicle,” of the 28th of January, noticing the last promotion of General Orgoni, contains an account, from which we give a few extracts, which will give some idea of their court customs.

“The 4th of January, 1854, before noon, General Orgoni, or rather, as he ought to be called now, Neh-my-ti-hi-zeh-ah, went to the palace of the hereditary prince, and presented himself with all the formalities required by the etiquette of great occasions. As soon as he arrived, after having exchanged some ceremonious compliments with him, the prince gave the royal signal to set out for the golden palace, and was accompanied by a cortege which advanced in the following order: immediately after the prince marched the four secretaries of state, in the midst of whom marched General Orgoni, in full uniform; then came the president and fifteen counsellors of the lotto, or supreme judicial court; at last, behind them, pressed a great number of courtiers and imperial secretaries of all ranks. When the cortege had reached the first hall of the golden palace, the general, with only his people and interpreters, waited, according to etiquette, a quarter of an hour, until he was summoned to the emperor's presence by the grand master of ceremonies. There was stationed upon his way, in the numerous apartments which lead to the throne hall, a double line of officers, whose dress and golden swords formed a brilliant spectacle. His majesty was seated upon a kind of throne, of the most magnificent appearance; he was surrounded by the princes of blood, ministers and grandees of the kingdom. After having punctually acquitted himself of the salutes and testimonies of respect, usual on such an occasion, the general took possession of the place assigned to him, immediately behind the hereditary prince. There was a solemn silence of five minutes. Then the emperor, addressing the general in the most complimentary terms, informed him that he was to be invested with a title which had never yet been invested upon an European. Then an imperial secretary read, in a loud voice, an edict, showing in full the differat motives which determined his majesty upon this promotion, and made known in detail what were the honors and authority attached to this dignity. The reading finished, a herald advanced into the middle of the hall, pronouncing, with all the strength of his lungs, the following words: 'Orgoni, Neh-myo-ti-hi-zeh-ah!' which in pali, or classical language, signifies, 'Orgoni, cousin of the emperor, man of fine appearance, general of victory!' These words of the herald were immediately repeated in chorus by all present, and from hall to hall, by all the officers, till the echo reached the great court of the palace, where were assembled a numerous body of troops. Three cups of gold, filled with pure silver, symbolical of grandeur and richness, were presented to the general, and there the ceremonies terminated. The emperor retired, and his new cousin left, accompanied by an immense number of courtiers and officers of all ranks. There was still another formality to be attended to. In conformity with an ancient custom, the new member of the imperial family must proceed with the cortege to the palace of the White Elephant. It appears that this august personage is far from being so much venerated as those who have never had the honor of approaching him would have us believe. But probably it is a question of dates. The influence of the gods has been decreasing for a long time. Happily, if faith is lost in them, the institution will remain for a long time; there is always something. Thus, however little venerated he is in reality, the elephant had been clothed in more magnificent caparisons to receive the new prince. The intelligent animal did not play his part with less dignity; and it was with a perfect seriousness and majestic condescension that he terminated the audience by passing to the prince, with his trunk, his statuette in silver.

The next engraving represents a band of Birman dancers and musicians. The instruments are trombones, flutes, and long hautbois; the harp is in the form of the Egyptian harps. As for the dancers, they dance, as everywhere in India, with the feet and arms, and not with the body.

On another page will be found a representation of the emperor's state carriage, a curious and cumbrous affair, drawn and followed by his loyal subjects. The elephants in the last design are those equipped for the transport of armed men and artillery, according to the plan and under the direction of General Orgoni. The tower and defensive armor of the elephant in the foreground of the picture are mounted with iron, covered with double pieces of buffalo hide, and ball-proof at a very short distance. The four musketeers who are in the tower reach it by means of a rope ladder which is seen hanging at the flank of the animal. The men at their post, the ladder is drawn up to the highest hook. The lances fixed horizontally at each side of the tower are used only in a melee, and take the place of a carbine when a line has been broken through by the elephants. The other part of our plan shows how artillery of great calibre is put on the back and transported. This artillery can reach any ground and be placed in battery in a few moments. One elephant carries the necessary implements for limbering and unlimbering a battery of eight pieces.

The government of Birman is, as we have remarked, an hereditary and absolute despotism, the sovereign being "lord of life and limb" over his subjects, who style him "golden," speak of informing "the golden ear," throwing themselves at the "golden feet," etc. They approach him with their hands joined above their heads, and even make obeisance to the palace walls, before which all must dismount and take off their shoes. The sovereign is assisted by four woongees, or chief public ministers; four atweenwoons, or private counsellors; four woon-docks, ministers of the interior; four state secretaries; four reporters; four officers to regulate ceremonies; nine to read petitions, etc. Their several ranks are determined by their dresses, coronets, and number of gold chains; the monarch himself only being privileged to wear twenty-four. The whole nation is divided into the royal family, nobles and commonalty, and none dare assume the dress of a superior grade. The Birmanese have no farther distinction of caste, as in India, nor any hereditary distinctions; although in other respects a kind of feudal system prevails; and the king can command the appearance of his nobles in the field, with their quota of vassals. The religion is Boodhism, believed to have been introduced by Guadama, the chief deity himself, in the sixth century B. C. This faith is universal here, except among foreigners, individuals who have been converted to Christianity, a few Zodi, believed by Sangermano to be Jews, some hill tribes, as Khyens, Karyens, and Cassays, in the lowest stage of idolatry. Those who are curious in religious creeds may find that of Boodh at full length in the translation of Sangermano. The priests, called rha-haans, are much respected; they are bred up, like monks, to their calling from an early age, and observe celibacy; but may at any time renounce their vows and marry. They are voluntarily maintained by the population, and not suffered to engage in manual labor; their chief occupation being the instruction of youth. All foreigners are allowed the fullest exercise of their religion, and may build places of worship anywhere, and have their public festivals and processions without molestation. But, though thus tolerant to strangers, they are most intolerant to their own people. No Birmanese dare join any of these religions, under the severest penalties; and the most rigorous measures are adopted for suppressing all religious innovations.

The habits and customs of the Birmanese are somewhat peculiar. Chewing betel is common, and smoking universal, even with children. The Birmanese eat twice a day, viz., early in the morning, and in the evening: their food is served up on trays, in red lacquered plates, and small cups; spoons are used, but not so much as fingers; knives and forks are unknown. The people are very superstitious, consult the stars, believe in fortunate or evil times, wear talismans, practise alchemy, etc. If any member of their small communities of four or five houses chance to die, the Khyens believe the evil spirit has taken possession of the place, break up their settlement, and move away; when an earthquake occurs they shout and beat their houses to expel the fiend.

In many respects, the government of Birman is liberal. It encourages the increase of population by favoring the settlement of foreigners, tolerates the religion of every nation in its principal cities, and encourages the intermarriages of foreigners with Birman females. Instead of coin, silver and lead in bars are used, and their purity is strictly tested in trade. The forging and stamping of these bars forms a particular branch of business. The buildings among the Birmanese are very slight, as the government requires them to be chiefly of wood or bamboo. They slaughter no tame animals, and live simply, their food being chiefly vegetables. No Birman can have more than one wife, though he may maintain several women, who are subjected to the wife as her servants. A foreigner and an adult male Birman are free to leave the empire, but females and children are not allowed this privilege. Females cannot appear before a court of justice. The chief amusement of the Birman is their theatre, where declamation, dancing and music alternate; the higher classes are fond of dramatic spectacles and like entertainments. The literary Birmans translate from the English all important scientific works, particularly astronomy and law. Their religion enjoins no bloody sacrifices, and is extremely tolerant. The clergy are literary men, and highly esteemed for the purity of their lives, their piety and knowledge.

STATE CARRIAGE OF THE EMPEROR.

WAR ELEPHANTS PREPARED FOR BATTLE.

The Birmans are ingenious artificers, and a trophy of the war of 1825, exhibited in London, excited admiration at their skill. It was a great state carriage devoted to the service of the gods, 19 feet high, 14 feet long, and seven feet wide, probably similar to the imperial carriage of which we have furnished an illustration. The civil and criminal code of Birma is very judicious; general principles are first laid down, and then applied to particular cases. Robbery is punished by death only when the property stolen is very great, or the offence is aggravated by particular circumstances. Capital punishment is commonly inflicted by decapitation, and extends to those who eat opium freely and to drunkards in general. The magistrates have a great discretionary power to mitigate the punishments of the law, and few penal laws are executed in all their severity. It is only by a great struggle that the Birma empire, once so great and extensive, but now shorn of its fine proportions, still maintains its political independence.

A GLANCE AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

Leaving the cities of Farther India, of which we have had a glimpse in the preceding article, let us transport ourselves in fancy, and for a brief space, to Constantinople, the famous City of the Sultan, or rather to Stamboul, for the Commander of the Faithful does not recognize a title bestowed by a Christian emperor. And yet, but for Christian aid, perhaps, the rapacious two-headed eagle of Russia might now be floating over the mosque of St. Sophia, and casting its black shadow on the waters of the Golden Horn. If it were possible for the traveller who visits Constantinople for the first and only time, to arrange the period and hour of his arrival, he ought to double the point of Serai, at the moment of sunrise, on a fine May day; or better still, to arrive by moonlight during the rejoicings of the Ramadan. Indeed, the view is so beautiful that it should be seen at every hour and epoch of the year, to enjoy it fully, and this is a pleasure that only a long sojourn in these enchanted regions can command. It is our present purpose, however, only to indicate the impression made by the first aspect of the city, which a poet has well characterized by saying that it is here Europe finishes and Asia begins. At the issue of the Propontis, or Sea of Marmora, appears the triple city of Constantinople—Stamboul, Scutari and Galata. Your craft advances, painfully ploughing the rapids of the European coast. On the left you begin to see through a violet mist the Castle of the Seven Towers, that Bastile of the Sultans; then the picturesque suburbs and walls dipping into the sea, and over the battlements, houses, trees, domes and minarets. We soon follow the foot of the wall of the Seraglio, that mysterious palace celebrated in the dramatic history of the Turkish emperors; the scene of pleasure, voluptuousness and sanguinary intrigues. From the summit of their terraces which seem to sink under the thick crown of verdure that overflows them everywhere, how many victims of Ottoman policy have been precipitated into the waves! To the right, on the Asiatic shore, you perceive Scutari, the ancient Chrysopolis, the city of gold, a vast depot of the merchandize which the principal cities of Asia Minor send to the capital. A light-house, placed on an isolated rock, which the Turks call Kiz-Kouleci, the Maiden Tower, rises above the waves. In front, the Bosphorus, with the graceful villages and kiosks which line the banks, glides away in a serpentine course; but a few ship's length ahead we shall enter into that marvellous port, encumbered with the barks and vessels of all countries; a true forest of masts, above which in admirable perspective are prolonged the undulating lines of Stamboul, with their profusion of elegant mosques and minarets, gardens and palaces. Hardly have the wheels of the steamer stopped, when a cloud of boats seek to carry her by storm; there are officious porters, who offer their address, and without waiting for a reply, dispute for your baggage and your person; a torment which the traveller begins to experience as soon as he enters the countries of the south of Europe. To land, to scale the mountain of Pera, and to install yourself in a hotel, occupies about an hour.

The first thing one does in Constantinople is to go to the bazaar, for, if you make but a short stay, you must bring away those dressing-gowns, slippers, soraglio pastilles and essences of rose and jessamine, far more interesting, as everybody knows, than the lumbering architectural monuments of the city. One of our engravings presents a very accurate and spirited representation of the Grand Bazaar. A perfume of rose, musk and sandal-wood announces the neighborhood of the bazaar, and you soon penetrate beneath its sombre and cool arches. Coming from the outer light and heat, the transition is very startling and must be guarded against. The most interesting part of this labyrinth, where alleys cross each other in every direction, is unquestionably the Bezestein; old arms, furniture and antiquities of all kinds are here sold at auction; and if the stranger who sojourns but a little while wishes to obtain an idea of picturesque and Oriental life, he should pause and take a seat in the booth of one of these merchants, who in the first place hastens to offer him a pipe and coffee. One or two hours passed there in observation by the painter or writer will be usefully employed. All the riches of Asia, Africa and Europe, all the luxury and pure taste of the Orient, are displayed in these bazaars so as to tempt the most indifferent. At sunset all the doors of the bazaars are closed, fire and lights being interdicted for fear of conflagrations.

Among the features of the city, the magnificent mosques cannot fail to awaken the traveller's admiration. All the mosques of Constantinople, and the turbe or tombs by which they are surrounded, are deeply interesting, both in the details of art and their picturesque character. On crossing the Hippodrome, where lies the obelisk of Constantine, and where the Janizaries were annihilated, we turn round the beautiful mosque of Ahmed, with its six minarets. The sight of its four façades conveys to the traveller an idea of the elegant style of these immense edifices, which a vast courtyard, enclosed by walls and adorned with ancient fountains and plane trees, still surrounds. The street of Mohammed, of which we give an engraved illustration, is a type of the Turkish streets, narrow but picturesque, with projecting stories, quaint lattice windows, and here and there a tree or clump of flowers. The itinerant confectioners, the indolent Turk with his pipe, and the veiled female, are figures appropriate to the scene.

Our last engraving presents a view of a Turkish cemetery at Eyoub, which is a suburb of Constantinople, an enchanting place, full of mystery, shade, freshness, sadness and poetry. In its mosque, which is holiest among the holy, repose the ashes of Saint-Eyoub, the companion in arms of Osman. Another of our pictures represents a bath scene, an elegant and cool interior, where the graceful architecture of the East is effectively displayed. A Turkish bath has been often enough described. The sufferer passes through many degrees of temperature, and undergoes severe tortures, but when he is finally finished, he comes out completely regenerated and rejuvenated, as if, like Ariel, he could run on the sharp wings of the north wind.

No traveller should leave Constantinople without visiting the tomb of the Sultana Valide, a representation of which forms the initial picture of the present article. It is in the purest Oriental taste, as our engraving finely shows. Light, elegant and graceful, it lifts its arched roof and arabesque tracery on high, and challenges the admiration of the most fastidious. Tourists agree admirably in asserting that Constantinople has nothing picturesque but its situation, and that one must not think of entering the city unless he wishes to dispel his illusions; for they say that the streets are shocking; there are no individual objects of attraction, and it is only the general whole which is remarkable. These gentlemen, whose feeling of art is reduced to certain preconceived notions, admitting admiration only for what has been officially and beforehand agreed upon to admire, take no account of the picturesque; they look not at the fountains, baths, bazaars, mosques or cemeteries; nor at the details of gateways, coffee-houses, shops, chariots, barges and costumes, which, at every step, make up delicious pictures, and would occupy the most laborious existence of a society of artists. The generality of tourists would undoubtedly think the city improved if it were built on a flat plane, like New York or Philadelphia, with streets crossing at right angles, and houses made as much alike as possible. Such people would exclude even trees, if they were not planted in straight lines parallel exactly to the curbstone. Certainly at Galata and Pera, a Frank quarter, peopled with merchants, there are few objects of art, but as for Scutari, Tophana and Stamboul, we hesitate not to assert that few cities offer so much that is interesting in every point of view. You find, it is true, many dirty places and wretched hovels; the streets are in general badly paved, we are free to confess, but such things are seen in all great cities, and only serve to increase the effect of the splendid edifices at every turn. Constantine surrounded the city with walls, chiefly of freestone, flanked at variable distances by towers. These have been in many parts demolished at different periods by the violence of the sea, and by frequent earthquakes, and on the side facing the port are especially in a very ruinous condition. The city was increased towards the west by Theodosius II., who built the walls on the land side, which still bear his name. These consist of a triple range, rising one above another, about eighteen feet apart, and defended on the outside by a ditch twenty-five or thirty feet broad, and twelve to sixteen feet deep. The outer wall is now much dilapidated, and in many places it is only a little above the level of the edge of the ditch; it seems never to have had any towers. The second wall is about twelve feet in height, and furnished with towers, of various shapes, from fifty to a hundred yards apart. The third wall is above twenty-feet high, and its towers, which answer to those of the second, are well proportioned. These walls are constructed of alternate courses of brick and stone; and notwithstanding the ravages of time, earthquakes and numerous sieges, are still tolerably perfect. On both the other sides of the city the walls are only double, and generally speaking, not so lofty. They are frequently adorned with crosses and other ornaments, which have not been removed by the Turks; and in many parts there are bas reliefs, and inscriptions by the Greek emperors who have built or repaired the several portions. When Dr. Clarke visited the place, he says there were in all four hundred and seventy-eight mural towers, and probably about the same number still exist.

The season of the Ramazan at Constantinople gives rise to many singular scenes in this celebrated city. Beauchamp, a vivid French writer, thus describes some of the features which passed under his own observation :

"Belated people scarcely lingered before the stalls of the dealers in chickens, quarters of lamb and roast mutton, the bakers and pastry-cooks, they made their purchases and hurried away. When the cannon fired over the Bosphorus and the Golden Horn, and the voice of the muezzins echoing from minaret to minaret, announced to the believers the setting of the sun, and the close of the fast for this day, you might have seen the poorer people, who, for lack of more seductive lodgings, take their meals in the open air, swallow a few mouthfuls hastily, apply to their lips the tube of a chibouque or a narghileh, and direct their steps to Tophana. At two o'clock—nine o'clock of our time—the approaches to Tophana were encumbered with people; a row of halikas filled with Turkish women, had found means to pierce the crowd and reach the square; the cafes, the terraced courtyard of the mosque, and the neighboring streets, swarmed with people of all religions, countries and costumes, equally curious and impatient to see, some for the first time, some for the twentieth, the son of the Khadir Ghezzesti. It is a popular festival, but it is truly a brilliant one with its illuminations and fireworks. I know persons at Paris who, during fete-days, shut themselves up or leave the city from hatred of the noise, the tumult, the rude gayety, the dust and the smoke of the lamps. I cannot blame them, but at Constantinople I would advise them to be lookers-on, for, with the exception of the Europeans, nobody gets drunk here or makes any disturbance. The illuminations, for the most part, are hung very high. There is infinitely less dust on the square or the terrace of Tophana than on the Champs Elysees or the Place de la Concorde, and none at all on the Sea.

"The surroundings of the mosque of Noustria, the centre of the festival, would have been insufficient to contain the population gathered from all parts of Constantinople; but at Constantinople there is as much water as land, and the harbor, covered with boats of all sorts and forms, contained a population much more numerous, and better situated to enjoy the anticipated spectacle than that which crowded about the mosque.

"In the same enclosure, which forms a long square on the borders of the sea, are comprised the palace of the grand master of artillery, the sultan's kiosque, the mosque, and its fine terraced courtyard, separated from the sea by a vast space in which are ranged piles of cannon-balls. Tophana (the square of cannon) occupies a similar position on the left bank of the Golden Horn as that of Serai-Bournou on the right bank; the roadstead which spreads before it is the mouth of the Golden Horn and the commencement of the Bosphorus. Thence you see a portion of Stamboul, the gardens and buildings of the Serai, Scutari, the islands of the princes and the green shore of Asia. This immense and beautiful harbor which washes Tophana was covered with boats. With great difficulty a free space had been kept before the mosque, but twenty vessels were in full sight of the Noustria; they were there, like huge opera-boxes, filled with people; every captain and ship owner had issued invitations.

"At nightfall, while the galleries of the minarets of Stamboul, Scutari, Fondukli and Galata were illuminated by a triple circle of fire, and groups of colored flames blazed up on the square, a crowd of boats carried the happy guests to the vessels moored in sight of Tophana. They spread in groups before the quay. When the clock of Tophana struck two (about nine at night), everything was ready and everybody expectant. From the harbor even, at a great distance, could be seen distinctly the cipher of Abdul-Medjid, surrounded by standards, over the workshops, cannons, piles of balls, guns on their carriages all flaming, the two minarets illuminated from the gallery of the muezzin to the extremity of the spire, linked by a gigantic sheet, which bore, in glittering characters, the inscription, 'Abdul-Medjid Khan the Victorious.' The cannon thundered. Immediately there appeared in the water, along the Bosphorus, a double row of lights from Tophana to Bolma-Batche, and, in the middle of this hedge, floating flames seeming to glide and course after the others. At the moment these lights moving on the water passed near Melanpur, the English guardship had just been covered with lights running up all her masts. The fireworks were let off from the lower part of the mosque, throwing their gushes of flame into the air during the passage of the sultan. You soon distinguished, among the crowd of boats, the beautiful caïque with thirteen pair of oars, surmounted by a scarlet canopy, landing in the midst of Bengal lights.

"Everybody in the smallest capital of Europe may have seen more brilliant illuminations and fireworks, and a manager of spectacles, or even a Parisian street loafer, might have the right to sneer at the splendors of the Byzantine show, but in no country of the world, perhaps, could the most splendid illuminations or the most superb fireworks produce such an effect. What gave this festival a special and inimitable character, rendering it incomparable, was the place where it occurred,—the immense and beautiful harbor by turns bathed in shadow and light. When a bomb, projected from one of the corners of the Tophana square, burst over the sea, you saw, more clearly than by broad daylight, the sudden apparition of a forest of masts decked with flags, and, floating before the quay, the innumerable caïques of Constantinople, the most elegant and swift barques that ever glided over the surface of the water; and behind the Nostratia, you saw the hill clearly defined with its wooden houses surrounded by emerald gardens; then suddenly everything was plunged into obscurity again, and you only saw about you lights close to the water, lights in the midst of invisible masts, and in the distance the illuminated minarets of Scutari and Constantinople. Every time a bomb, bursting in the air, scattered its blue, white and green stars into the Bosphorus, the darkness disappeared for a few seconds, and a light like that which would be cast by a moon of ten times greater splendor than our terrestrial moon, exhibited this magic spectacle which we could not help pronouncing fine.

"When the padishah had landed and entered the mosque, amidst the acclamations of his people, everything ceased, and for two hours you only saw on shore the Noustratia with its minarets sparkling above it, and the piles of balls glittering at its base, which shone white on a black ground, and afloat only the motionless lights, too feeble to define the form of the boats, canoes or caiques which bore them, or the vague profile of a little steamer lit up by a row of lamps moving with it. From time to time, notes of music were heard coming from the ships of war at anchor in the port.

BATH OF SOLIMAN.

"At four o'clock (about eleven at night, our time), a long murmur arose from the crowd collected about the mosque; the cannon thundered at Tophana, Serai-Bournou and Scutari; rockets soared up into the air, and firework shells bursting afresh over the bay, changed darkness into light. Roman candles and Bengal lights were kindled on the quay of Tophana; the luminous lines were formed anew from Tophana to Bolma Bathe, and the handsomest caiques darted off at top speed. A few minutes afterwards, cannon and fireworks in the distance announced the return of the padishah to his palace. The caique and crafts of all kinds dispersed, and regained the steps of the Bosphorus and the Golden Horn; the crowd tranquilly subsided, and half an hour after the last rocket, Constantinople had resumed its wonted aspect during a night of the Ramazan. The festival of Khadir-Ghezzesti, which takes place the 27th day of the month Ramazan, precedes by six days the feast of Bairam, of which it is the herald, and announces the approaching end of a month of fast and abstinence."

The writer from whom we have translated the above description gives us also a sketch of the three days' rejoicings which follow the conclusion of the fast. The commencement of this joyous season is announced by salutes of cannon, while the sultan gives a public reception to the great dignitaries of the empire.

"Behind St. Sophia extends a vast and almost naked courtyard, on which open the ancient Greek Church of St. Irene and the mint. It communicates by a broad and beautiful gate with a smaller, but still very spacious courtyard, planted with cypresses, plane-trees, and sycamores; on one side of this courtyard, you see fifty little domes terminating in thick chimneys; these odd structures are the kitchens; in the lower part, the commentement of the buildings of the Serai, a gate which communicates with a third courtyard, and it is under this gate Top-Kapou, or rather the species of covered gallery which projects into the courtyard, that the throne will soon be placed as under a great immovable dais. From the ceiling hangs a golden globe, to which is suspended an enormous gold tassell. At the precise moment when the sun rises, the sultan appears on horseback, traverses Top-Kapou, and, followed by his guard, rides to Mehemet Djami. Commonly he goes to pray at Sultan-Achmet-Djamissi. This year, Mehemet-Djami, at about half an hour's ride, had been selected, that the Tunisian troops, the Egyptians of the armies of Roumelia and Mingrelia, and of the old Anglo-Turkish contingent gathered at Constantinople, might parade in the squares and broad streets the sultan and his escort were to ride through.

"In the second court of the Serai, the soldiers of the guard, quietly busied in smoking and talking, rose hastily and fell into line as they heard the Turkish hurrah. Some led horses, superbly caparisoned, their heads decked with plumes; then the body guard or icoglans, and a few pashas, formed the entire escort preceding or following the sultan. Almost all the suite stops at Top-Kapou; Abd-ul-Medjid passed on horseback, and enters the Serai. Immediately they bring a black carpet, which is spread under the tent and the gold tassels, and in this carpet is placed the throne, a long and broad divan covered with gilding. The icoglans keep a space of a few square yards clear before the throne. The people, that is to say, everybody, strangers and natives, Mussulmen or Christians, great or small, in uniform, frock or caftan, crowd behind the hedge of soldiers, or hunt for some elevated point from which they can see the ceremony, and this is not easy. There are no stagings, no privileged tickets, nor reserved places, except for the Turks who are to take part in the ceremony. Here are ladies who in despair have addressed themselves to the minister of foreign affairs, who has some chairs brought for them, and here is an English lady who puts herself under the protection of a black eunuch.

There is nothing official except what is strictly necessary; there is no need of a great display of force to repress a crowd which is naturally decent, calm and respectful. Certainly this courtyard of the old Serai forms a much more picturesque and curious scene than if everything had been arranged, ordered and prepared beforehand. I amused myself a long time in looking at a group of Arabs with green, orange and sky-blue caftans, their tanned faces full of life and expression, who had fixed themselves a few paces from the throne, at the foot of an old sycamore. They were too numerous for the narrow space; a part of the wooden rail which separated them from the crowd was detached and fell. Ashamed at the accident, they left their post, and a soldier came up, at support arms, to forbid approach to the sycamore. But a Turkish prohibition is rarely inviolable. This man, moreover, accustomed to Mahomedan ways, was puzzled what to do, when a woman, as bold as she was inquisitive, with no yakmak to conceal her features, came up and stood beside him; after her came her friends, then some French, English and Sardinian generals and officers, and I was able to glide opportunely into their midst. Presently the band played a Turkish air well adapted to the solemnity; the cannon thundered, and one shout rose from the crowd—'Long live the Sultan!' It was the grand seignior, who, issuing from his palace of Top-Kapou, advanced slowly and alone and stopped before his throne. After some preliminary formalities, the sultan was seated. The four greatest dignitaries of the church after the Sheik ul-Islam, the mollahs of Eyoub, Stamboul, Pera, and Scutari, were admitted to kiss his foot. The imams, in violet, blue and maroon caftans, afterwards passed by, not admitted to this honor, but almost all obtaining a look. Hurrah! all the pashas, all the dignitaries, all the soldiers, bow their heads in the dust and rise, laying their hands on their hearts and heads. The padishah rises and retires tranquilly and slowly as he came. The 'alai' is over. Some minutes afterwards, the crowd had silently rolled away; the pashas had remounted their horses, which had been held by grooms in the first courtyard, and were pacing into Stamboul or directing their way to the steps of the Golden Horn, where their carriages were awaiting them. The cannon soon announced that the grand seignior himself had left the old Serai.

"In this prince, with his pale, worn and motionless countenance, we recognize the absolute master of one of the vastest empires in the world. He is the absolute spiritual and temporal master of a numerous people; having nothing to fear from his subjects, born to the throne, blindly obeyed as an infallible being, having no need of external pomp; solitary at the height at which he is placed, having no equal, and feeling no one above him but the Supreme Master. Seated on his superb throne of gold, in the midst of the glittering uniforms of his officers Abd-ul-Medjid alone was dressed in black in the European style; a white glove in his left hand, his right hand bare; only on his fez a clasp of diamonds secured an aigrette of heron plumes, the sign of sovereign power." Such are some of the scenes which regale the eyes of the traveller in the famous city of the sultan.

STREET IN THE ORNEMERY AT EYOD.

THOUGHT AND ENERGY.

BY CHARLES STEWART.

Like two vast rivers of unfeeling flow,
 Are Thought and Energy. Solemn, and clear, and deep,
 Taking its mighty way with silent sweep,
 To Time's all-whelming ocean, Truth doth throw
 Each mirrored object back with perfect youth,
 And with unfretted waters moveth by,
 Bearing each burden with a quiet ruth,
 Flows fair along: its face reflects the sky.
 But hark! the loud thunder shakes the rocks around,
 And rushing waters rend the rumbling ground,
 While awe-struck nations laud the turbid sound,
 Confessing wisdom with its minstrelsy;
 Thus noise and silence—Thought and Energy!

IOWA, THE SNOW-FEATHER:

—OR,—

THE INDIAN HEART.

BY MARTHA W. BENTON.

FAR to the Northwest, among the shades of that long, deep stream that stretches from northern boundary to southern bay, and whose waters flow through the most varied and delightful scenes, our little adventure is laid. It was, two hundred years ago, a region remote from noise and broil; the woods were unscathed and the soil unbroken, where no daring prow had yet disturbed the waters that laved the territory of the Chippeways. And here the wigwams clustered, the council fires were lit, the calumet broken, and the war-path chosen. None had taught to the "children of the forest" the dangerous flame of pride, and no hand had then fanned the wishes of ambition.

The days rolled on, and every life was spent as those in centuries gone; the mountain's top, and the river's changeful flood, supplied the wants of the red man; and hardy and brave to every woe and want, the marks of age impressed them with slight hand, and they yielded up their breath, as their sires had done, with sternness, and gaided their canoes through the silver rivers in that celestial hunting-ground beyond the vale of death. And now as "we lift the twilight curtains of the past," and retrace, in imagination, the haunts here described, though we pity, we cannot but admire the characters and the figures of these groups that so beautify and hallow the memories of Columbia.

Hawk-Eye, the chief of chiefs, and the most fearless and vindictive of his nation, the sachem of the Chippeways, sat in council and decreed his stern will in those shady and well-watered solitudes that we have described as arching the birthplace of the Queen of Waters. His wigwam rose in its picturesque beauty deep among the forest solitudes, with its walls of pine and roof of bark, down through which the sunlight gleamed on the bear's-hide and the red deer-skin that formed the royal couch of his daughter, the Indian princess Iowa, or the Snow-Feather.

No deer that bounded amid the moonlight shades of the Missouri, was fleet of foot or more delicate in form—no wild bird that warbled its morning song amid the forest-leaves, had a sweeter voice than Iowa; and no gentle maiden, with all the soft love that genial clime and fond encouragement can actuate, had a greater power to soothe the wretched and sympathize with sorrow.

It was ten weary summers since the forest-leaves had been heaped to form the mound where she who gave the maiden birth was laid with funeral pomp. And this only child beguiled the warrior's heart, and cheered with woman's gentlest power, when sorrow, that makes the boldest hearts yield, laid its burden on him. So with a laugh that rang like the gladdest echo of April's sky, and eyes that flashed in their dark pride when the slight form bounded to greet the warrior returned, or, shrouded in their dark lashes, watched the tiny fingers that were stringing beads and shells, or weaving bright-hued mats beside the lodge fire, this child of the forest strengthened and roved free.

Slightly robed, with dark hair flowing over her graceful shoulders, Iowa swam the lake, climbed the tree, and with her minute arrow struck the bird upon the wing, tracked the hunter's path through the winter's wood on her snow-shoes, and glided in her frail canoe down the Mississippi's tide. Such was Iowa, the princess of the Chippeways. Stern, rigid and unflinching, Hawk-Eye regarded each wayward freak of his lovely daughter with a jealous eye. Each warrior bowed before her hut; none, as yet, had been allowed to touch the slender hand, or glance into the depths of the dark eye and seek to read its lore.

One morning Iowa, the Indian maid, actuated by that fondness for dances through the green-wood and in the forest shades, amid dark flowing foliage, sprang away from her couch while the morning mists yet hung upon the lake and mountain-top, and with traditions filling her mind, allowed the sun to reach its high noon, and even the shades of evening to draw their curtains over day, ere she retraced the path which, with a mind full of memories and legends, she had traced through the forest.

Wakba-nunge, the Big Elk, a young son of of the Winnebagoes, had long watched the glowing beauty of the princess of the Chippeways. Old feud and wrong had broken the calumet between the tribes, and the haughty demeanor of Hawk-Eye, of the Chippeways, had only served to widen the breach, and they had now come to open war. Notwithstanding the hatred of the dark sachem, it seems not to have been transferred to the daughter; and at wayside meetings on the deer trail, Iowa and Big Elk had allowed to the heart of each other that electric influence that to them had grown at first sight.

The warrior's mien, as he bounded this morning to the side of Iowa, was gentle, and his tones, for one so used to the war-cry and the yell of victory, was soft and melodious. The haughty bird, whose plumes mingled with his coal-black hair, could scarcely, when in the pride of life he darted from his cliff, have shown a loftier spirit than the sachem of the Winnebagoes, when he took the slender hand of Iowa in his, and bowed his head to whisper in her ear his tale of constancy.

"Snow-Feather! when I came to the wigwam of the Hawk-Eye to bring the tomahawk of war, my eye noted thy beauty, and my heart owned thy gentleness and grace. The Son of the Winnebago points not his arrows of flint at the dark-haired Iowa, whose eye is like the star, and her foot fleet as the woodland deer! The Son of the Winnebago would bring thee to his own wigwam, would wear thy wampum, and bring to thy home the trophies of the chase."

The Snow-Feather held down her head for a moment; then erecting it again, like the antelope that pauses ere it flies from danger, she turned, and bending her deep gaze upon him, she whispered:

"The Hawk-Eye has broken the calumet with the Son of the Winnebago. My father's quarrels are mine; but Snow-Feather would save the Big Elk from her father's ire. When the sachem brings his warriors into the field, let the Son of the Winnebago take no scalps from the Chippeway warriors, but let the white deer-skin bring the war-paths together, and the hatchet be buried where they meet. Then Snow-Feather may sit at the feet of the Big Elk, and weave his wampum and braid his mat."

Ending her speech in this abrupt manner, she darted from the sight of the Winnebago chief, and like an arrow fled through the forest to her father's wigwam, where Hawk-Eye sat among his braves, and meditating on the scalps of their enemies.

He was a noble specimen of the Indian king, tall, sinewy and lofty in mien, with the most intelligent eyes and boldest voice—a true type of the stoic of the woods, and the fear of all who were not his allies. His scalp-lock was adorned with a tuft of gray eagle's plumes, and his mocassins were ornamented with the most elaborate skill. At his belt hung the scalp-knife and the glaring tomahawk, and a necklace of shark's teeth and the finger-nails of the wild cat and the bear, and ear-hoops of monstrous dimensions, completed his dress. New wrongs had been heaped upon them by their enemies, and the council had been convened in the wigwam of the sagamore. Nervous with the swelling rage of one who broods on hoarded wrongs, Hawk-Eye rose and thus began his harangue:

"Children, I call to arms; the Chippeway warrior would not yield his claims to the hunting-grounds of his father, I know! and the Winnebago chief has sent the hatchet to the Hawk-Eye, who has already cowered for the sake of the peace once formed between our fathers. Should the mountain bird yield its nest to the vulture? Warriors, I have broken the calumet with these foes of our tribe, and ere the next moon wanes, where the wigwam of the Big-Elk stood, shall be his tomb."

Snow-Feather, the princess of the Chippeways, had entered and seated herself beside the haughty sachem. The words of his rallying speech entered deep into her heart, and they paled the cheek of her who had dared to speak soft words to her father's foe. The warrior bent his eagle eye on her who had so long been his pride, and all the affection of the Indian heart was kindled as he gazed.

"Thou art young in winters, my beautiful, thy feet are swift in the woods, and thy heart is gentle as the silver moonlight on the lake; but thou wouldst scorn the warrior who failed to tame thy father's enemy, I know, or thou art not the daughter of thy mother."

Iowa felt the blood leave her cheek, and flow back to its fountain in her heart, at such a scrutiny of her thoughts, and she hastened to turn aside the attention of the council from herself; but the Hawk-Eye had chosen from among his braves, the elected one for the princess Iowa, and now he preferred his suit.

"Beautiful princess of the North, I sat beside the council-fire and saw thy beauty; I tracked the deer through the forest, and you passed me with a bound like the fawn; I glided in my birchen canoe, over the lake, and you have dashed the spray from your oar at my side. For many moons the Hawk-Eye has followed the war trail, and I have hung the scalps at his belt and he has promised me the hand of the princess Snow-Feather as my gift. I would sit at her feet and play my pipe while she strung my wampum, and every moon would bring around the dance and the love song."

Iowa reddened, and the quick pulse beat in her young heart; she knew that the Hawk-Eye liked it well, and that he would sooner die than do anything unworthy of a sachem's pride. He saw her faltering tongue, and he knew she hesitated. Proudly rising he turned to the elected brave and exclaimed, "Away to the war-path; the squaw will see the bravery of the young chief, and her heart will be proud of him. Go, brothers, and may the great spirit guide you."

Thus the war council and the betrothal ended, and Iowa was left alone with her maidens to await the issue of the battle.

Another moon had waxed and waned, and many of the warrior braves from the Chippeways had been laid in the burial ground of their fathers, with the faithful bow and tomahawk beside, and the dirge of battle been sung by brother braves, who had escaped the curse of war. Iowa had been again greeted by the elected of her father, and the stern decree of her parent had overruled the reluctance of the beautiful princess, and we see Iowa now, ere the sun arose, gliding over mountain top and by the river side, to gather flowers for her bridal head, while she thus soliloquized:

"I saw him lay on the sand by the lake; he was bleeding and beautiful, and I bound up his wounds; it was many moons ago. I met him in the forest path, and he brought me eagle's feathers, and sweet flowers; I have wove his wampum, and he gave me these little moccasins. Yes, the daughter of Hawk-Eye loves the son of the Winnebago."

Thinking thus partially aloud, she was at length conscious of the possibility of being overheard, and turning quickly to reconnoitre, her dark eye met the earnest gaze of Big-Elk the Indian lover. He once more bounded to her side, and whispered that soft, sweet homage, which, with all an Indian's eloquence, proved that though his heart was that of a stern warrior, it was true and constant.

"No, no, it cannot be! The pipe of love must be breathed in by other lips than thine. Do you not see the flowers I weave for the bridal fest? The Big-Elk must go alone to his wigwam, for the Hawk-Eye has given his daughter to the Chippeway brave."

She waved her hand and would have fled, but the chief detained her.

"There floats my birchen canoe; yonder spreads my hunting-grounds, and further beyond stands my wigwam. I sit beside its smouldering fire, and my thoughts are full of the Snow-Feather. I seek you in the forest, and I hear you tell your love. Would you leave me to my loneliness?"

"I will weave your wampum and string your beads," replied Iowa, "but the Hawk-Eye stands between thee and me."

Their interview was long and earnest, the Indian heart was filled with contending emotions of duty, fear, and love. Parental pride at length had its sway over the beautiful Snow-Feather. A dusky spy had watched the footsteps of the betrothed Iowa. It crept with a stealthy tread through the pathway in the woods, till it neared the trysting place of the Indian lovers.

Behind a leafy shelter, jealousy hid the warrior spy, and when on the point of yielding to the persuasions of Big-Elk, to a flight over the prairie with him, the unerring aim of Nature's archer sped death to the heart of the Winnebago chief, while the love confession was yet trembling on his lips.

Iowa the betrayed saw it all, and with a wild shriek she turned and fled like a frightened deer through the forest. The moccasin of the Indian maid came no more to the wigwam of the sachem. Many months passed, and the war-trail had been followed, and the scalp-lock braided beside the Chippeway camp-fire. Hawk-Eye, relentless in his pride, had never sought tidings of the beautiful Snow-Feather, and in loneliness he sat by his wigwam fire.

A day came when the warriors of the North were roving through the plains of their heritage, and seeking the deer and the bear for trophies of the chase. The river had been reached and the encampment taken the place of the active journey. Hawk-Eye was growing old and infirm, and though he scorned to give any place to outward acknowledgment of grief or chagrin at the loss of his daughter, yet it had a strong hold upon his soul. They overlooked the flowing river, and Hawk-Eye dwelt upon its dark flood, as if it had a link with him, while he gazed from a high cliff; for, on the opposing shore, there appeared the form of an Indian maiden. With a wild toss of her arms above her head, she made one leap, and plunged into the flood. It was Iowa the Snow-Feather. The Indian heart was bold, but it was gentle, and love could break it; and revenge actuated the maiden to delay her martyrdom till a time might come when a father's eye could see the constancy of an Indian maiden's heart.

Months passed. There was heard a dirge in the wild wood, and among the wigwams of the Indian sachems. The Hawk-Eye was closed, and the warrior had gone to the hunting ground of souls. According to his own desire, he was carried to a high bluff that overlooked the cliff that had been the eyrie of the beautiful Indian maiden, and there arrayed in the princely garments that became his dignity, he was placed upon his war-horse, and the green turf piled around him until it covered the last waving spray of his eagle plume. And there the monument remains to this day, while the memory of the beautiful Snow-Feather lives in the dark ripple of that stream that bears its tribute to the queen of waters, and echoes along the forest, prairie, and meadows of Iowa, the land of the Snow-Feather.

ONE'S MOTHER.

Around the idea of one's mother, the mind clings with fond affections. It is the first thought stamped upon our infant hearts, when soft and capable of receiving most profound impression, and all the feelings are more or less light in comparison. Our passion and our willfulness may lead us from the object of our filial love; we may become wild, headstrong, and angry at her counsels or opposition; but when death has stilled her monitory voice, and nothing but calm memory remains to recapitulate her good deeds, affection, like a flower beaten to the ground by a rude storm, raises up her head and smiles amidst her tears. Around that idea, as we have said, the mind clings with fond affection and even when grief at our loss forces memory to be silent, fancy takes the place of remembrance and twines the image of our departed parent with garlands of graces and virtues, which we doubt not that she has possessed.—Mother's Magazine.

A FAST YOUNG MAN.

An amusing little incident is pleasantly related in "Guy Livingston."—It was at a picnic; Charley had just turned of nineteen years; he wandered away and got lost with Kate Harcourt, a self-possessed beauty in high condition for flirting, for she had had three seasons of hard training. When they had been away from their party about two hours, she felt, or pretended to feel, the awkwardness of their situation, and asked her cavalier, in a charmingly helpless and confiding way, what they were to do. "Well, I hardly know," said Charley, languidly; "but I don't mind proposing to you, if that will do any good." A fair performance for an untried colt, was it not?

ANTIMONY.

It is said that Basil Valentine, a monk of Erfurth, while engaged in his alchemical labors, threw some of the preparations of antimony where pigs had access to the mixture with their food; and having observed that after becoming sick they rapidly fattened, he thought that his friends might profit by the same treatment, and so he fed them in like manner with the swine; but to his disappointment found that what was good for the pigs was bad for the monks, for they died; and so the metal obtained the name of antimoine, antimonik, antimony.—Medical Anecdotes.

TO FANNY.

BY MERRIVALE SMITH.

They're false who tell us Love has wings
To fly away when pressed by sorrow,
That as he floats he gaily sings,
"I'll come if the sun shines to-morrow."
But, Fanny, dear, do we not know
That gentle, heavenly Love reposes
Upon the iron couch of woe
As sweet as on his bed of roses.

There is a spirit men call love,
That owes its birth to sordid passion,
That flutters like the moth above
And round the gilded shrine of fashion;
This is he that plumes his wings
And flies the field when pressed by sorrow;
This is he that lightly sings,
"I'll come if the sun shines to-morrow."

But Love, that in his bowers on high
Feets have seen in spirit vision,
That brings the glory of the sky
Earthwards on his gentle mission,
Grows brighter as the night comes on,
Sings sweeter when dull woes invade us,
And when we cannot see the sun,
We feel Love's pinion overshadow us.

Let Fortune—summer nymph—depart,
Let Hope prove false, and Sorrow lower;
These cannot settle round the heart,
Where Love has built his sunny bower.
Old Time may steal from Beauty's crown
The diamond youth, that shines so splendid;
But Love will smooth each wrinkle down,
And sing of youth when time is ended.

When Love forsakes his native skies
To revel in thy soft caresses,
While sleeping in those beaming eyes,
I'll bind him with those golden tresses;
And as we glide down life's dull stream,
We'll make him pilot, and if any
Shadows float across our dream,
Love will chase them off, dear Fanny.

THE BRIDE OF CONRADIN:

—OR,—

THE SICILIAN VESPERS.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

In the year 1265, Pope Clement IV. granted the investiture of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies to Charles of Anjou, Count of Provence, and brother of St. Louis. This offer was shackled with a condition that he should do fealty as homage to the Holy See, and present the pop annually with a white riding horse, and a tribute of eight million ounces of gold.*

Charles was crowned at Rome, raised an arm of crusaders, and defeated Mainfroi, the son of Frederic II., who had caused himself to be proclaimed king. Conradin, grandson of Frederic II., was the lawful heir to the throne, and Charles vanquished him in the plains of Tagliacozzi.

The Sicilians were uneasy under the French rule. They had no affinity with that nation; and it galled their proud spirits to submit to the yoke. The death of Conradin, too, the rightful heir, was still fresh in their memories, and to their excited souls seemed to cry to them for vengeance. Had he been slain on the battle-field, they would perhaps have submitted with patience to the fortunes of war; but he was taken prisoner, and afterwards with his friend, Frederic of Austria, beheaded by order of Charles, on the twenty-ninth of October, 1268.

From this time, the Sicilians kept themselves ripe for a revolt, for the next fourteen years; inwardly chafing and smarting under the foreign rule which they hated, and yet unable to throw it off. Still, as it worked slowly and silently, all knew that the moment must come at last. It needed but a few strong and determined spirits, to give the embryo conspiracy a form and life. John de Procida of Salerno, was, most likely, the master spirit,* that roused up the latent spark, and ripened it into a flame. The Sicilians listened to the whispered plot, and only watched the moment when that flame should reach the foot of the throne.

Situated outside of Palermo, was the noted church of the Holy Ghost. It was a secluded spot where it stood, inviting to prayer and devotion, far from the noise and bustle of the busy town. Hither, at the hour of vespers, came the inhabitants of Palermo, to perform their evening devotions. Close to the church of the Holy Ghost, a villa of considerable size had been erected by William Porcellet, a French gentleman, whose virtues had endeared him to the hearts of the Sicilians, in spite of the prejudice existing against his countrymen generally.

Noble, manly and brave, yet courteous and conciliating, Porcellet united all the qualities in his own character, which constitute the Christian and the gentleman. He had left the vine-clad hills of Provence, some years before; and charmed with the scenery which surrounded Palermo, had fixed his residence in a romantic spot under the very shadow of the venerable church. In the yew-shaded church-yard reposed the ashes of his wife and two brave boys; and he now resided alone with his daughter Blanche, to whom he had transferred all the love which he had borne to those who were gone from his sight. All that affection could suggest, or wealth purchase, was showered upon Blanche Porcellet; a being as fair and sweet as the violet, and like that, too, ever modest and retiring.

They only who have had their affections concentrated upon one dear object, can imagine the tenderness with which Blanche was regarded by her father. She was beloved, too, by the grave and melancholy Sicilians, who saw little in her or her father that assimilated with the character of the French nation. Mingling occasionally with the highest society in Palermo, Blanche became acquainted with Clementina Dalmatiani, the Sicilian lady who was to have been the bride of the young Conradin, heir to the throne of Sicily.

The mourning habit of the almost widowed bride; the deep seclusion in which she had lived for fourteen years, devoting herself to the memory of Conradin; her fervent devotion in religious duties, and the air of melancholy sadness which overshadowed a face, which, though no longer young, was yet beautiful in its pale mournfulness, all attracted the interest of Blanche Porcellet, and made her long to know the beautiful lady who came so constantly to the church of the Holy Ghost.

At the house of a mutual friend in Palermo, her desire was gratified, while on a quiet morning visit. Although averse to strangers, Clementina had heard of the lovely and interesting Blanche Porcellet; and, scarce knowing that she was of French blood, she saw her but to love her. With all the ardor of her loving nature, Blanche returned it; and thenceforward the two—different in age, in social position, in nation—became true and lasting friends.

Clementina was but sixteen when Conradin was doomed to death. Of a slight figure, and pale, delicate countenance, she looked scarce older now, although she numbered thirty years. In her heart, the longing for the downfall of Charles of Anjou never slept. It was her sleeping or waking dream; and until that was accomplished, she deemed it impossible that she could ever know peace again.

None of this, however, mingled with her conversations with Blanche. As they came out of the church, and wandered through the quiet paths that surrounded the graves of the dead, a gentle sadness shadowed her countenance, and she spoke of sorrow and mournful separation; but this was all. Conradin's name never passed her lips; and Blanche, while she longed to comfort and console, did not dare to intrude upon a sorrow that was too deep for words.

* Professor Koch, in his History of Revolutions in Europe, does not incline to this version of the matter; but this is the popular belief.

John de Procida had one son, Paulo de Procida, who was educated at Palermo. Long before his education was completed, he had seen and loved Blanche Porcellet; and her father, apprehensive of his own death and the consequent desolation of his daughter, and admiring the talents and virtues of the suitor, willingly gave his consent to their union. They were married at the church of the Holy Ghost; and Porcellet stipulating that his daughter should never leave him, Procida took up his abode with the father of his bride.

Of course this marriage partially separated Blanche from her new friend; for Clementina had a morbid feeling against witnessing the happiness of a married pair, since the dreadful event which so cruelly blighted her own hopes.

In vain Blanche entreated her to renew her visits. Sometimes when she knew that Paulo was at Salerno with his father, she could prevail upon her to pass a few hours with her; but on his entrance, she would flee like a startled bird from his sight. This was very painful to Procida. He knew that she loved and respected his father, and her conduct towards him filled him with sorrow; for no one had so fully entered into her feelings in regard to the unrighteous murder of Conradin, as John and Paulo de Procida. A mere child at the time of the transaction, Paulo remembered it vividly, and his horror of Charles of Anjou, and the detestation in which he held him, grew stronger and stronger every year.

One year before, a Frenchman by the name of Drouette, had taken up his abode at Palermo. He was vain, silly and egotistical; vaunting his countrymen as the wisest and most polished nation on earth, and constantly comparing them with the Sicilians, to the disadvantage of the latter. With the movements of a dancing master, and the manners of a fifth rate play actor, Drouette attempted to shine among the grave and formal Palermitans, as a gem of the first water; and his absurd pretensions raised the laugh against him, rendering him almost furious.

A respectable but somewhat reduced Sicilian merchant lived near Drouette's house. He had an only daughter, who was very beautiful; and, much to his sorrow, he was obliged to allow this cherished child to work at a public establishment where garments were manufactured for the army. The poor man was long in making up his mind whether to suffer this humiliation or not, but poverty at length decided the case for him. He comforted himself that he could always go for her, at night, and indeed he did so for some months; until, one night, he was too much indisposed to venture out, after an unusually hard day's work.

Constantia waited for him until late, and then ventured out by herself. On the way she was overtaken by Drouette who, half-intoxicated as he was, staggered up to her and kissed her. Her cry of anger and fear was heard by several gentlemen who knew her, and one of them applied his cane, very unceremoniously, to the drunken brute, who was soon roaring with pain, and swearing vengeance on Constantia and her defenders.

The next day, all Palermo was ringing with the affair; and the revolt, so long in embryo, burst out the more violently for being suppressed so long. Secret meetings were hastily held; other cities apprised of what was going on; the total destruction and massacre of the French everywhere agreed upon; and the hour of vespers was the time appointed for the insurrectionists to commence their work.

The elder Procida was among them, zealous, fearless and active, but as the hour drew nigh, there were whispers that Paulo was absent.

"Absent with his French bride!" "Protecting the Frenchman, Porcellet!" "Shame on the Sicilian who would bow down to the Gallic yoke!" "Death to all Frenchmen!" "Let us protect our wives and daughters!" were some of the cries that filled Palermo and its suburbs that day.

Meantime, Paulo de Procida was suffering tortures for which the condemned might shrink from exchanging his own. On the one hand, his father and friends, calling upon him to assist in exterminating the French, and on the other, Blanche and her father who must be protected at all risks. Such was the pure and perfect life of Porcellet, that as yet no one had included him in the strife; but after the victims were nearly despatched, a band of the most reckless of the Sicilians, who were not yet satiated with blood, found their way to his house.

They had no difficulty in entering, for the doors were not secured. They rushed in with lawless haste, and with oaths still upon their lips. Their leader turned aside into a large room which was lighted, for it was now the hour of vespers, and the church bell was still ringing from the tower.

Even the rudest being in that rude company started at the sight that met his gaze. Porcellet was standing, grave and serene as ever, apparently unmoved by surrounding events, as far as they concerned himself. He expected death, but he was meeting it with a lofty composure, that only wavered when he looked down at the kneeling Blanche, whose face was buried in her husband's bosom, as he too knelt beside her. Not even this sight turned the crowd from their purpose; but, advancing from the kneeling group, with a face like marble, and her figure shrouded in the deepest mourning, came the bride of Conradin, Clementina Dalmatian. At sight of her, they uncovered their heads, and stood, as if awaiting her commands.

"In the name of Conradin, I bid you to depart without molesting these people. They are mine! Touch not a hair of their heads, if you hope for pardon from God for this night's revengeful work. If ye are brave men, ye will not war upon age and weakness."

"But Paulo de Procida the traitor! He is neither old nor a woman!" And at the utterance of these words, the crowd swayed forward as if to crush him. Clementina stood fearlessly in the doorway, her face lighted up with a sudden glow of crimson, that trembled on her pale face like the flash of red wine in crystal cups.

"Are ye men!" she said, "that ye would leave your own wives unprotected, at a time like this? Is there a Sicilian here that would not do as this man has done? It would be brave, indeed, to leave this frail trembler to your tender mercies!"

The crowd slunk back ashamed, if not convinced, and as they emerged into the bright moonlight that was now bathing every object without, a shout long and loud rent the air for the Bride of Conradin!

Morning came, and the bright sun rose and shone over Sicily; over Sicily, whose soil was damp with the blood of Frenchmen. Everywhere the red streams had stained the earth—everywhere the dead met the eye. Among those who were abroad on that morning, was William Porcellet and Paulo de Procida; but not an arm was raised against the former—not a voice denounced the latter as a traitor. Clementina's word was a law to the lowest and rudest Sicilian. Could they have made her their queen, it would have been joy to do so; but she who came so near to the throne, as Conradin's bride, would have shrunk from occupying it alone.

Before the hour of vespers, every trace was cleared from the earth, of the carnage that had disfigured it; and the Sicilians, sitting in conclave, had resolved upon surrendering to the pope. The banner of the church already floated from their castle, and everything was arranged. But a few controlling spirits who came late to the conference, suggested a different plan, which was at length adopted.

Peter III., King of Arragon, was then cruising with a fleet off the African coast; and it was proposed to send a deputation to him, offering him the crown. He accepted the offer, and was crowned King of Sicily, on his arrival at Palermo.

No lovelier star beamed at the court of Peter III. than Blanche. No braver soldier drew sword for his country than Paulo de Procida. They who were at first ready to stigmatize him as a traitor, found that, although he did not participate in the wholesale butchery of the Sicilian vespers, his sword was ever ready in equal combat.

A little while Blanche shared the pleasures of a court; but her pure soul turned from these scenes of folly, to the calm delights of her home. When peace reigned over Sicily, she blessed the quiet retreat in the shadow of the old church—the dearest spot to her on earth, when shared with husband, father and friend.

With friend—for Clementina's frail life was now nearly drawing to its close, and to whose care could she be more justly entitled, than theirs whose lives she had saved? Day by day, the angel's wings seemed unfolding, that should bear her to the spirit world, where Conradin waited her coming. Day by day, the feeble frame grew weaker, and the courageous spirit stronger.

It was a wintry day in March, the second day of Easter, and just a year from that night of bloodshed and destruction. The winds were sighing through the old trees that surrounded the church, and made doleful music in the long grove that led to the mansion of the Porcellets. Meet day for one so sad to die in! To her that mournful strain, so sweetly sad, might have sounded like the call from the bridegroom to his dying bride, to rejoin him where they would be "as the angels in heaven."

Blanche held the pale hand in her own, and her tears flowed apace.

"Weep not, sweet friend," said Clementina. "This is not death, but the portal to life, through which I am passing. Rejoice that the spirit will soon be free; that I go now—for do I not hear the sound of the vesper bell? Rejoice that she who bears life's dark gift so heavily, should go hence. I come, my Conradin!"

And she who should have worn the crown on earth, had gone to wear the martyr's crown, reserved for those who have won it on earth, through much tribulation. Like all mournful, weeping souls, she had "gone forth, bearing her sheaves with her." She had indeed, passed away at the vesper hour; and the soft, sweet, melancholy chime seemed fitting music to herald her spirit into the heavenly presence.

Men with few faults are the least anxious to discover those of others.

THE CASTLE BY THE SEA.

Translated from the German of Uhland.

BY JOEL BENTON.

- Query.* Have you the castle seen—
The high castle by the sea?
Golden and rosy winds
Sweep over it lazily.
- It looks as if it would bow
Low to the crystal floods;
It looks as if it would rise
To the gorgeous evening-clouds.
- Answer.* Yes, indeed I have seen
The high castle by the sea,
And the moon that above it stands,
And the mists, its drapery.
- Query.* The winds and the heaving sea—
Did they not strange sounds prolong?
Did you hear in the lofty hall
The music and festive song?
- Answer.* The breezes and billows all
In deepest quiet slept,
A plaintive song from the hall
I listened to till I wept.
- Query.* Sawest thou walking forth
The king with his queen divine?
Did her crimson mantle rustle?
His gold tress shine?
- Led they not out with delight
A pretty maiden there,
Splendid as the sun
That flashed on her golden hair?
- Answer.* Ah, yes,—the parents I saw,
Without the crown of light,
In deepest mourning garb:
The maiden was out of sight.

GAINING THE CASE.

BY MRS. N. T. MUNROE.

THE beautiful, bewitching Rosalinda had rejected me; and tired and sick of the world, I said I would never put faith in woman more—I would live and die a bachelor. Rosalinda, how I had loved her! I had thought her perfection, and altogether lovely. I had attended her to balls and parties; I had been her most devoted servant, and had flattered myself she loved me; but yet, when I thought matters had gone far enough to warrant proposals of marriage, she rejected me!

But of what avail are the secret sorrows of the heart? If our affections are rudely torn at night, the next morning must find us at our post of duty; so, although Rosalinda had rejected me by gaslight, morning found me at my usual avocation, and the hundreds that I passed in the street knew not the secret weight of sorrow I carried safely buttoned up beneath my dreadnought overcoat, that cold February morning.

I sat down in my office and calmly reviewed the matter, and as I did so, I thought that after all, the lady was not so much to blame, for what had I to offer her? A very hopeful heart, a very respectable person, youth, a good education, and for support, the products of a very dingy law office, where I often sat, day after day without a single case. Doubtless she had been influenced by her friends, she had not denied that she loved me; but we were both young, so she said, which was true, and when I offered to wait as long as she deemed right, she still hesitated; no doubt her friends had told her such would be an unwise proceeding, as by that means she might lose many eligible offers; so she dismissed me.

The fire over which I sat pondering these things, was miserable enough to make any one have the "blues," and as I looked up, I caught sight of the little ragged urchin whose duty it was to kindle that fire, but I was in no mood to scold him. That very morning I determined I would be somebody; Miss Rosalinda should yet be sorry that she rejected me. So to begin matters, I stirred up the fire, put on the blower, swept up the office, and then sat down to my books.

Two things, of which now I was nearly destitute, I must have: money and fame. So for months and months I read and studied, attended courts, sought acquaintances with lawyers, made myself familiar with everything which I thought would be useful to me in my future career. It was not long before I had some few cases; I managed them well, for I put my whole soul in them; I gained them, and a thrill of triumph passed through my heart; I had taken the first steps on the ladder, my feet were getting steady, I should go up, up.

Five years from the day that I sat so gloomily over my office fire, saw me in pleasant quarters, and established in good standing among the practitioners at the bar. It had been hard work, and I had sometimes almost despaired; but I had stuck to my resolve with dogged determination. Now I began to have money—to have a name. True, in my eagerness for these two things I had lost sight of nearly everything else. The three letters, L, A, W, seemed written upon everything. I had once been fond of poetry, Rosalinda and I used to read it together; but now, poetry was to me a forgotten thing; I had once read novels, now the sufferings of heroines and the deeds of heroes were like fables. The new forms and usages of society were all unknown to me; I still cut with my knife; still kept the temperance pledge; still looked upon man as the lord of creation, and thought women only fitted for housekeepers and mothers. And it is no wonder that I gained the name of being eccentric: a very good lawyer, but a strange man; and there were those who had always known me, who did not hesitate to ascribe my little idiosyncracies to my love affair with Rosalinda.

Just about this time, a case of murder made considerable stir in the community. I had been engaged by the suspected party to carry on the case, while the government side of the question was in the hands of the most eminent lawyer at the bar—one Hinckley—a man of powerful, subtle intellect, with the peculiar faculty possessed by some lawyers, of making black appear white; soft, smooth, polished in his language, and who had never been known to lose a case.

The facts of the case stood thus: murder had been committed—a respectable citizen had been found dead in his bed; killed, as it seemed, by a heavy blow on the head; and suspicion fastened upon a young man, a nephew of the deceased, with whom he had had some hard words. The murdered man, by name Robert Barnes, was guardian to the nephew, not yet of age, and to a niece some younger, both residing with him. He was known to have treated the nephew with great severity, and many could testify to hard words having passed between them. What tended still more to fasten the guilt upon the nephew, was the fact that the bludgeon with which the murder was supposed to have been committed, and which was found in the chamber, belonged to him, and was always used by him when he walked out of an evening. Young Barnes was known, also, to possess a most furious temper, and was suspected of dissipated habits.

It was true there was nothing but circumstantial evidence in the case, no one had seen young Barnes strike his uncle—no one had even seen him enter his chamber. Might not some one have entered the house with intent to rob, and committed the deed? It was not probable. The chamber was up one flight of stairs; nothing in the chamber had been disturbed; no valuables were missing, no money had been taken. It was most true the case looked very dark for the nephew, and the only gleam of light I saw in it, the only thing I had on which to hang a hope of ultimately making out the case, was the positiveness of the sister as to her brother's innocence.

It inspired me with like confidence, leading me at the same time to think that perhaps she knew more about it than she had yet told.

Maria Barnes was a girl of more than ordinary powers of mind. She was strikingly handsome, and her presence inspired respect. Her statements which she had made to me, were remarkably clear and concise so far as they went; but as I said before, a certain something in her manner led me to think she had not told me all. In her conferences with me she was usually calm, betraying but little feminine weakness; of her brother's innocence, she always spoke warmly.

"O, sir, he is innocent; I am as sure of it as I am of my own life."

"But," said I, "that is not enough, we must be able to prove it; and the matter so far as I have heard, looks very dark for us. The cane you own was his?"

"Yes," she replied.

"And he had many differences with his uncle?"

"It is alas! too true."

"Now what have we to counteract this evidence?"

"But, sir, no one saw him do this, he surely cannot be convicted on such light things as the owning of this cane? I saw him enter his chamber at ten o'clock, at that time his uncle was alive and well."

"But can you prove that he did not leave his chamber till morning?"

"I cannot prove it," said she, "yet I know he did not."

"How came the cane in your uncle's room?"

"O, sir, it might have got there in many ways. My uncle might have taken it with him when he went up stairs, he was lame at times, and I have often seen him take a cane to help himself up stairs."

"But these suppositions, my dear young lady are good for nothing in a court; have you nothing else?"

An expression of the deepest anguish, almost despair, passed over her face.

"Are you aware," said I, "that the opposing lawyer is one of the most able and successful members of the bar? And even had we strong evidence of your brother's innocence, he has such a tact at cross-questioning and brow-beating the witnesses, and of making his own case bright to the jury, that we might well despair."

"I know it," said she, "and all my hope is in that Power that will not desert the innocent." And she raised her beautiful eyes, dim with tears, to heaven.

Inwardly I felt convinced of the poor boy's innocence, although how I was to prove it was more than I could tell. However, assuring Maria that I would do all I could, I proceeded to prosecute my inquiries still further. I went to visit young Barnes, to ascertain if I could not draw from him further information. I found him sitting with his head buried in his hands. On my entrance he lifted up his head, he looked pale and worn. He was of pleasant countenance, rather prepossessing than otherwise; certainly there was nothing about him to warrant the suspicion that he could commit the crime of which he was charged. He was intelligent and clear in his account of himself. He had quarrelled with his uncle more than once, it is true, for he was very penurious, and kept from him money which was rightly his own, and that very night he had left him in anger. He was out in the evening; he returned home about ten o'clock, and was going up stairs to his bed, when he met his sister on the stairs, spoke to her; she turned and went into her chamber; he went up to his, and he did not come down till he was called in the morning and told his uncle was dead.

"But how came your cane in your uncle's chamber?"

"I don't know. I left it in the hall, as is my custom when I come in."

"Could the servant have been accessory to this deed?"

"I think not, she has been in the family many years, and I have no reason to suspect her."

"Where did she sleep?"

"Up in the attic. She heard no disturbance."

"Where was your sleeping apartment?"

"Directly over my uncle's."

"Where did your sister sleep?"

"Directly across the hall from my uncle's chamber."

"What persons have been in the habit of visiting at your uncle's?"

"I think not many visitors, my uncle was close and stingy in his habits. I never asked my associates there. A sister of his sometimes came there; one Mr. Clark, a nephew of the husband, was also in the habit of visiting the house; two or three old gentlemen sometimes dropped in to play backgammon or whist with my uncle, and these are about all."

"And he was on good terms with all?"

"I know of nothing to the contrary."

"And you, also—they were also your friends?"

He colored a little.

"All except it is young Clark, who took quite a fancy to my sister. I knew him to be not a fit man for her to associate with, and told him so; he was terribly offended, and I don't think ever forgave me."

"Where is this Clark?"

"He left town last week; I don't know where he is."

"Where did he board?"

"At No. 12 Chestnut Street."

"What is his business?"

"He is book keeper with the firm of Roberts & Co., Canal Street."

I went to No. 12 Chestnut Street; Philip Clark was away, they knew not when he would be back. I went next to the firm of Roberts & Co.; Philip Clark had gone to New York on business for the firm, and would be back the next week; had then been gone more than a week. Was away it seems at the time of the murder, said I to myself.

The next day I called to see Maria, and while waiting for her to come to the parlor, I turned over the daguerreotypes on the table. Here was one of the uncle, and one I took to be his sister; also one of George the nephew and his sister Maria. A little papier mache box was on the table, and on opening it I saw a daguerreotype of a handsome young man. I fancied it might be Philip Clark's, and slipped it in my pocket. My interview with Maria was short, eliciting nothing new, and I did not inform her of my present intentions.

What was my next move? The murder was supposed to have been committed towards morning, so during the morning watch I stationed myself opposite the house. As I expected, presently the watchman came along. I found he was a man whom I knew well, having often seen him in court as evidence in petty cases; he also knew me.

"Were you on this beat the night of the 12th?"

"What, the night old Barnes was murdered?"

I replied in the affirmative.

"Yes," said he.

"Did you see or hear anything out of the way?"

"Nothing in particular."

The man's tone did not satisfy me, it was not open and honest.

"Are you sure you recollect nothing? I am counsel for young Barnes, I think him innocent, shall prove him so if possible, and if you know anything about the case, it is for your interest to make it known."

The man stood irresolute, kicking his heel against the curbstone. I continued:

"I am convinced some one went into that house between the hours of twelve and six; I am convinced that the same person came out again, now can you hold up your hand and swear you saw no such person?"

Still he was silent, and I grew more and more convinced that I had found my man.

"Come," said I, laying my hand upon his shoulder, "why don't you answer me?"

"I know nothing about it," said he sullenly.

"I am convinced you do," I replied, "and the law will oblige you to tell it. I shall call upon you at the trial; you might as well tell me all now, it will be better for you."

Suddenly, as if determined to make a clean breast, the man turned round and faced me.

"Well, that night, I was standing just in the shadow of that doorway, when I saw a man go into Barnes's house. Thinking it might be young Barnes, who sometimes keeps late hours, I didn't think much about it. You see that window up there," said he, pointing to the second story, "well, all at once a light flashed through the chamber, and while I stood looking, I saw on the curtain the shadow of a man's arm holding a heavy cane, and raised as if to strike. I was just thinking if I had not best raise an alarm, when the same man came out of the door, and I sprang forward and nabbed him. You see there is a gaslight right there, well, I held him under that and saw him plainly.

"What have you been doing in there?" said I, giving him a rough shake.

"He tried to clear himself from my grasp, but I was too strong for him.

"Let me go," said he, 'I will give you money; ten (I shook my head), twenty, fifty dollars.'

"Tell me what you have been doing,' I said.

"Nothing," said he, 'only to visit a lady.'

"'Tis a lie," said I, 'I saw your shadow through the window, and you had your arm raised as if to strike some one.'

"He turned pale as a sheet, I can tell you.

"Pooh," said he, 'I'll tell you, I wanted some of the old fellow's money; while I was helping myself, he stirred in bed and spoke. I just gave him a gentle tap to keep him quiet, that's all. Come, let me go and I'll share the profits with you.' And he thrust a bundle of bills into my hand, and I let him go."

"And you did not disturb the house?"

"No," said he.

"Did you know the man?" said I.

He hesitated. "Yes, I have seen him before."

"Should know him again?"

"Yes."

"Look here," said I, leading him under the light, and showing him the miniature, which in an after interview with Barnes I had made sure was Clark's.

"That's the very fellow," said he. "You've got him, that's a fact."

"Do you know anything further?" said I.

"Well," said he, for once the ice broken he was very communicative, "after I had let him go, I watched him to the corner; when he had turned, I ran after him and saw him go into that cellar on the other corner."

"And no one knows of this?" said I.

"No one."

"No one has made any inquiries?"

"No."

"Well, keep yourself in readiness, you shall be summoned to appear as witness at the trial." So saying I left him.

The next day I took a friend with me and stepped into the place which the watchman said Clark had visited after leaving him. It was a drinking establishment, the owner of which greeted me very cordially. I asked him if he knew one Philip Clark. O, yes, he knew him.

"Had he seen him of late?"

"Yes."

"Could he tell when it was?"

He thought a moment. "I think I saw him last—yes, I am sure it was on Tuesday of last week; he came in here late at night, or rather early in the morning. He called for a glass of brandy and water; he was not well. Will you have something, sir?"

"Nothing," said I; "but are you positive as to the time?"

"Yes," said he, "I am. He also said he was going to New York in the early train."

"Please, then, bear your assestion in mind, and be ready to confirm it if called upon. And remember this gentlemen is here as witness of what you have said." And so saying I left him.

It was now Saturday. The trial came on the next week. Clark was expected home on Wednesday. I had not yet informed Maria of the new turn in affairs. I thought I ought to do so. Accordingly, on Monday I called to see her.

"I come," said I, "to inform you that the case looks better for your brother. I have got some new witnesses, whose evidence throws quite a new light on affairs."

I doubt not I spoke in quite a business-like, lawyer style—it was my habit. In all my cases I had never before had any business to transact with the ladies. And in all my inquiries about this Clark, it had never once occurred to me that Maria might be interested in him. But when I saw that she turned pale and red, and very anxious, all at once her brother's assertion flashed upon my mind, and with it my old suspicion that she knew more than she had told. However, I was obliged to go on and tell her the result of my inquiries. She listened with interest.

"You will make use of these witnesses?"

"Ought I not?" inquired I.

"Yes," said she, slowly.

"I have no evidence save those of a hair's weight in your brother's favor. Do you object to Philip Clark's being implicated?"

It was a close question, and she did not answer directly; but sat in deep thought. After a while, with an expression as if her mind was made up as to her course, she said very slowly, without answering my question:

"It is right that the guilty should suffer. God will forgive me if for a short time I yielded to a woman's weakness. Mr. Stacy, use your evidence as you think best. I can assure you, if you need such assurance, that there is no doubt as to his guilt; if more evidence is necessary you shall have it."

"Miss Barnes," said I, "were it possible to save your brother without—"

"No, no," said she, "it cannot be done; no stain shall rest upon his name. The guilt must fall where it belongs."

The trial came. As I expected, Hinckley made out a strong case. There was the evidence of the servant, that the uncle and nephew had quarrelled that night; there was his cane found in his room; there was the knowledge that he was in the house all night; evidently no one had entered the house; there was no intent to rob; the accused was a person of strong passions, dissipated habits, and had been heard to say he hated his uncle.

The case was dark for him. I urged that had he been guilty he would most certainly have made his escape, as suspicion would be sure to fall upon him. He was seen to enter his room at ten o'clock; no one had seen him leave that room till morning. The cane might easily have been taken by that other person, who had committed the crime, as it stood in the hall. All this I found made no great impression, the feeling evidently was that Barnes was guilty.

When the court opened the next morning, Hinckley's face wore a look of triumph. I rose and addressed the court, saying that I had some new witnesses to bring forward, and I hoped yet to prove my client innocent. I then called William Brown, the watchman, to the stand. He came on and made his statements in substance the same as he had made to me: when he had finished, I saw that the tide began to turn.

Hinckley cross-examined him and tried to pull his evidence to pieces, but he was not to be daunted. Hinckley had in some way heard of the turn I was to give affairs, and was prepared. He should prove, he said, that Clark was in New York at the time of the murder, and that the watchman was mistaken. So Clark's boarding-master, and Mr. Roberts, Clark's employer, came forward and testified that Clark went to New York the week before, and had not yet returned.

I then called for George Stephens to take his place in the stand. He testified that Clark came into his place on Wednesday morning, called for a glass of brandy and water, and said he was going to New York that day. Appeared excited and flurried.

Hinckley did not like my new witnesses, and in a sneering tone questioned their respectability: a watchman who had taken a bribe, and a keeper of a cellar who might easily be induced to do the same. I saw that his words had weight. Just at this moment a scrap of paper was handed me: "For your next witness call Miss Barnes." I did so. She came to the stand looking very pale, but perfectly self-possessed, and told her story in substance as follows:

On the night of the murder, as she was about to retire, she met her brother, who had just come in; they stopped in the hall and spoke to each other; he went to his room and she to hers. Her room was directly opposite her uncle's. Towards morning she heard a noise in her uncle's room. Thinking he might be unwell, she rose and opened the door, all was still. She was just closing it, when her uncle's door opened. She stood with her door just ajar, and saw a man come out of her uncle's room; the light from the chamber shone full upon his face—the man was Clark! She was surprised; she thought him in New York. He passed down stairs, and she heard the outer door close after him. As soon as she recovered from her astonishment, she went into her uncle's chamber, and found him dead. She alarmed the house; but made no mention of having seen Clark.

When she had finished, Hinckley remarked that it seemed strange that the young lady should be willing to see her brother accused of the crime, when she could so easily have pointed out the guilty one. I rose to make some reply, when Maria spoke:

"It may seem strange in the eyes of some; but as I recognize no right that the law has to require me to make known those reasons, I shall be excused if I keep them secret; especially as my making them known could not give or take away from the force of my evidence." Hinckley was silenced for a time.

Clark was expected to return to the city to-day; and I had taken the precaution to have an officer in readiness for him when he should arrive. The witnesses had now all been examined, and evidence summed up on both sides; the judge had given the charge to the jury; when my officer came in and said that Clark did not come on in the train. He had got wind of the affair, and made his escape. On some accounts I felt relieved. The jury brought in a verdict of not guilty. Barnes was acquitted. I had gained the case. I may as well say in this place, that not long afterwards we saw in the paper the death of Philip Clark. He died in Australia.

After this, young Barnes grew to be quite a favorite with me. The affair had been a benefit to him; he left his evil associates. He and his sister, having a small property, bought a house and lived together in a very snug, pretty way. Somehow I got into the habit of visiting them. I don't know when it was that I began to love Maria Barnes, or to think she might make a good wife. I may not tell how I managed my suit on this occasion. I had profited by experience, most certainly; and now found the court of love as propitious as courts of law. I got the case.

SERMONS.

"It amazes me ministers don't write better sermons—I am sick of the dull, prosy affairs," said a lady in the presence of a parson.

"But it is no easy matter, my good woman, to write good sermons," suggested the minister.

"Yes," replied the lady, "but you are so long about it; I could write one in half the time if I only had the text."

"O, if the text is all you want," said the parson, "I will furnish that. Take this one from Solomon, 'It is better to live in a corner of the housetop, than in a wide house with a brawling woman.'"

"Do you mean me, sir," inquired the lady quickly.

"O, my good woman," was the grave response; "you will never make a sermonizer; you are too soon in your application."—Christian Inquirer.

ATTENTION, GIRLS!

There is a great scarcity of domestics in Kansas. You can get any amount of wages, if you can only get there. And what is still more interesting to you, eligible males are as plenty as mosquitoes at the seashore, and wives as scarce as silver dollars. Girls there are raised from the rank of servant to that of mistress, as suddenly as tavern keepers are made colonels in this part of the world. When you go, be sure to take with you a white veil, kid gloves and orange flowers. A gold ring also would be an advisable article, for a jewel of a girl.—Philadelphia Journal.

FLOW ON, RIVER, FLOW.

BY JOHN CARTER.

Flow on, river, flow,
All darkly and slow,
Flow peacefully on to the sea;
There is a star on thy breast,
Where the twilight doth rest,
And there's peace on thy bosom for me.

I have sundered the coil
Of heart-wearing toll,
I have quit the life-struggle awhile,
And I seek thee to-night,
All stained with the fight,
To forget it and gaze on thy smile.

Thou art flowing along,
Defiant and strong,
Heeding lightly the trials of youth,
While trembling I stand,
Nor heed the command,
Urging on to the rescue of truth.

O, the foeman is strong,
And the fight must be long,
And mine armor is heavy to bear—
I must rest here awhile,
And my spirits beguile,
Lest to-morrow I sink in despair.

NIGHT ON THE LOIRE.

BY EDWIN A. LOTHROP.

THE dungeons of the tribunal at Nantes lay in the sombre gloom of twilight—a wintry twilight, short, dim and gray. To eyes unaccustomed to the deep, gloomy recesses of these dens, it hardly mattered whether midnight or noonday prevailed; but to those which had not fairly looked a gleam of sunshine in the face for months, every gradation of light was marked. In one of these dungeons, sat a lady of noble mien, and an air of dignity which no circumstances of imprisonment or suffering could hide or diminish. Another female was there also, whose tender and affectionate manner toward the lady was as lovely to see as it was remarkable. She was a young girl, of no great degree of personal beauty; but with a soft, persuasive smile that brightened up an ordinary face into a really handsome one.

The elder lady was the wife of Lepina, a Vendean general; the younger was her attendant, but loved and valued by Madame Lepina as a child. Madame was one of the victims of the blood-thirsty Carrier; and when she was carried to the dungeons, the young girl insisted on following her thither. She was a native of Chateaufort, who was deeply attached to her mistress, and would not be separated from her. Even in the gloomy room which constantly held these two heroic females, they were as regardful of their appearance, and as punctilious in their habits as though they were in the very heart of society. Madame Lepina would have deemed herself failing in self-respect had she not maintained as much state as was possible to preserve in her present abode. Still this ceremony only affected her outward. The heart was just as free—the affections as unreservedly given; and it was not in the nature of things to feel otherwise than tender and affectionate towards the amiable girl, who, for her sake, had forsaken all and followed her to these dreary depths—who mingled the consolations of religion, the fervor of love, and the renewing power of faith and hope in a future release from imprisonment.

"My dear Ida," said madame, one day when she had been more than usually gloomy, and Ida more devoted to her comfort, "what could I have done without you? I do not believe that my life would have been spared, or that I should ever have hoped to see my beloved husband again, had not you inspired me with hope and fortitude. If God spares my life now, my precious child, you shall be to me as a daughter; you shall share my home. Alas! what is my home now?"

"Do not distress yourself, dearest lady. A few weeks more, and I doubt not the rigor of your punishment will be softened. Do not doubt that you will meet General Lepina again—the 'brave Vendean general,' as I heard some one of the visitors call him the other day."

The lady's face flushed with pride and pleasure at this tribute to her noble husband; and she pressed Ida's hand with more than usual warmth. The days wore on in this gloomy place, with little of note to rouse Madame Lepina from the stupor which the darkness and the confined air always brought upon her. Ida's more youthful eyes could discern objects with more clearness than could the tear-bedimmed ones of madame; and the young girl sewed, netted, and, when the atmosphere without was clearer than usual, she could read a little; but the attempt was dangerous to the sight, and Madame Lepina absolutely forbade her making the trial.

So the time lagged wearily. An occasional visit from the ferocious being by whose orders the wife of General Lepina had been made to undergo the refinement of cruelty, by separating her from her husband, alone varied the monotonous gloom of her existence. Only the devotion of her faithful Ida could have enabled her to endure the misfortunes which had settled upon a life once so gay and happy.

Madame Lepina was once the beauty of her times; not the belle, for she was too true a woman; too truthful to her deepest womanly nature, to claim so poor a distinction. Soon after her marriage with General Lepina, she had lost both her parents; and, being an only child, there were none with whom she claimed near relationship. When therefore, the edict for her incarceration went forth, she had no near friend whose visits could soften the pains of her imprisonment, or bring her news of her adored husband.

The same utter destitution of relations was true of Ida Keough. Her parents were dead, and an only brother had early given up his life on the blood-red battle-field. Madame had found her mourning for that brother's death, and with the instinct of a benevolent nature, had taken her home with her, treated her as a companion, and only satisfied the young girl's independence of character and dislike of obligation, by allowing her to perform some few trifling offices about her personal comforts, and which she would have had no hesitation to delegate to a sister. An officer, high in rank, and devotedly attached to General Lepina, had become warmly interested in Ida, at the pleasant re-unions of the previous winter. He was perfectly aware of her poverty, and knew that if he married her, no considerations of influence or rank, or wealth, could arise in consequence of it; and he had argued with his own heart, and the result of the argument was, that Ida's sense, worth and purity were worth a thousand fortunes, and more than the most distinguished connections could atone for any want of those attractions. This officer had escaped from the fate of many of his companions, and in the depth of the wintry storms, he walked for ten consecutive days, until he arrived at Nantes. There he learned that Ida had accompanied Madame Lepina to prison; and the intelligence, while it awakened every feeling of admiration at her noble conduct, filled him with the deepest solicitude.

It was at the hour of twilight, as we said, when the two noble women were seated, according to their wont, and talking over for the thousandth time, the well-remembered scenes of "long ago." Both were affected to tears; but Ida's were only sympathies, for all day long, there had been a lightness at her heart, and a sense of hopefulness that filled the gloomy room with a ray of brightness. She was trying to administer consolation to her companion, who, drowned in tears, had just thrown herself back upon the hard bed, unable to control her emotions.

"Cheer up, cheer up, beloved mistress," said

Ida, "I have a presentiment that something pleasant will come to us even here, and that speedily. See, it is even lighter here now than it was an hour since; and we know by that, that the storm has cleared, and that the sun is setting gloriously. And the same sun, dear lady, is over all. What joy to think that when it brings a brighter beam to light up this dark prison, it is the same sun that shines upon our old home; the same that lights the pathway of your brave husband; and—" She ceased suddenly; and Madame Lepina, wiping away the tears, said:

"Yes; and that also of the brave Legare. Is it not so, Ida? Is it not that which gives to your words a sound of joy and hope?"

There was no time for explanation; for ere the words had left her lips, a sound was heard at the door, and the grim jailer entered; and in the darkened twilight, they saw that another form followed him, by the light at the open door.

"Fifteen minutes," said the jailer, in answer to a whispered question from the stranger. "I shall watch outside, and knock for you at the expiration of that time."

The jailer placed a small lamp in the hand of the new comer; and he came forward to where the prisoners were waiting in breathless suspense. As the lamp shed its rays over his face, Ida gave a glad shriek that stirred the very depths of the stranger's heart.

"My Ida! is it thus that I behold you?" he asked in a low voice. "And you too, Madame Lepina? Alas! what would the poor general say, to meet you in this dungeon?"

"Dearest Carlos," whispered Ida, "speak to her only in the language of hope. She is very low in spirits, and her health constantly failing in this dismal place. Hold the light that I may see her face, which I can only dimly discern."

"My generous, true-hearted love!" said Legare, "how can I sufficiently express my admiration of your nobleness and firmness, in following the unfortunate lady hither?"

"Do not talk in that way, Carlos. Is she not my friend and benefactress—my more than mother? And how little you must have esteemed me if you thought that I could forsake her now!"

Madame roused herself from her sorrow, and asked Legare many questions; but ere he could answer half of them, he heard the harsh voice of the jailer within the door, warning him that the fifteen minutes had expired. He now made a daily visit for some weeks, and always accompanied them with some delicacies more adapted to their wants than the coarse prison fare. He won over the jailer to permit this; and his visits formed a new era in the life of the prisoners.

Gradually, through the potency of his gifts to the jailer and his little girl, whom her father idolized, the time was lengthened to a half, and sometimes to a whole hour.

How sweet were those hours of communion! In after days, how did Legare recall them as the happiest that had fallen upon his life. Sometimes he would bring candles, and light up the room with such a glow as they had not witnessed for the whole of their imprisonment; but he took care to lower the light gradually, before the jailer opened the door. Once, he passed the ferocious pro-consul in the yard. A moment earlier, and his visits to the prisoners would have been stopped. He eyed him suspiciously; but as Legare had on the dress of a Swiss peasant, and carried a basket of fruit in his hand—a method to which he was obliged to resort—the pro-consul supposed him to be only a servant, and he was allowed to pass unmolested.

One day the door was rudely opened by some men while madame lay asleep. Ida motioned to them that they must not wake her, as she was ill and exhausted. They had an expression upon their countenances, of which Ida vainly tried to dispel the anxiety that it inspired in her. It was a mingling of ferocity and derision; and although she could not divine why she thought so, she was sure that it had some terrible import.

Another time—and this was in the evening—madame's name was called; and the person calling her, intimated that she must come into the passage. She was asleep; and Ida, apprehensive of some new terror for her already worn-down and exhausted charge, went herself, to answer to the call. She went back no more!

The morning preceding that terrible night, Legare had, in walking over the drawbridge which led immediately from the prison, remarked a curious boat, apparently just built. It was very broad at the bottom, capable of holding a large number of persons, and seemed better designed to float upon, than to cut the waves. It attracted his attention, and he made a pause to examine it. He perceived that an immense hole had been cut out in the bottom of the boat, and a valve introduced, to which was attached a small iron chain. He saw some persons approaching, and not willing to meet them, he turned hastily away; but the sight of that boat haunted him all day. He could not banish it from his mind. In some way he connected it with the idea of the prisoners; then, unable to arrive at any settled conclusion, he tried to banish it from his mind.

Had it been possible to make another visit that day, he would certainly have done so; but as the jailer had often told him that he was already running the risk of losing his place by admitting him daily, he contented himself with hovering about the vicinity of the prison, and feeling that he was holding ward and watch around what he truly loved. He kept walking about until after dark; and laughing at his own foolish fears, and the presentiments which he had cherished through the day, he went back to the house where he had been received on his return. He retired to rest; but sleep forsook his pillow.

He rose and paced the room until morning, longing for the hour when he might expect to be admitted to the prison. Something whispered him—or, as he tried to think, it was the effect of last night's sleeplessness—but something impressed him that there was trouble there. Madame Lepina's wearied and pallid look came to his mind, as he had seen it the morning before; and now he remembered thinking that Ida's cheek, as he held up the little spirit lamp to her countenance, looked pale and wan. He quickened his steps until he stepped upon the bridge. The boat was gone, and there were some indications that the draw had been raised since he was here the day previous. Still the feeling of dread curdled the very blood about his heart; and when he met the jailer near the door of madame's cell, he shuddered visibly.

"You will find your friend alone," the jailer remarked, as he unlocked the door.

"My friend," said Legare, "why not my friends?" And the blood left his cheek, and his hand trembled as he passed in.

The jailer sank his voice to the lowest tone. "One of them met her death last night."

"One! which—which—for God's sake, Moullins, tell me which?"

"It was madame. The pro-consul visited her last night, and she refused to answer some questions with which he assailed her about her husband. He came out, ordered the draw to be raised, and a boat brought to this step. Then madame was called out, and although it was so dark that Phillipe who had just come to relieve me, could not see her, yet he felt her presence. She came out, and her first step was into the boat; a valve in the bottom was suddenly loosened, and—you know the rest. Sacre! if I had been here, I would have pitched that man into the stream! I tell you, friend, I have not been able to go in there this morning, to see that poor desolate girl, who I suppose is her daughter."

Legare staggered forward as Moullins opened the door; but heard no sound within. A deathly stillness prevailed in the dark room, and he had just strength enough left to light the small lamp.

He approached the bed; the outline of a figure met his gaze, and he drew the sheet from the face—it was that of Madame Lepina! Where, then, was Ida? A terrible thought arose in his mind; and in that of Moullins also. The latter called Phillipe, his nephew, and made him repeat the transaction of the night before.

"That sets it all at rest," said the jailer, "it must have been mademoiselle, then, who took the old lady's place."*

He spoke to unconscious ears, for Legare had fallen to the stone floor insensible. But as Moullins stooped to raise him, he touched the hand of the supposed sleeper on the bed. It was deadly cold; and starting at the chill, as he looked at her more attentively, he saw that she was dead. She had, in all probability, heard the splash, as Ida touched the water; and the shock, or her failing to return, had destroyed her.

Legare woke to consciousness and to misery. Henceforward, he became a wanderer upon the earth; and in the depths of the forest, on the mountain top, or in the seclusion of valleys, he shrunk alike from the sight or sound of a river. The rushing waters brought with them the fatal remembrance of that awful night, when, as he had often pictured the scene in imagination, Ida had sunk into the embraces of the treacherous Loire, which had never given up its dead.

Once and once only he had wept; and that was after many years, when he accidentally met the aged General Lepina; but he never breathed Ida's name, even to him. And he continued to wander among the loneliest solitudes, until, one morning he was found by some travellers, in a ravine among the Pyrenees. They raised his head, from which the warmth of life was not yet departed. He had gone to rejoin his murdered love!

* That the wife of General Lepina was doomed to such a death, and that when called to meet it, a young girl, her attendant, went forward in her place, and was drowned in a boat with a valve at the bottom, is an historical fact.

PACIFIC FARMING.—California bids fair to lead the world in agriculture. In San Jose, a pumpkin was raised this year weighing one hundred and sixty pounds. It grew from a seed which produced an aggregate of sixteen hundred pounds of pumpkins. An apple tree in the nursery of Mr. Lindsay, at Union, Humboldt Bay, which is not much higher than a man's head, bore eighty-one apples that would average half a pound in weight, making over forty pounds of fruit. The weight of the fruit would exceed that of the tree, roots, branches and leaves.

I LOVED A MEER AND TENDER FLOWER.

BY E. W. PUTNAM.

I loved a meek and tender flower,
Within whose tearful eye
Seemed ever mirrored faithfully,
The star-lit azure sky.
I bore that floweret to my home,
And wept to see it lie
Drooping and pale upon my heart,
Mid stranger scenes to die.

I loved a bright and beauteous star,
And gazed, at set of sun,
Upon its varying beams afar,
Wishing it were my own.
But while devising some wild means
By which to make it mine,
I saw, behind the azure hills,
That beauteous star decline.

I cherished long a darling hope,
And watched, with eager eye,
To see the bud of promise open—
I saw it wither, die.
And I exclaimed, in tears, "O, thus Must all that's dear depart!"
When Faith, from the pure land of love,
Thus whispered to my heart:

"There is a flower that ever blooms,
A star that e'er will shine,
A hope that beameth brighter yet,
When earthly hopes decline;
By smiling angels' hands they're wreathed
With precious jewels rife,
And placed upon the Christian's brow,
A glorious crown of life."

THE MISER'S WARD.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

BY MRS. H. MARION STEPHENS.

A HARD, harsh, grasping man was old Peter Carew: the oldest of his neighbors could not remember when he had been anything but grasping. There was a story current—current only in whispers, for no one dared brave the roused wrath of the rich miser—that he had once been a bound boy in the village, that defiant of all restraints he had stolen his only sister from the poor house where she had been born, and with her left the place and went—no one knew whither. The waves of time rolled on, and the little ripple this singular disappearance created on the tide of our village life, soon settled down into calmness, and the wanderers were forgotten. The petulant, crafty, crabbed disposition of the boy rendered him distasteful to those who had protected him, and the town were probably only too glad to rid themselves of the dreamy, daisy-eyed girl who had so long been a burthen to them. At all events, no pains had been taken to recover them, and as I said before, they were very speedily forgotten. More years rolled on, and other impulses and other incidents settled down upon the village. Old people had gone to their long rest, and a younger generation was springing up in our midst, when old Peter Carew came amongst us, and bought up an estate which had long been in the market. He had but two attendants: an old man and an older wife, who superintended his household arrangements, and cared for his domestic comfort. He never visited away from his home, never encouraged his neighbors in their social tendencies, never suffered the slightest approach to familiarity, and seemed only to live in the light of his own accumulations, and the excitement of his grasping, money-grubbing miserly employment. No farm was so well tilled as Peter Carew's; no estate yielded so much, yet those who tilled it for him, knew just as little about its owner as did his neighbors. His name on change was good for the most exorbitant amount, and most exorbitant was the interest demanded for the use of that name; yet those who dealt with him were as ignorant of anything beyond his external nature, as any other of the mystified villagers. Children slunk away from him, and crept frightened into the shadow as he passed; conversation, no matter how mirthful, stood hushed and silent at his approach, or continued only in ominous whispers. Nurses used the name of old Peter Carew as a terror to refractory children; old gossips, sitting over their tea, shook their heads, and predicted evil to one so evil in himself. Did he know this? or knowing it, did he care for the opinion of his fellow-villagers? Was there no inner chamber to his heart, where beneath the crust of sordid avarice and love for gain were gathered the gentle memories of a childhood untainted by greed and gold? Did he never sit in that large lone room where the shadows slept eternally, and rolling the stone away from the sepulchre of the past, look in upon the ashes of what had been hope and love and charity? Were there no moments in that wasted life when the spirit wings flung off their rusty chains and spread themselves into the purer atmosphere of dormant affections? God knoweth! No one else could follow the miser to his lonely chamber, or read the secrets of that closely shut heart. And so years rolled on, till even he became an object of indifference to his neighbors, and was left to pursue his avocations of money-making and money-saving in comparative peace.

Christmas had come. Great fires were rearing and sparkling in wide-mouthed fireplaces. Parties were forming in old homesteads, and children were coming home whose step had long been silent in the paternal mansions. Everywhere were glee and joy and excitement. The poor were made happy by bountiful donations from the more fortunate villagers; the rich were deep in the mysteries of invitation cards and of party dresses; little children, red and rosy, eagerly counted the hours till the arrival of Santa Claus should place them in the possession of some coveted treasure. There was happiness for every one—every one but poor, miserly Peter Carew. The night preceding Christmas was far into the morning, and still the old miser sat drearily in his great arm-chair. His chin was resting on his clasped hands, and his keen gray eyes were fixed intently upon the crackling fire. Now and then a falling ember would startle him from his reverie, but replacing it he would again settle back into his chair and continue his meditations. Not a very pleasant picture was that solitary old man, sitting over his solitary fire in his solitary old mansion. His hair was sparse and gray, and scarcely wavered upon his wrinkled forehead. The firelight flickered about his person, lighting up his face, and bringing out in bold relief all the lines and curves which age and avarice had engendered there. Was it an illusion of the flashing light, or had indeed that old worn face settled down into something of feeling and humanity in its outlines? The Christmas bells had long ago ceased ringing, and still he sat and thought. The fire had gone down into darkness, with only now and then an occasional glimmer looking out like an eye from the dead ashes, and then fading away. The stars were all gone, and the crimson of morning was just breaking up in the east. Merry voices were ringing out in the air, and even while he listened, one more daring than the rest had called out under his window:

"A happy Christmas to you, Mr. Carew."

Happy! Mr. Carew rose and dropped the heavy curtains still more closely over the windows, and again seated himself by a now fireless hearth. He heard the jingling of bells as the sleighs glided over the crusted snow; he heard the mingled voices of song and shout, the distant echoes of pealing laughter, the lusty crow of the village chanticler, and he knew it was morning. He knew Christmas day had come, yet still he sat leaning heavily upon his clasped hands, and gazing intently into the ashes where the fire had died out. Was he the only lonely desolate man in the world? Was it a happy Christmas to all on earth but him? Was there no other fireless hearth nor empty home, nor tenantless heart in the wide universe? But what were his possessions? Had his own hand put away from him all of love, of gentle affection, of tender sympathy which it had been his lot ever to know? The sun had come up now hanging every leafless twig with diamonds, and turning the vast fields of snow into living brilliants. Crowded sleighs were transporting masses of jovial people from one house to another; little children were flattening their nose against the window panes to catch a glimpse of the passing crowds, and the reign of pleasure had already begun in good earnest. The miser could not close his ears, so he sat in his chair and listened. Another hour had passed, when the door opened, and the old serving man hobbled into the room.

"Well?" questioned the miser, lifting a face which looked singularly gray in the dim, hardly lighted room.

"That man's family in the tenant house," muttered the servant, in no pleasant terms; "can do nothing with him. He has got no money; his wife and children are sick, and—"

"Pshaw! Turn them out. I told you so last week. Turn them out or I hold you responsible. Turn them out, bag and baggage!"

"But the sick wife; the children?"

"What's that to me? What business has a man like him with a wife and children? Why haven't I a wife and child—(the miser choked upon the word). I have no compassion upon such a man. If he must have luxuries let him pay for them, I won't. Don't let them stop another day!"

"O, master, don't! Think what the day is think what that poor man must suffer at best. Happiness all around him; plenty all around him; homes and loves and affections all around him; only him and his so afflicted. O, master, don't, don't! Or if you will be hard on them don't trouble them to day—not on Christmas day!" And the servant's eyes were full of tears.

"Pah! what is Christmas day to me? Who cares if I starve, rot, perish here in the midst of my gold?"

"I do! O, I do, guardy; I do, indeed!"

A quick start; a burst of wild surprise, and the old servant was down on his knees, kissing the little hand which for the moment was abandoned to him.

"Little Lula—little Lula—little Lula!" were the only words intelligible for his sobs.

What a cherry, smiling, happy face it was that nestled down on the old miser's breast; and with what almost ludicrous tenderness did it soft hand wander over the worn face, and smooth the sparse gray hair down upon the wrinkled brow. It was not a handsome face—it was not brilliant or piquant, or enchanting to look at. There was too much strength in the massive forehead, and too firm an outline to the general features for womanly beauty. The eyes too, though large and flashing, had that same keen and piercing expression which characterized those of her guardian—for such the miser was. But when occasion called it forth, that firm-lined face could settle into the utmost look of affectionate devotion; those keen gray eyes grow soft and gentle as a dove's; and that wilful little mouth take leave of its firm-cut outline, and melt into the warmest perfection of womanly beauty. But for that little rigidity, her mouth would have been the impersonation of feminine sweetness: bright, rich, passionate lips like opening rosebuds, with pearly teeth just gleaming through the rift of bloom guarded by roguish dimples which would have set a hermit sighing, went far to detract from the plainer points of view from which a stranger might judge her. A profusion of hair swept over her shoulders in auburn curls, and fell far below her waist. You almost felt this was her only vanity, so carefully were the long ringlets trained to fall about her. As they mingled now with the white hair of the miser, the old simile of spring and winter was palpably presented. With a warm, caressing gesture, she freed herself from the miser's clasp and looked shiveringly about the room.

"No fire this cold day? O, guardy, I'm afraid you'll have to let me stay, now I've come, and take care of you. Wasn't you surprised, though? I dare say you never thought of me. I waited for an invitation, but as that didn't come to me, I came to you—don't you see? If the mountain wouldn't go to Mahomet, why Mahomet must go to the mountain; though I must say my mountain don't deserve it of me." It was beautiful to see her, with her glad, bright face, slipping down on her knees by his side, kissing his shrivelled hand in her fondling, womanly manner. The miser, all his bitterness gone, laid his hand upon her head, and gazed down upon the lithe little creature before him. What had he not lost in all those cold, hard years, by refusing the companionship of his sister's only child? He turned her face up to him and kissed it.

"So you really do love your old hard-hearted guardian? You would like to live with him always, and render his few remaining years happy and comfortable?"

"Few remaining fiddle-sticks! Don't you talk of dying these many, many, many years yet; if you do I'll—well I can't tell you what I wont do. Why, no wonder you look old—and you do that, guardy, I must say—and feel old, shut up here with Mr. and Mrs. Pliney—nice old people as ever was, but not the company for you. O, you needn't look glum. I've got over being afraid of you. I know, if you are an old miser, and I'm afraid you are, and if you are a regular man-eater, as people say you are, and if you do save up your money for—for for me, I suppose—and the way I'll make it fly when you are gone, you'll see; well, I say if you are all these bad things to other people, I know you better. I know there is a warm heart and a dear loving nature somewhere about you, or you never would have taken poor orphan me, nobody's child, whom nobody loved, and nobody cared for, and brought me up till now. O, guardy, if you had only allowed me to live with you, how happy I would have made you. I say, guardy, was you ever in love?"

"Girl!"

In the warmth of her heart, the gay-spirited girl had not noticed the gray, white face growing grayer and paler till this last startling syllable fell like a curse upon her ear. She started up, she wound her arms around him, she drew his head down upon her bosom, while her tears fell in rain over the wrinkled forehead.

"Forgive me," she urged, "I did not mean, I did not think." And sobs again choked her utterance.

The miser kissed her, and led her to the door of his chamber.

"Go now, dear," he said. "Get Mr. Pliney to bring up your trunks, and make yourself as comfortable as you can. Don't let me see any tears when you come again."

He smiled a ghastly, pitiful smile, and having kissed her again, closed the door, and when she was out of hearing, locked it, and sat himself down with memory. Picture after picture passed before him, and still he sat. A humble cottage, naked and bare, rooms full of staring strangers, with a coffin, and a grave in the poor's corner, comprised the first picture. Then came the poorhouse, with its attendant squallor and misery, where through the long days a sturdy brother and a puny sister went lonely around from pauper to pauper, sometimes meeting with kindness, but oftener with ill-nature. Then the boy was bound out, and the frail, puny sister, withered alone like a flower broken from its stalk, and flung into the shadow. As this picture passed, the miser set his teeth firmly, and clinched his hands as if wishing for the revenge he could not take. Brighter pictures then succeeded. The successful boy, the striving man, the warm-hearted brother and the tender lover. Then a dark, blank change: the sister betrayed by a villain, married in opposition to his most earnest prayers, and the wife that should have been his, the companion of another man, the mother of another man's children, sold for gold, for grain, for greed! Then he went mad. Then he determined to sell himself for gold, for gain, for greed. Then he shut out every other impulse, every other aim, every other object but that of gain. Once only had the heart been betrayed into human emotion, when a poor, puny little orphan, his dead sister's child, had been laid in his arms, and he had sworn to protect it. He had done his duty. He had placed her in competent hands, he had watched over her education, he had taken care of her physical and mental training, and in all but bestowing upon her a father's affection, he had felt for her a father's care. He had visited her once a year, but never while he had been resident of the village, had she before visited him.

Luella Wilton was little more than seventeen years of age when she is introduced to the reader, yet possessing rare powers of discrimination and energy; rare powers of discernment and analysis; rare powers of determination and will. She had no impulsive feelings, formed no hasty opinions. She was grave and thoughtful for her years, and although her girlish propensities were not always held in check, there was a solidity and a staidness about her every act more suggestive of the matron than the maiden. Still there was enough youthful blood in her veins to re-invigorate all who came in contact with her.

Her visit to her miser uncle had not been without meditation. He was the only relative she had on earth, and whatever others might say, he had been kind to her, and she loved him accordingly. Until her tenth year she had been his constant companion, sitting with him in his solitude, walking with him, riding with him, and associated with all his plans and views. The tone of her character had been caught from this companionship, and accounted in a measure for the practical solidity of her nature. It was a great trial to the old couple who had tended her infancy, when she was sent away to perfect her education; but if her uncle missed her, he never allowed any one else to think so. Mrs. Pliney reasoned and begged, and entreated, but with a look which even the good soul knew better than to brave, he only replied:

"It is necessary; I will it so."

From that time her name was seldom mentioned in the house, and until her sudden appearance on Christmas morning, the old couple were quite ignorant of her residence. Luella had her own purposes to work out, however, in this unexpected visit. Love is always at the bottom of all mischief, and of course she, in her bright, fresh, happy girlhood, had not escaped the snare. She loved, as she did everything else, strongly, bravely, and with a firm reliance upon the worth of the object beloved. Her clear, calm judgment told her there was no real perfection on earth, so she did not look for a perfect man; but she would as soon have doubted the stars in heaven as the constancy and affection of Walter Graham. She did not expect him to love her as she loved him. She did not expect to engross his mind day and night to the exclusion of every other object as he did hers. She would not have respected him so much if he did. He was not a particularly demonstrative lover, and Luella was rather pleased that he was not; but there was that in him of honest, hardy, manly purpose, which induced a woman to rely implicitly upon his word. No fears, no jealousy, no stinging doubts had characterized their intimacy. It had begun in deep and calm respect, it had ended in warm and tender love. She would have repaid by stern rebuke any one who would have hinted at his probable infidelity, and so when he wound his arm around her, and asked her to be his wife, she placed her hand in his and replied, "forever! here and hereafter." And now she had come home to gain her guardian's consent to their union. Her betrothed had accompanied her to the village, and remained at the hotel while she sought her uncle's house. And there we found her.

It was like magic, the change her coming had already produced. Fires sparkled on hearths all unkindled to the cheery blaze. Warm-looking carpets glowed in the rich light which had long held solitary possession of the best room. Shutters were thrown open, and window curtains pushed back to their farthest extent to let in the surprised sunlight. The village had been ransacked for material for a first-rate Christmas dinner. Mr. Carew looked twenty years younger in the unexpected joy of the occasion, and the old serving people were beside themselves with happiness. Luella was the sunshine which had lighted up the gloomy old house, and already the miser had determined never to part with her, when an explosion took place which threatened to annihilate happiness forever.

For the first time in her life, Luella trembled before the terrible anger of her uncle. The dinner had been removed, the fires replenished, and in a cosy little room sat the miser and his ward: he in his comfortable arm-chair, she on a little footstool at his side, leaning her elbows on his knees, and looking wistfully up into his face. The secret was trembling on her lips, still the words would not come to her aid. Some secret presentiment of evil seemed holding them back, and cautioning her not to be too precipitate. The miser was keen-eyed and quick-witted. He saw her wistful gaze, and divined her thoughts. His face grew stern and dark, and he lifted her hands from their resting place, and moving his chair, he went to the window, and stood for a few moments in silent thought. The wintry wind was wildly astir among the leafless boughs of the forlorn-looking trees. It lifted the whirling snow, and shook with a sullen malignity the windows and blinds of the old mansion. It whistled round the corners of the house, and occasionally tumbled down the chimney with a great roar and a gust. Without, all was bleak, dismal, sullen; within, all brightness, light and love. He turned again to the fireplace, where Luella was still sitting, now pale and agitated. Why should he waste her young life as his had been wasted? Why should he bring down upon that young heart the torments of a blighted affection, because his heart had been crushed? Why should he sting her to death because his own life had been a blank? It was right, it was necessary, it must come some time, and for the rest the old house was big enough to hold them all. His miser heart was melted in his bosom. He saw his only sister going away to die with the bitter curse of his tempestuous wrath upon her head; and how wonderfully she resembled that sister loved and lost; the more so as she sat there, pale and trembling with some undefined dread. He went to her, lifted the bright curls away from her forehead, and gazed down into her fearful eyes.

"Is he worthy of you?" he asked.

With a great gush of joy, Luella sprang to his bosom, and wound her arms around his neck. For the next half hour nothing disturbed the stillness of the room, but the soft, faint murmurings of Luella, as she narrated the incidents of her engagement. The miser was more agitated than ever she had seen him in her life. His face was pale, and his limbs trembled as if shaken with a sudden cold. In her history he read the history of his own lost life, and the history of every life that love has made happy. It was past; the confession was over, and still Luella hid her face on her uncle's bosom.

"And his name, Lula; you have forgotten to tell me his name?"

"Walter Graham."

"Walter Graham!" And with a ringing oath he sprang from his chair, nearly upsetting Luella in his haste. "Walter Graham! Her son, Walter Graham; he is your lover?"

Luella, astonished, paralyzed with terror, and nearly frantic with fear, raised her eyes to her uncle's face. And such a face as it was! So rigid, so colorless, so full of burning, unquenchable hatred, that she cowered and sank before it.

"Her son! her son! You to marry her son?" He stood wringing his hands and muttering over and over again the bitter words, till Luella crept up to him, and laid her own on his arm.

"What have I done? Why are you so angry with me? What has Walter done to make you so pitiless?"

"Why do I stand here, the wreck of everything manly and good? Why has my life been darkened and blackened and abhorred; lone, lone, miserable, betrayed, ruined past redemption? Why have I lost all trust in God, all faith in man? Why am I despised of all my race, an object of horror to those about me? Why, O, God in heaven! why have I no past but a blank, no future but desolation? Why but because I loved a treacherous woman? Why but because I mistook a demon for a demi-god? And that demon, woman; that fiend whose breath of fire devastated a whole lifetime, was Ida Graham, the mother of Walter! Do you wonder now that I am moved? That I gloat over the chance to wring her heart as she has mine; that I joy to see revenge once more within my grasp?"

With a look upon her face which would have melted any heart but one bent on his own retaliation, Luella sank down upon her knees crying:

"Mercy! mercy!"

"Mercy!" he hissed, stamping the floor with the ferocity of a fiend. "Mercy! What mercy had she upon me? What pity did she extend to the poor youth whose worship she had won only for the sport of the moment? Grand sport! capital sport! a poor fly writhing upon a pin—a butterfly broken on a wheel! Rare sport! O, yes, mercy! she shall have mercy, the mercy of my crushing, unutterable scorn! Of my bitter, eternal hatred!"

His hatred! Yes, it was written on that swollen and livid brow; on those set and pallid lips; in the wild light of those piercing eyes! Luella saw it all, and the agony of her crushed and bleeding heart sprang out in a deep wild cry for help and compassion from above. She gazed upon the dark face above her, but pitiless even in its abstraction. She tried to speak, but no words came from her lips.

"And you," he said; "you whom I have cherished, to turn viper in my bosom; before you shall ever marry with that accursed man, before you shall ever bear the name of Graham, I will kill you, crush you into the ground, heap perdition on your head! Mark me; there is no alternative. Now send for your lover; tell him all I say, and why I repudiate him; and add to your dismissal my curse—my bitter, burning curse."

He flung her away from him with such force that she fell among the curtains of the deep bay window, without the strength or ability to rise again. I do not think he knew the force he used, or was aware of her fall, till a low moan disturbed his dreary meditations. He set her upon her feet again, without relaxing one muscle of his stern face, and then she went softly away from him, walking like one in a dream, and sat down to write to her lover. That done, she rang the bell for the serving man, and bid him hasten back. She was very pale, and her eyes were swollen and disfigured; beyond that there was no unusual emotion visible. She knew her uncle's indomitable will, believed the separation to be inevitable, and tried to do her duty unrepiningly. The wind still roared and sobbed in the chimney, and around the corner of the houses; but the sun was out, and the glittering light lay all along between the mansion and the village. She could see the windows of the hotel where Walter was stopping, and for one mad moment her impulse was to fly away to him, and be at rest. To be with him, anywhere, away from the whole world if need be, was the wild cry of her agonized heart; but other thoughts came to her, and she tried to be reconciled. She saw her messenger disappearing behind the hill which hid the hotel entrance, and in a few moments more, saw her lover, happy and radiant, hurrying forward to meet her. She had given him no intimation of the preceding incidents, and it was in the fullness of hope that he now hastened along. Seeing her at the window he gaily kissed his hand, and the next moment he stood panting beside her. He would have thrown his arms around her, and imprinted his usual kiss upon her lips, but she drew back and waved him away.

"Never more, Walter! O, never more in this long, dreary world. It is all over; the love and the hope, and happy anticipations we used to enjoy; it is all—all over!" Her head sank upon her breast, and for the first time, he noticed her wan and colorless face.

"Why, Lu, my darling! My darling, what is the matter? What has happened? Who dares come between you and me?"

She lifted her pitiful, tearless face to his, and would have spoken, but he caught her to his heart. The color came back to her poor, pallid cheek, and a wild, passionate sob broke from her heart. A moment of silence—a moment's reading of that colorless face—a moment of doubting, agonized suspense, and then Walter knew all. Pen would fail to convey the intensity of that hour of anguish. Let him who has risked his whole life time of love on one frail venture, and watched its utter demolition, imagine the scene. I could not if I would describe it. The shock seemed to paralyze Walter Graham. He could not comprehend it; could not believe it. To give her up when she had become part and parcel of his existence! And that too, to gratify the revenge of an old miserly man who loved nothing but his money bags!

"You are breaking my heart, Luella," he exclaimed passionately, releasing himself from her clinging arms.

"God help us!" she replied. "I have broken my own, too."

"You? You haven't done it. That uncle of yours is the one to blame for it all. You have no right to listen to him. You have no right to sacrifice both our lives to his infernal revenge. I say you have no right to do anything of the kind."

Luella clasped his hands, and looked imploringly in his face. Her eyes were dry and lurid, and her lips parched as if with sudden fever.

"There is no help for it, Walter. My uncle is the only friend I ever have known. He has educated me; brought me up. I owe everything to him. He has the right to my obedience; the right to my gratitude; the right to my filial regard. He is not the bad man the world thinks him. He is embittered, not malicious. He has always been kind to me till now, and I cannot rebel against him, even if my heart breaks in the struggle. Whatever happens, you will never forget me; you will never doubt me; you will love me always—always; and if we never meet again—" Heart-broken sobs choked her utterance for a moment. "Remember me, Walter. Pity me. It is the last thing I shall ever ask of you, for I am dying, Walter. I cannot be your wife, and I cannot live without you."

It was no shame to Walter that his face was suffused with tears. There was no lack of manliness in the wild and passionate sobs which characterized that parting embrace. They had loved not as men and women love every day, but with an intensity of affection—a never doubting, melting together of souls, and as their love had been strong, their anguish was wild and bitter. Kiss after kiss had been rained upon the lips, the eyes, the forehead and the hair of the broken-hearted girl, and Walter was about to tear himself from her embrace, when, raising his eyes to the door, he encountered the face and form of Peter Carew! And what a change! Could that face, of late so distorted by frantic rage, be the face of the miser uncle? Could that quivering lip, those streaming eyes, that humble, sorrowful face, belong to one so terrific in his wrath? Luella, startled by an exclamation from her lover, looked up, and sprang into her uncle's arms.

"The old heart is aching in its loneliness, Luella; the old home would be more desolate than ever without you; the old man can better forego his revenge, Luella, than to miss the bright face and the sunny smile that has cheered him so often. Can you forgive him for spoiling this best and holiest day in the year; for making you miserable on Christmas day?"

"And Walter?" asked Luella, smiling through her tears.

"And Walter? Yes, of course, and Walter, though he did call me a miserly old curmudgeon, I forgive him—yes—and I forgive his mother," he added, solemnly, "as I hope to be forgiven. Away with the tears now. We'll have no more of them. Come in, old woman," he cried out to Mrs. Pliney, who had been standing quivering at the door. "Come in and greet your new master and mistress. Now none of your boo-hoo-ing. There, that's enough kissing, now go and hunt up your husband, and tell him if he don't set us out the best supper that can be found in this village—a supper for three, mind—I'll dismiss him, and he knows I'll do it. Now for a kiss all around, and God bless us all, and make us grateful, and more than all, forgiving."

Need more be told? Need we describe the peace and happiness that descended like an angel upon that old mansion, and more than all, upon that old miser's heart? Need we tell of the surprise of the poor tenant when told that his rent was paid, and that he was to live free till his family recovered? Need I describe the wonder of the villagers when the Carew house was thrown open, and invitations sent forth for a grand New Year's party? How Miser Carew, in a few short months, grew to be Uncle Carew—the uncle of the whole surrounding country, and the especially beloved of little children? No! The intelligent reader, knowing how love chastens and refines the grossest intellect, will have guessed at all of that. Two more pictures and my tale is told.

In a cosy room, made cool and shadowy by the clustering bloom of the Michigan rose vine, a fair young girl sits dreamily at her toilet table. The door opens, and Mrs. Pliney, younger by ten years than when we last saw her, comes softly in, and prints a kiss upon her darling's brow. She has a bunch of rare white rosebuds, the gift of Walter, which she lays carefully in Luella's lap. She is beginning to spread out the rich bridal dress which decorates the bed, but Luella has not yet finished her sweet reverie; so she begs for just ten minutes more of solitude. Mrs. Pliney fidgets a little, but finally leaves the room. Then she takes up the rosebuds, and fondles them as if they were sentient beings.—Once more the door softly opens and she sees reflected in the glass, not Mrs. Pliney, but her betrothed husband.

"O, you mustn't come in now, Walter—indeed you mustn't!" she cries with a little roguish glance at her dishabille condition.

But he does come in, and takes her in his arms, and presses his lips to hers, and calls her "his—his wife," just in time for Mrs. Pliney to catch him at it, and raise her hands in holy horror. And with this picture we drop the curtain.

In another room, not far distant, sits an elderly lady, upon whose face there are traces of recent tears. Nervous, she must be, for every floating breeze, every waving of the window curtain startles her, and turns her pale. At length the step she is evidently waiting for, yet dreading to hear, comes measuredly along the hall. She starts up, turning to the door with anxious, frightened eyes, and then sinks back again, pale, and trembling in every limb. The door opens, and Peter Carew, rejuvenated and brilliant in his holiday clothes, clasps both her hands in his. What followed in that long confidence which succeeded, is too sacred for the intrusive glance of curiosity. Nor will I attempt to say which calls for the most sympathy, or which was most beautiful in the sight of Heaven, the union of those fresh, young, happy hearts, or the reconciliation of those who had been so long at variance.

Peter Carew still lives, surrounded by innumerable little Grahams, and protected by the love of Walter and Luella. There is a small-sized edition of Peter Carew on the carpet now, rolling round, and wonderously endangering the kitten's tail, and if he don't turn out a spoilt Peter Carew before he does a nice young man, it will not be for want of efforts to that effect made by Uncle Peter and by Grandmother Graham.

THE BELLES OF CLAYTONVILLE.

BY HERBERT LINTON.

A LARGE wood fire was burning on the ample hearth of the great room at number ten Felix Place. It shone and glowed all over the carved woodwork, the heavy window shutters, now closed for the evening, and the ceiling on which some unknown artist had drawn fantastic pictures, and colored them as fantastically as he had drawn. Brown-haired angels with orange-colored wings were clutching furiously at others with blue hair and pink feet. A very fat and dropsical-looking St. John was supported on the right by an emaciated Peter, with a bunch of keys that might have locked up the Bastile.

A wheezy piano was discoursing the Battle of Prague, under the fair hands of Annabel Verner, the daughter of the house; and she had taken care to place the instrument directly under the old-fashioned mirror that hung between the windows. Nor was she to blame; for she loved to look on beauty, and certainly one of the most beautiful faces in the world was reflected in that old mirror. The face was one of those where the roses seemed struggling through the clear, olive tint of the complexion; and was partly shaded by the drooping curls of the dark brown hair, which was braided into an immense knot at the back of the head, giving it a purely Grecian outline. Eyes of the deepest gray, shaded by lashes much darker than the hair, and so long as to touch the cheek, eyebrows deeply arched, finely cut lips, red and pouting, and with their rare smile gleaming like sunlight over the whole countenance and showing the short, white teeth within, made up the rare beauty of Annabel Verner.

A low, musical laugh told you that there was another occupant to this room; and close by the ample hearth, sat a little figure on a low seat, holding a screen before the face that belonged to it. Mirthfulness shone out from every line of that sweet face, and illuminated the black eyes, while it seemed absolutely to nestle in the waves of the purple black hair. This was Helen Lowell.

Annabel Verner turned round at this laugh from Helen, and saw that still another, as bright and beautiful as themselves, was just entering the door, but so softly that she had not heard her. There was a loving embrace, as the three sprang to each other's arms, and then the speedy disrobing of her outer garments showed another, but not less perfect style of loveliness in the person of Marion Atherton. The broad, queenly head had not a curl or braid. It was parted on the top, and combed smoothly on each side, to the back of the neck, where it was simply knotted and confined with a small golden arrow. Her dress was plain, dark merino, with long sleeves and made close to the throat, where a simple band of fine embroidery was fastened by a small broach. No other ornament was visible, and the small ears had evidently never been pierced.

Both her companions were more elaborately dressed; Annabel in a dark silk, highly trimmed, and with jewels flashing from her ears, hands and neck; while Helen was attired in a pale blue cashmere, with falling sleeves, displaying her beautiful arms and white throat to the greatest advantage. The purple hair was graced by a fresh white camellia. These three had been pronounced, by universal suffrage, the belles of Claytonville, and they carried off the palm with becoming dignity and modesty.

Down on the large rug that lay cosily before the shining fire, sat the three girls, each talking innocently and unembarrassedly of the future; and planning bright schemes of wealth and happiness. I cannot say that some little atom of romance was not sprinkled amongst their talk, but the truth is, that riches formed by far the greatest part of it.

"What 'Chateaux d'Espagne' did they build! What noble, handsome and gifted husbands were to share all the fairy favors which were thus to be showered down upon them! High, lofty brows, pure and white; cheeks tinged by the warm kisses of the sun; tall, elegant figures, with a great deal of dignity, and a dash of smartness intermingled; and above all, rich! These were their prospective husbands.

It was on the thirteenth of February, and Valentine's Eve; and when they separated for the night, with loving kisses and tender words, Helen Lowell said, "We will meet again on every Valentine's eve, until we are all married." And to this they all agreed.

At sixteen, years go slowly on. As we approach onward, each one seems shorn of hours, days, weeks, until a year is but an atom of time; and even so was it with these fair, young girls, with all their fair, fresh youth lying as lightly upon them, as the dew lies on the rose; for it seems an age to look forward to the next Valentine's Eve.

But they are here again, on the thirteenth of February. It is a bright, clear, cold night out, and the window panes are covered with the delicate tracery which the frost king paints in such masses of exquisite white light. Will the young girls' frost work last longer than that upon the windows? We shall see.

The bright wood fire has given place to a polished steel grate with high, brass columns; but the spindle-legged piano is still there, and poor Annabel is still bringing out the Battle of Prague from its tuneless keys. And the musical laugh from Helen's rosy lips is as beautiful to hear as ever. But for all this, there is something on the face of each, that tells of a shadow on the heart. The color on the bright cheeks of the belles of Claytonville comes and goes oftener, and the eyes have not the serene look of a year ago. For Love has stooped over those fair young faces, and shadowed them with his purple wing; and in his train came old and wrinkled Care, and put the first stamp upon those pure white brows. The hearts that one year ago beat softly and regularly to the music of youth and health, now sometimes peal out great cathedral throbs, and again low and faint murmurs like the sighing of a sea-shell, or the breathings of an Eolian harp. —And as they compare notes, you would smile to find how little the real lovers who form the theme of their conversation to-night, are like the ideal men who figured in their imaginations a year ago. Not even the romantic names which they had then given their invisible admirers remain. Their Alfreds and Hectors have given place to mere common Johns and Williams; and the tall figures have come down to four feet six.

Perhaps two more insignificant men could not have been found, as far as personal appearance goes, than they who aspired to the favor of Annabel and Helen. William Carberry had long looked up to Annabel as one looks up to the angel of his own destiny. He was faulty, imperfect, and at times dissipated; but her love had seemed somewhat to elevate him for a time. His only redeeming trait seemed to be the tenderness of his love for her; and had she been a stronger woman, she might have moulded him into something better.

John Porter was Carberry's intimate friend; and through his means had become acquainted with Annabel's constant companion, Helen Lowell. To see her was to love her, and won by his flattery, she too overlooked the inferiority of his person, and the faults of his character, and sealed her destiny by accepting him.

James Lawton was of a different order. He was a great deal older than the two young men with whom his liking for Marion Atherton had involuntarily associated him. Of stronger mind, more keen and subtle wit, and a certain craftiness of character, he held his two companions in a controlling influence which they did not understand, nor in fact wish to throw off, but submitted to be led by him wholly. Marion's queenly disposition was rather longer in yielding to his sway, but then to her he did not at first assume such strong control. He loved her better than any earthly thing. Not even his ambition came up to the love which he felt for her. It was the one redeeming trait, mantling over his multitude of great faults. Marion, poor child! could not long keep up the almost regal dignity of her reserve, before such unqualified devotion. Her pride melted before it as the ice before the sun.

Annabel and Helen wondered together, that a girl like Marion should so respond to the affection of James Lawton. Strange, that they could not see that she, too, was comparing him with Carberry and Porter, and marvelling that they could so bow to such inferior natures. O, love does indeed wear rose-hued spectacles, and they color every object that they rest on.

I pass over a few years, no matter how many, and again the three belles of Claytonville are met together. No longer in the dear old room at Felix Place; but in the half-shabby, half-genteel locality of Ayer Street, where Annabel Carberry is the mistress of a showy house, furnished with showy furniture, and the door of which is opened by a showy servant. Beyond the precincts of the hall and the parlor, nothing was ever seen. The people who called, believed, perhaps, that there was a well-appointed kitchen and comfortable chambers, and a cellar and yard well-stocked. They would have been much shocked had they examined those premises, and reflected on the miserable shams which curtailed all necessary household comforts, to give the appearance of wealth to the visible arrangements. The three sat round the dim fire and talked; but the sobbing of the autumn rain does not more fully tell how the young hope of the spring has been crushed and withered, than did the subdued sound of their voices tell of the blighted promise of their youth. Even Helen's low, musical laugh sounded strangely forced.

"And so you are going to the West, Helen?" asked Annabel.

"Yes, John sent for me months ago, but I have delayed, begging and pleading Marion to go with me. Now Lawton has gone, and she has agreed to go, but very unwillingly."

"Not so, Helen. I should be glad to go if I could be sure of any thing like a home. But I have been so tired since my marriage, in going round from place to place, that all hopes of any future quiet for me seems so far off, and the prospect seems so dim, I hardly dare to trust anything human or earthly."

"But your husband, Marion! Surely you can trust him."

A faint blush rose to Marion's cheek, and a tear to her eye, but she tried to smile, and to turn the conversation into playfulness, in which, however, she soon broke down, and covering her face with her hands, she wept aloud. Her friends dared not interrupt this burst of sorrow. Helen adroitly began to talk with Annabel, and Marion, making an effort, recovered her self-possession.

In the first opening of the spring, Helen and Marion prepared to meet their husbands. They bade a tender farewell to Annabel, whom they dearly loved; and promising to write often and give her all the particulars of their new home.

Perhaps no sorrow ever came deeper to the heart of Annabel Carberry, than parting with the two cherished friends of her childhood. They had been associated with each other always in their youth; and as "the belles of Claytonville," they had won all hearts by the way in which they had "borne their blushing honors." Involuntarily, the title and the honors had been ceded to them without a murmur of dispute; for all loved the beautiful and sprightly girls who contributed so large a share of interest to the society of Claytonville. Bound together as they were, it had happened that no rivalry or jealousy had ever tainted their perfect trust in each other, and the harmony of their lives was as beautiful to see, as the surpassing loveliness of their faces. One would have thought that their early dreams might well have been realized, and that beings so fair would surely attract noble and upright men; but this had been reserved for others, far less attractive in outward appearance than they.

Helen's first letter told of Marion's unhappiness. After detailing the incidents of their journey and her own griefs, she added:

"But how can I murmur when I look at Marion? Dear, patient girl! how meekly she bears everything which her proud spirit would have once resisted. I tell you, Annabel, that Marion is completely crushed. When we arrived at the miserable place which he calls his house, Marion's impatience to see her husband was so great, that she jumped from the wagon in which we were carried from the last station, and with her baby in her arms, she rushed forward to meet him. There, close by the house, he stood, leaning against the rough logs, and absolutely waited for her to go to him. There was only one excuse for his not meeting her half way—he could not walk! You should have seen poor Marion! Every atom of the bright color which excitement had called forth in her pale cheek, faded suddenly away, and we drove up and alighted just in time to save her from falling, while he staggered aside with a senseless stare in those terribly cold eyes, and only then feebly recognizing his wife, he called out in stammering tones, 'Why, Marion, is that you, eh!' We carried the poor wife into the dreary-looking house to which he had sent for her, and I really thought she would lose her senses. Had it not been for the dear baby I think she would have lost them. How would poor Mr. and Mrs. Lawton feel to know what their son is coming to? As I told you before, my husband was waiting for us at the station, and had tried to make Lawton accompany him. We left them, to go on a mile further, and I have not been able to see Marion again until this morning. She has exerted herself to get things into order, and the effort has left her weak and ill. Believe me, dear Annabel, we have no right to complain of our disappointments. Thank Heaven that our husbands do not give way to this dreadful habit of drinking. It is now planting time, and yet Lawton was lying on the bed at ten in the morning. Do not mention this to any one. I would not add to her griefs by reporting them at Claytonville. I told her I was going to write you. She shook her head mournfully, and said, 'Tell Annabel all, but not to go any further.' Poor Marion! O dear! how very short was the career of the belle of Claytonville. I say belle, for although many classed us together, still you know that we always gave the palm to her. Good-by, dear Annabel. Think of us sometimes in this western wilderness, and be happy that, if all is not as you could wish, it is still far short of the unhappy state of our beloved Marion."

It is again Valentine's Eve, and the belles of Claytonville are together once more. Once more in the old room at Felix Place. It is now fifteen years since the night on which the merry set had their first meeting there as grown up women, and talked of the future with light and careless words. Each wears the garb of widowhood, and on each face there is stamped a world of care and anxiety. Little Willie Carberry is leaning over his mother's chair, entreating her to be reconciled to the choice he had made of a sea-life. Annabel Porter had made her debut this day as a school-teacher, although not yet fifteen, and Marion's two handsome boys are playing about the room. One house holds the three widows and their children; and in the exchange of kind offices, and the unabated affection of their childhood, untouched by the cares that have come like winged arrows to their hearts, they are slowly regaining their peace.

HINDOO FANATICISM.

A gentleman writing from India says: "It is not a week since I saw a Hindoo, who had been forty years in government employ, and was worth £10,000, refuse, when the rope was round his neck, to purchase his life by disclosing the names of those under whom he acted. He replied: 'Never! do your worst,' and of the thousands who have been hanged or blown away from guns, not one has made a confession. They have all shown a courage which only a strong fanatical zeal could infuse into such a mass."

THE SUNSET PICTURE.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

"WHAT in the world, cousin Florence, can Hannah be doing with that bunch of violets? Do look at her, please; there she sits, her hands supporting her head, and her eyes bent upon the flowers. I do not see any use in such idleness!" said little, busy, bustling Elsie Maitland, drawing her cousin's attention to the sober-looking servant-girl who sat in the kitchen doorway, seemingly absorbed in contemplating a bunch of early spring violets that lay upon her lap.

"Hush, Elsie! you do not know the girl's thoughts. You do not know what stories of innocence and purity they may tell her—what lessons of truth and love they may teach her, coming so fresh and sweet from the hand of God," replied the lady addressed as Cousin Florence.

"True, I do not know her thoughts; but I do not believe that the simple and holy purity of a violet can make itself heard above the Babel of ignorance and superstition that are forever sounding in her heart. Don't shake your head, Flora; her lessons do not read from pages that lay open in the green fields and cool meadows."

"Sit down by me, Elsie," said Florence Marlow, drawing a softly-cushioned rocking-chair opposite hers, at the open window, and bending her clear blue eyes upon the face of her young cousin for a moment. "Let me tell you how, by a simple yet grandly beautiful sunset picture, I was saved from a life of wretchedness.

"You remember, perhaps, hearing me speak of attending school at R—— Seminary when but sixteen years of age; and you may remember, also, of hearing that my old grandfather and grandmother, and poor, crippled brother Willie, toiled at home to pay for the education which they fondly supposed was all that was necessary, with my talents, to make my position high and noble in the world. The seminary at R—— was patronized by people of great wealth and station, and it was no pleasant matter for me, proud and keenly sensitive as I was, to go among the richly-dressed people in my cheap garments of muslin and calico. I was quiet and reserved among my companions, rarely joining them in their sports and pleasure-excursions. They called me haughty and proud, and smiled sarcastically the while at my cheap clothing—wondering, perchance, how with such an outfit I dared to repulse their patronizing efforts to make me at home among them. It was not to be wondered that, placed as I was among those who looked down upon me with condescending smiles, and with whom I felt no sympathy, that I should long for the friendship of some one with whom I could stand on equal footing.

"I had not been long at the school before I became acquainted, through the kindness (for such I must call it) of my room-mate, Emma Harland, with her cousin, who was a constant visitor at our boarding-place; a young man of rare personal beauty and winning and polished address. It was a long time before I could believe that his constant calls and as constant inquiries for me, originated from any real interest he might feel in so humble a person as myself. I deemed the sly jokes of my schoolmates but the result of malice, and the hot blushes that burned upon my face when they mentioned his name, was the only answer I gave to their banterings. And yet an interest for the young and handsome gentleman who daily joined me in my walks, and assisted me in my Latin and German, was growing up in my heart; and though I tried to believe it otherwise—tried to hide myself so exclusively in my books that his smiles could not reach me, the truth was everywhere before me. If he gave me a flower, I guarded it as sacredly as a heathen would his god, and looked at it with scarcely less reverence. I found myself admiring what he admired; the brilliant sunset, the early morning and quiet evening. If I heard his step in the hall, or saw him coming up the walk, a rush of sudden joy went leaping through my whole being; and sometimes, before I could go to him, I was obliged to drop my face in my hands to put down the emotions that depicted themselves so plainly upon my face. I must not tell him, I thought, how dear he has grown to me, until he calls for my love; must not by look, indeed, show that I care for him, save as I care for all others. And thus the days went on. I made rapid progress in my studies, and rapid progress in learning to love.

"At last, when my love for Albert Harland was strong and beautiful, in its autumn-like ripeness, he told me, with a glad smile upon his lips and a look of intense affection beaming from his dark eyes, that I was all in all to him; that he had learned to look upon life in a new light since he had known me; and that everything, every responsibility, every thought had grown tinged with the love that had come upon him.

"My happiness was too great to admit of expression, and leaning my head upon my hands, I wept burning tears of joy that so great and rich a blessing had come to me.

"What would grandfather and grandmother and dear brother Willie say? Would they not rejoice in my happiness? I told Albert of my loved ones at home; told him they were poor and humble in life, and that all their hopes for their future were centered in my young strength. I told him that I would write to them of him—how true and noble he was, and how much he loved me.

"Wait awhile, Florence, before you tell them of this," Albert said. "I have a plan for our future which I wish fully matured, ere they learn aught of me."

"But your friends, your parents, Albert—will they look on this attachment with pleasure?"

"A shadow passed over his face, and he glanced at me, restlessly, as he answered:

"They must not know of it, dear Florence. They are very wealthy, and I am their only son, and, quite naturally, they have formed all sorts of foolish and extravagant plans as to what I shall do; such as wedding a wealthy cousin, and building a magnificent residence in town; but I shall not mind them, of course, only so far as I depend on their gold for our maintenance."

"Our maintenance, Albert? You cannot mean that—"

"I mean just this, my lovely Florence," he said in a low tone, fraught with passionate earnestness; "for so long as you partially take in my meaning, there can be no wrong in making known my wishes plainly to you. I wish you to become my wife at once, in a secret, quiet way, and leave school for the new home I shall make for you. Then you can tell your friends of our love, and I can present you to my parents, and I am very sure that you will so win upon them, that they cannot help loving you."

"But, Albert," I replied, wildly grasping his hand, "I cannot be so ungrateful; I cannot prove myself so utterly heartless to the dear ones at home who are sacrificing so much for me. I cannot turn away from them, when they trust me so wholly, and look to me for their future support and happiness. And my poor brother Willie, too!" I added, shuddering.

"But am I not more to you than they are, Florence? And if I share with you the care of them, will it not be better for them, for you, ay, for me, too?"

"I had not thought of this before, and so I bowed my head silently before him."

"Thank you, bless you, Florence!" he exclaimed. "I knew you would decide with me and for me. I leave R—to-morrow, to be absent two days. On the evening of the third, I shall come to you again; and, at that time, will you not go with me? will you not be ready?"

"I cannot tell," I answered, between my tears and sobs. "I dare not go, Albert!"

"Do you not trust me, even as I trust you? I will answer for you, dear Flora," he said, in a low, gentle tone. "You will go, when I shall come for you." And without giving me time to reply, he pressed his lips to mine and walked quickly away.

"Once, twice, three times, on the morning of the next day, did I attempt to write to my grandparents and Willie, and tell them everything; how I was tempted, how my woman's heart had grown great and strong in its first wild love, how I hesitated between them and him who had gained such a power over me. But Albert came before me, with his earnest eyes and pleading face, and I tossed my pen and paper from me, and turned resolutely to my books, dreading, yet longing for the time to come which should bring him to me again."

"The evening appointed by Albert Harland, on which he should come for me, came at last; and with a sad fear for the future in my heart, I waited for him in the large old parlor of the boarding-house. Up stairs, in my little chamber, my trunk sat packed and ready for starting—a plain, wooden trunk, which had once been my mother's. It had been a sad thing for me, the folding of my scanty wardrobe, for each article had a history of its own, and brought back the words and looks of those dear ones whom I had left on just such a lovely June as the one then smiling upon the earth. With all these memories lingering about me, I sat down in the broad window-seat and looked out upon the garden, with its beautiful wealth of roses, and rich fragrance of wide-spreading locust-trees."

"With what a sweeping force came back to me the memory of the last evening that I had spent, at home! Brother Willie and I had looked upon just such a sunset sky from the low windows of our little sitting-room. Just such fleecy, white clouds lay that night in the west; just such a golden mist kissed the green hills and woods, and lay like a blessing upon the flowers and vines that blossomed by the cottage door. How like a living, speaking thing was that memory to me!—speaking out loudly and clearly from the hills and sunset before me. I buried my face in the muslin curtains that fell about me, and wept wildly and bitterly."

"I saw again the brown walls of my olden home; I saw the flowers that looked in at the windows, and the white hearts of the roses that were lifted up to the clear sky. I saw the cherry-tree that stood close by the garden gate, bright and sparkling with early dew; and away, far away, like a wide ribbon, a strip of green meadow land, dotted here and there by little pois of water. I covered my face still closer and thought of the morning on which I left home—how Willie had hobbled down to that same meadow and woven me a wreath of blue and white violets, and how pale and weary he looked when he gave them to me; how his lips quivered, and what a strong effort he made to crowd back the tears that came into his large blue eyes. And then I remembered how he placed a bright, shining half-dollar in my purse; money that he had earned the summer before, selling berries; earned by little bits, a few cents here and a few there, when he was hardly able to go about. I remembered my white-haired grandparents; how they had laid their trembling hands upon my head and told me that I was the light and hope of the little home I left. I thought how patiently they had labored for me through long years; how they were toiling then to give me an education, and waiting anxiously for the time when I could go back to them.

"Good heaven!" I cried, in the agony of the moment. "Can it be that I, for a moment, would have wronged them so? I cannot, will not go!"

"Will not go, Florence?" echoed a low, clear voice at my side; and at the same moment a hand was laid softly upon my head.

"Shall I tell you how he looked to me, Albert Harland, as he stood there in the early twilight, an expression of intense thoughtfulness playing upon his features? How I worshipped the manly form that bent over me, and the fine face that looked so searchingly in mine? I never can forget that moment! I never can forget the almost womanly tenderness that lighted up his eyes, and lay about his handsome mouth.

"Not go with me, Florence, when my very life is bound up in yours—when I would make my sacrifice for the sake of your dear presence—would surmount any obstacle for my great love of you!" he said, bending low his head to catch my answer, till his brown locks touched my forehead.

"I prayed God to give me strength, and he heeded well my prayer.

"Albert Harland," I said, standing up before him, "I shall not go with you; I cannot go. Some time, may be, I can be your wife without blighting the dear loves that have blessed my whole life. Go away from me, now; and though you do not come again for years, you will find Florence Marlow as true to you, as she will ever be to herself. Go, Albert! go!"

"Florence, do I hear aright? have I been deceived in you? Is this your great, unchanging, undying love? God pity you for the wrong you have done me!" he exclaimed, in a tone of bitter irony.

"I did not answer him, only motioned him away from me, without daring to trust myself to bid him adieu. It was as if all my hopes of heaven were going from me, as he turned away, and with one bound I stood beside him. With a quick, sudden impulse, he put his strong arms about me and held me to his heart, and then, without looking at me again, left me as I believed forever!"

The lips of Florence Marlow quivered with emotion, as she ceased speaking. For a moment, she pressed her hand to her forehead; then the calm, sweet expression that always rested upon her features, returned again, and she bent with renewed industry over her needlework.

"But did you never see him, never hear from him again? Didn't he write to you, or you to him, and did he go right straight away, Cousin Flora?"

"He never wrote to me, or I to him, and I have never seen him since. I learned afterwards that he became very dissipated and low, and that he went far away from R—; that is all I know of him."

"And that is the reason you have never married, dear Flora," said Elsie, rubbing her eyes with the corner of her silk apron. "It is too bad, when you are so good—for all the world like a hero, I mean heroine, in a novel—that you should have to suffer so. Of course you went home and stayed with your grandfather and grandmother as long as they lived?"

"Yes, and sent brother Willie to college, and I trust repaid him, in a measure, for the sacrifices he made for me. I never meet him in his bright and beautiful home in P—, or listen to the eloquent discourses that fall from his lips, as he stands in the sacred desk, but what I go back to that evening when we sat and watched the sunset together, and thank God for the shining thread that wove the memories of that picture about my heart."

"But what if Albert Harland should come back now; wouldn't you?"

"Don't talk so, Elsie, please," said Florence, coloring slightly. "I am afraid that the moral of my story will be lost to you, in the anxiety you feel about its ending. Let us go into the kitchen and look at Hannah and the violets."

"O, I had quite forgotten her!" exclaimed Elsie, bounding towards the kitchen, and grasping, as she went, a bunch of lilacs that sat upon the table. "I will carry these to her, to pay for my injustice."

Hannah was busily ironing, with the violets placed in a cup of water upon the window beside her, when the ladies entered the kitchen.

"Do you love these flowers, my good girl?" inquired Florence, in a kind tone.

"Yes, ma'am," answered the girl, looking fondly towards the window. "When my mother died, and I was a little wee bit of a gal, on first coming to Ameriky, my sisters put blue flowers, like these, in her fair hair; and it always makes my heart clarer whin I see them, and think how swate and kind she always was spakin' to me—tellin' me to be good and honest, and to come and find her after she went to heaven."

"How good you are, Florence!" exclaimed Elsie, as she was leaving the room. "Did you see Hannah rub her eyes with her great, red hand? I shall always love that girl; how much poetry there was in her quietly spoken answer!"

Reader, shall I take up the story where Florence Marlow left it? Shall I tell you that but a few months after the conversation above related, a fine-looking, middle-aged gentleman walked up to the front door of Mr. Maitland's dwelling, in C—, and asked for Miss Florence Marlow? And that Miss Marlow met him in the parlor, and grew very white with surprise, as she stood before him, extending her hands to meet his warm, earnest grasp?—and that her voice trembled, as she exclaimed—"Albert Harland? Albert Harland?" Shall I tell you that in the autumn, when the trees were bright and gay in their gala robes, and crimson dahlias and white phlox bordered the walks of Mr. Maitland's garden, there was a quiet wedding in his mansion, and that the bridegroom said in a low, soft voice, after the ceremony was over:

"Though you do not come for years, you will find Florence Marlow as true to you, as she will ever be to herself!"

A SHORT SERMON AND A GOOD ONE.

The Rev. Dr. B— of Philadelphia is noted for brief, sententious sayings in the pulpit and out of it. As he was coming down Chestnut Street the other day, a gentleman asked him:

"Sir, can you tell me how to find the sheriff's office?"

"Yes, sir," was the reply, "every time you earn five dollars spend ten!"

Saying this, the doctor walked on, leaving his questioner gaping upon the sidewalk. He was a stranger who had come to town on business, and asked for information; but the more he pondered the more he was convinced that his unknown informant had answered him wisely.—N. Y. Observer.

A quiet mind, like other blessings, is more easily lost than gained.

MARION MAY.

BY HOWARD PAUL.

O, Marion May, don't you love to look backward,
And think of youth's dearly-loved frolicsome days?
Our hearts were then fresh as the dew on the roses,
Our footsteps as light as the music of fays.
O, don't you remember where often we rambled,
And watched the mill-wheel wildly dashing around.
And how the pure stream brightly flashed in the sunlight,
And flung the cold drops on the blossoming ground?

And, Marion May, you can ne'er have forgotten
The lessons we learned at the old willow-tree,
With sweet summer sounds all around to allure us,
The thrush and the musical hum of the bee;
The hundreds of games at the swing on the hillock—
The sports every morn'neath the wide-spreading vine—
The quarrel I had with you once in the wild wood,
For liking my brother's eyes better than mine.

Dear Marion May, we have known the heart's sorrow,
Since those happy days have flown rapidly past;
We've tossed on the ocean of tumult and trouble,
And found the next morrow as dark as the last.
Yet bright are the hopes that from sorrow we've garnered,
And rich are the joys that our memories store;
Our hearts are still glowing with life's sweetest pleasure.
Tho' childhood's fond days, like its flowers, are no more

A TERRIBLE NIGHT.

BY BERNET HESTER.

"Drive on," I heard my father say, in a quick, sharp voice. The sound awakened me from the state of half unconsciousness into which I had sunk.

The driver, obeying the injunction, applied the whip once more to the poor, jaded horses, and we went on at a little faster rate over the rough road.

"Susan!" I touched my sister's shoulder, and I spoke, for as she had not moved nor spoken for the last ten minutes, I supposed her to be asleep.

"What do you want, Ann?"

"Do you know where we are?"

"Yes, amongst the hills, trying to get over them, or around them, I hardly know which."

It was the first time I had comprehended our situation; overtaken by night and a storm in such a locality.

"Hark! what is that?" said Susan, as a wild mournful cry reached our ears amid the pause that the wind made.

We both listened, as the cry was repeated again and again.

"It must be some human being in distress," said Susan. "Let us speak to father."

A sudden burst of wind and rain complete drowned our voices for that moment; when it subsided, Susan managed to make herself heard by my father, who sat upon the front seat with the driver.

"Pooh, pooh, child! how your imagination runs wild! It was an owl you heard just now."

In a moment more, we heard again my father's voice, through the narrow opening which had been left between our well-protected part of the carriage and the exposed portion in front.

"I say, girls, this is a pretty wind-up to such a glorious wedding! We sha'n't reach home to-night, at this rate. I do wonder where that obstinate fellow, Camden, and his party are at this time!"

In fact I had been wondering the same thing myself, and so I imagined had Susan.

But a day before, we had journeyed with a merry party over these same hills to attend the wedding of a very dear friend of ours; it was a fashion amongst us to attend weddings in this way. This night we were on our homeward way, but by a mere caprice had become separated from the rest of our companions. My father had insisted upon taking us in one direction; Atherton Camden, my brother and the remainder of the young people had chosen the other road. So it happened that we were separated.

"A splendid night for the appearance of your banditti—eh, Susan?" And my father turned round once more to address us in a jesting tone.

The fact was, that everybody liked to banter Susan upon her propensities for discovering robbers, banditti and other heroes of novels in quite commonplace people, and making out of everyday adventures those marvellous to be told.

As my father spoke the last words, the carriage suddenly stopped—so suddenly, that we were jerked back on our seats.

"Some one has hold of the horses," whispered Susan.

"What's the matter now?" I heard my father say to the driver.

"Matter enough! we've lost the way. 'Twould take more than either of us to tell where we are."

"Let the horses take their own course; they'll find the road homewards," said my father.

"Not a bit of it; they're ready to drop down now. I thought I knew the road, for I've travelled hereabouts these ten years; but I'd wager that no one could find the way on such a confounded dark night as this!"

"But what's to be done?" said my father.

"I have it!" said the driver. "I'll go and hunt up a house, if there's one to be found, and you can stay here!"

My father having agreed to the plan, away went our driver through the blinding rain, whilst we remained behind. The only thing to be done, was to wait patiently for help.

After due discussion of our situation, which had assumed rather a serious aspect, we settled into silence, each of us inwardly hoping, yet hardly daring to speak the thought aloud, what had become a matter of great anxiety—that is, that the mission upon which the driver had gone might prove successful.

We were startled by a loud shout, and the appearance of a light in the distance. In a few moments, we heard the welcome news that a house had been discovered, and that the family were making preparations for our reception. Half an hour afterwards, we found ourselves sitting before a blazing fire in the little cottage which our driver had discovered. Our horses, as well as ourselves, had been cared for; so that there seemed nothing to mar our comfort. Yet still one amongst us was sad and silent.

Not even when we had exchanged our wet, cold and shivering condition, to one of comparative comfort—not even when we gathered around the table to partake of the food which our kind hostess prepared for us, did Susan shake off the silence and strangeness of conduct which was so foreign to her nature. She ate but very little, her attention being seemingly distracted by the movements of our hostess, who stepped nimbly about. Several times I observed Susan start and look nervously towards the door, when it was opened. I was perfectly mystified, for my sister was one of the gayest, lightest-hearted people imaginable. Such an adventure as we had met with would not be likely to depress her spirits in this unaccountable way; so that I could only conclude that the weather and the fatigue and anxiety we had undergone had seriously affected her health.

Susan was sitting in a corner of the fireplace, I opposite to her. Suddenly, when the attention of the rest of the party seemed taken off by something that had been said, she leaned over and spoke to me.

"Look, Ann, at the man and woman of the house! What an evil-looking couple! I'm sure they mean some mischief."

I had not thought to look at them before; now I examined them attentively. The host was a burly, athletic man, with shaggy black hair and a keen, dark eye. He was talking with my father, but in the midst of conversation he often turned to look at his wife, who was moving busily about the room. As for our hostess, she was a tall, thin, silent woman, with a somewhat awkward and constrained air about her, which contrasted strangely with her husband's free and easy manner. He had talked constantly since we had entered the house—she had spoken scarcely a dozen words to any one.

All this much I don't think I should have noticed, if Susan had not called my attention to it. But now that my attention had been called to it, I found myself constantly watching the couple; occasionally falling into a state of drowsiness, and as suddenly waking up to resume my watch. Susan, also, as often as she could do so without being observed, turned her gaze upon one or the other of our entertainers—oftenest watching our hostess, whose movements seemed to have for her a sort of fascination.

There was no knowing who these people were, living as they did in this lonely, out-of-the-way place. They might be what they seemed—kind-hearted, simple people; and they might, on the contrary, be the suspicious characters that Susan had supposed. As for me, since Susan had spoken to me, I had become suspicious of every movement on the part of our host and hostess; a thing I should not have dreamed of, otherwise.

Again I sank into a state of drowsiness, in which I did not wholly lose my perception of what was going on. I was awakened by a touch, and Susan pointed silently to our host, who was making some signs to his wife. Presently she lighted a candle and left the room, and then we heard her ascending the stairs. It must have been a quarter of an hour afterwards when our hostess re-entered the apartment and informed us that our rooms were ready, adding that as we had had such a tiresome journey, perhaps we would like to retire early.

My father was the first to take the hint, and rising from his chair, said that we had better retire early, so as to gain as much rest as we could, as we should pursue our journey as soon as possible in the morning. Susan and I hesitated a moment, looked at each other, and then rising, followed my father. We found two unfinished rooms at the top of the house, small in size, but as neat as it was possible for rooms to be. The one was destined for my father, the other for Susan and me.

"Pooh, pooh! what a couple of silly girls, more likely!" was my father's incredulous and laughing exclamation, as we told him of our suspicions. "Go right to sleep, and don't make yourselves ridiculous!" was his last remark, as he closed his room door.

Then we heard him laughing to himself, and repeating, for his own amusement, the story we had told him.

But we were not re-assured even by my father's laughing observations, nor by his sarcastic treatment of our suspicions. We fastened our door as well as we could by piling up all the furniture in the room against it, and then threw ourselves upon the bed with the intention of laying awake and listening attentively for any suspicious movement. But I was so constantly falling into a drowsy state, that Susan proposed that we should take turns in watching—I, to go to sleep first, and to be awakened by her when a sufficient time had elapsed; then I was to take my turn.

Scarcely was the last word regarding our compact spoken, when I, thoroughly exhausted by the day's journey, was sound asleep. I dreamed that a robber had effected an entrance into our room, and that he was endeavoring to obtain my watch, which I had placed beneath my pillow. I was awakened from this dream by a violent shaking, by which means Susan was endeavoring to arouse me. Susan's whisper awakened me much more effectually than the shaking—it brought me to my senses at once.

"What can be the matter?"

In fact, there was a confused noise down stairs, which by no possibility could we account for. Voices and steps as of many people, in the room below us—a rushing to and fro of many feet outside, were amongst the strange sounds that met our ears; strange, because we knew that besides ourselves, there were but four people in the house. But the noise below warranted us in believing that there were at least a dozen people in the cottage. It was stranger still that an uproar should be made at that hour of the night, for we guessed it to be about midnight.

"I don't think I have closed my eyes once this night," said Susan; "and yet this uproar commenced all at once! At least, I have no recollection of any preliminary noise. That convinces me more and more that we should be on the watch. This man has probably some associates, whom he secreted lest we should be suspicious. Now that we have been secured, they are careless about making a noise. But hark!"

There was a louder noise below—a sound as if some one were scuffling, and then a heavy fall. This was followed by a burst of boisterous laughter that sent a shudder through us.

Susan was the first to regain her presence of mind. "Let us call father!" she whispered.

But to do this, it was necessary to take away all the furniture we had piled up against our door, in order to reach the door of our father's room, which opened into the entry. We had before observed that there was no communication between the two rooms except by the entry.

Susan having groped her way to the spot where she had left a few matches, managed to light the lamp which we had brought with us up stairs. I looked at my watch; it wanted but five minutes of twelve. The noise down stairs had been gradually diminishing, but had not entirely ceased. There was no time to be lost in doing what we had to do. As carefully as we could, we removed the tables and chairs and an old chest, by which our door had been barricaded, and then, pausing a few moments to reassure ourselves that our movements had not been detected, we passed together into the entry. A sound of many voices talking in the same loud key, came up from the kitchen, the door of which opened directly from the stairs.

We went cautiously through the entry, for we had brought no light with us, and the least stumbling would draw the attention of those below. The door of my father's room was wide open. Susan made the discovery first, and barely repressed a cry of wonder, for we had distinctly heard the door shut when my father had retired for the night. A moment more, and we stood within the room.

"Father!" whispered Susan.

There was no answer. Again she whispered, louder than before, and still there was no reply. There was not even the sound of breathing, which would tell the presence of some human being. All was as still as the grave.

"They have murdered him!" whispered Susan, steadying herself against the wall for support.

A thrill of mental agony shot through me at these words. It was an hour when even the most commonplace things seem fearfully mysterious, even to a cool and self-possessed person; but to a person with a keen imagination, awakened suddenly from a sound sleep, and in the strange and unaccountable situation in which we were, the silence of a room, in which we expected to find a living being, was awful.

I mustered sufficient resolution to pass into our room and to take the lamp, which we had left burning; by its means, I intended to unravel the mystery. In my nervous haste, however, I managed the lamp awkwardly; the light went out, and left me in total darkness. I did not know where the matches had been left, and it was some time before I could find them. When at length I did find them, and had procured a light, I could have declared that an hour had elapsed since I had returned to my room—so long does time seem when one is anxious.

I found Susan just where I had left her; not an inch had she moved from her first position.

On the appearance of the light, we both instinctively searched the room with our eyes; it was empty. The bed had the appearance of having been slept in, which convinced us that my father had retired to rest as usual the night before. There were various articles belonging to him scattered about the room, but no other sign of him whom we had come to seek. There were but two inferences that we could draw from these circumstances: the one, that my father had been taken prisoner by the people below; the other, which we scarcely dared think of, was that murder had been committed, and that my father was the victim.

I have not the least recollection as to how we regained our room; but we did regain it, and again barricaded our door. Then we sat anxious and trembling to await the approach of morning. The noise down stairs had long ceased, and it appeared to us that nearly an hour had elapsed since we had sat wakeful and listening. Then we heard the door at the bottom of the stairs open softly, and some one ascending slowly and carefully. In the entry outside our door, the persons paused to whisper a few moments; then one passed on and apparently entered the next room, and the other returned to the room below.

During the whispered conversation outside our door, so very near to us that we could almost catch some of the words, my heart almost ceased beating. Susan grasped my hand so tightly and painfully, that a broad, red mark remained upon it for several days. Who or what the occupant of the next room was, we could not even guess; the night had been so full of mysterious circumstances, that nothing could happen more terrible and strange than that which we were already prepared for.

Slowly the long night wore away, and daylight began to appear. There was now a great noise below stairs, a repetition of the same uproar that had disturbed us in the night. In addition to the noise within the house, there were voices and the sound of wheels outside, but upon the other side of the house from where we were. It had cleared off during the night, and the day promised to be a glorious one. After all had become quiet, we determined to go down stairs and find out the precise circumstances of the situation in which we were.

As we entered the kitchen, our hostess was busily engaged in clearing from the table the remains of a breakfast, and re-setting it with tempting viands. She bade us a cheerful good morning, motioned us to a seat by the fire, and then went on with her preparations.

"Good morning, young ladies!" said our host, entering at that moment. "Were you disturbed last night?"

We hardly knew how to answer such a cheerful, good-humored question; but we were saved the trouble by the opening of the door and the entrance of my father. What a load was removed from my mind when I saw him, safe and sound! But there was certainly something mysterious and strange in the events of the past night, that neither Susan nor I could understand.

"Gone!" exclaimed my father, with a surprised accent, looking about the room.

"They went a few moments ago," said our host; "only one stayed behind to go with you."

"One! Ah, that rogue, I suppose! It's all through him I lost a part of my night's sleep."

We certainly had made a mistake; but what it was, I, at least, never imagined.

"If you had got up a little earlier, girls, you might have seen—"

"What?" we both exclaimed, in one breath.

"The rest of our harum-scarum, wrong-headed party. As I expected, they were obliged to take this road, after all; and as luck would have it, they stopped here. I was disturbed by their noise, and went down stairs for a short time; but I was careful not to disturb you. Why, Susan, what an expression of face! You didn't surely think they were robbers?"

Susan muttered something that sounded like "yes;" but she was prevented from saying more by a hearty laugh immediately behind us. There stood Atherton Camden, with a mischievous expression on his face!

"Ah, Susan, what a terrible night it must have been for you! I can imagine your horror when you heard the whispered conversation between your father and me at the head of the stairs."

My father now joined in the hearty laugh which was raised against us, and little by little we were induced to relate our night's experience.

"Ah, girls," said my father, "we all gain wisdom by age! Even my little Ann will, in time."

Strange to say, we parted from our host and hostess with regrets that morning. No one could have been kinder to us than they had been, and yet we had treated them unjustly in our thoughts. It is needless to say that there was no end to the hints and innuendoes that Susan was obliged to receive that morning, and long after that. Nor did her persecution cease even when she had married Atherton Camden, for he never ceased to remind her of that night amongst the robbers. It was really the most anxious and terrible one that I ever spent.

A QUEER CUSTOMER.

At one of our seaport custom houses lately, a mild, inoffensive-looking individual, standing about five feet six in his boots, and weighing one hundred and fifty pounds, presented himself in the surveyor's department, and addressed Uncle Sam's official as follows:

"I've got a schooner."

"Well."

"I've got a schooner."

"Well; what are you going to do with her?"

"O, I dun'now!—go digging round somewhere, to see ef I can't pick up a little change. Hard times."

"Well, sir, what did you come here for?"

"I don't know; that's what I want you to tell me."

"What have you been doing to your vessel?"

"Wal, squire, I think I've improved her."

"How?"

"I've lengthened her out about eight feet."

"Then she'll have to be re-measured."

"I thought so. Want to change her name, tew, and give her a handsomer one."

"Then you'll have to write for permission to the Secretary of the Treasury."

"Then I wont change her name."

"Well; she must be re-measured."

"Do you want I should fetch her up here to be re-measured? That would be rather inconvenient."

"No, I'll send down. Where does she lie?"

"I don't know."

"You don't know?"

"She did lay at — wharf, half an hour ago. I don't know what's happened to her sence."

"Well, I'll send down there."

"Will you send down this blessed day of Anno Domini, 1857?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because it's three o'clock."

"It'll be six o'clock before a great while."

"Office closes at three. Is the name on the stern?"

"No. I painted it out."

"The name must be on before your vessel can be measured."

"There's nothin' to hender a feller chalking the name on the stern?"

"Yes, there is. The law says every vessel must have her name in white letters on a black ground."

"Wal, she's painted black, and chalk's white."

"That wont do. The letters must be painted permanently."

"W. I; I'll fix it."

"What's the name?"

"The Dumplin, squire; but I did want to call her the Eliza, and then I wouldn't hev to be cruisin' after a sweetheart."

With this mysterious remark, the shipper vanished, leaving the official in doubt as to his being an inhabitant of this terrestrial sphere, and strongly suspecting that his craft was a myth, like Vanderdecken's Flying Dutchman.

A fear is an oath in the sight of Heaven to repent and reform.

SONG—ILFRAVERNE.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Eyes are beaming here to-night,
 Bright as sunbeams from the skies,
 With a merry, laughing light—
 Blue, and black, and hazel eyes;
 But I turn
 From the brilliant chandelier,
 From the festive mirth and cheer,
 To the lonely one and drear,
 Ilfraverne!

Ever calm and patient thou,
 Ever lonely, ever sad;
 Sorrow shadoweth thy brow,
 Naught hath power to make thee glad;
 I discern
 Deep within those mournful eyes
 All the sorrow there that lies,
 While I gaze with sad surmise,
 Ilfraverne!

Ah! thou look'st so mournfully
 On this uncongenial throng,
 Still so sadly, vacantly,
 Doth thy hopeless glance prolong,
 That I turn;
 But my heart must hold that glance,
 Sombre fancies round me prance,
 And I cannot join the dance,
 Ilfraverne!

MARY'S HUSBAND.

BY SUSAN HOLMES BLAISDELL.

In the little ancient church, standing like a solitary beacon, on a hillside overlooking the sea, one calm Sabbath, late in October, my brother and Mary Fuller were married.

The grass was crisp and brown, on the hills; the many colored leaves were scattered all over it, and lay, here and there, where some late breeze had left them, in curled and withered heaps, shining with flame-like hues of scarlet and gold. The trees were nearly bare, and the little foliage left them seemed ready, with the first breath of air, to fall. But the morning air was clear, the sunshine warm, and bright, and genial; and Nature wore a rare, serene, mellow loveliness, that quiet October day.

The church-bell had a tone more solemn and sweet than usual, that morning, or so it seemed to me, as it came floating onward, borne through the golden air from the hillside. It had never sounded so to me before. But the occasion was a solemn one; and it seemed to become the more so, surrounded with all the sober quietness of the waning year.

So they were married, my brother, Captain John Harrington and Mary Fuller. I knew then, as I know now, that he looked very handsome, and noble, and manly, though rather graver than his wont, as was always his way when inwardly agitated; and that Mary looked very pretty in her simple and innocent beauty, though she, too, trembled, and the rose on her cheek kept wavering; but I did not mind these things so much then. I only felt how full my heart was, and how entirely it was with them—my brother and his new-made wife.

We then walked quietly home from church together, across the hillside. The dry leaves rustled crisply under our feet as we went—the faded leaves that had been so fresh and green in the spring-time—the dead leaves of the dying year. We were treading over buried hopes, O, how many! But I looked at John and Mary. I do not think they thought of the dead leaves, unless it was to think how beautiful they looked, with the October sunshine gilding them. Their own young happiness colored everything with brightness.

And so Mary reached her new home, the old house wherein John and I had lived so long, alone. As we crossed the threshold, and stood in the old-fashioned parlor, John took her tenderly in his arms and kissed her. And then I took her to my own heart—John's young wife, loving and welcoming her with all my heart.

There was something more cheerful about the old house, after Mary came into it. It had always been very quiet, even sombre at times, perhaps; for John made long voyages, and when he came home from sea, stayed but a little time, and went away again, so that I was nearly always alone; the only living creatures about the place, besides myself, being my handmaiden Hannah, and the old house-cat. Day by day, for many a long year back, I had watched the silent sunshine creeping across the carpet, from side to side, as I sat in the lonely, old-fashioned parlor, and listened to the monotonous tick of the tall Dutch clock in the corner, till the sunshine rounded to the west, and the room began to fill with shadows, and the tick of the clock sounded deep and strange in the gathering twilight. There was the picture of a ship on the upper part of its face, a ship that moved restlessly always, keeping time with the heavy pendulum, on the blue waves beneath; and I looked at it, as night gathered down, and I sat there alone, till I could see it through the darkness no longer, thinking of John. And night after night, when I was wakeful, I listened to the roll and roar of the sea, outside the bar; and sometimes—often in autumn and winter nights—to the wild blowing of the wind that rushed madly past, rattling the casement, and shaking the bed beneath me. Always alone.

Always alone. But there came a change when John's wife came. I was no longer the lonely creature I had been. Something was added to my passive, quiet, dreamy existence. It was made brighter. I lived no longer within myself, merely, I had her to think of and for.

It was the twenty-fifth of October when they were married—John and Mary. Their wedded life had a quiet commencement. There was no parade, no commotion. The few relatives we knew were scattered far and wide, and we had only our three selves. So it was with little ceremony, that John's wife entered her home, as its mistress. She blushed and smiled with pretty shyness when I gave her the name; but she shook her head and would not take it. She said she could do nothing without my guidance; I was the older and wiser, and I had been mistress there, of right, from my birth. She crept into my arms and entreated me to take the care of all there, still; and of her also. She would not take the keys, they did not belong to her she said, and she made me submit. She would have made me retain my seat at the head of the table, even; but this was not a matter of question. For the rest, I had settled with myself to yield until she should have become accustomed to a knowledge of my duties, so as to assume them with more ease herself; but when we went to dinner, I led her with my own hand to her place, and smiling at her blushing remonstrance, took my own at her left hand. And so it was that our new way of life commenced.

A few happy, sunshiny days went by, and very beautiful they seemed to us three. Each one seemed like a holiday to me, with the unaccustomed cheerfulness and life reigning throughout the household; with the blessed rarity of John's presence; with the sight of John's face, and the sound of his pleasant voice, making sunshine and music in and about the quiet house, from morning till night; equally with her presence, the presence of the timidly happy, gentle, loving little wife and sister. She was a dear child, and dearly I loved her, as much for her own sake, as for his. For she seemed, indeed, almost a child to me. She was only eighteen; a slender, girlish thing; and I was ten years her senior, a calm and thoughtful woman, in heart, perhaps, even older than my years.

And tenderly did John love her—her husband. It was beautiful to see the shadowy sweetness of his eyes, as they rested on her; to hear the depths of gentleness in his tones when he spoke to her, or of her; to mark the earnest affection of this manner towards her. A tenderer, more affectionate brother, I believe no sister ever knew; but there were recesses in his heart, whose wealth I had never known; and in his devotion to his wife, I recognized a new and beautiful trait in my brother's character. I learned to love them both more deeply, to revere him as I never had before.

Those few bright days went by very quickly, as all bright days ever do. John had been nearly two months home since his last voyage; and now his vessel was ready to sail again. It was early in November, not more than two weeks after his marriage, when he spoke first of the time approaching for him to commence another voyage. It was hard for him to broach the matter. He tried to do it calmly, but his brief and hurried manner showed the effort, and he could not look at Mary.

I had been prepared for this announcement for some time; but it was not the less unwelcome when it came at last. My work fell from my hands: I looked up at him; he paced the floor with his eyes averted; and then I turned to Mary. His words had been enough to drive the color from her cheek. The startled, troubled look with which she regarded him, the distressed expression of one suddenly aroused from happiness to sorrow, from security to danger, caused me, in my own regret, to pity her even more than myself.

"O, John!" she said, suddenly, breaking the troubled silence, "I forgot that you must go away so soon." And she covered her face with her hands, with the sudden tears breaking forth beneath them.

He went and sat down beside her. He put his arm about her, and drew her close to him, bending his face down to hers.

"Mary," he answered, and his kind voice, in its dear, gentle tones, was very low and trembled slightly, "Mary, you are a sailor's wife, you must be prepared for these things."

I put down my work and went out silently, leaving them there together. I, who had known so many of these partings, could bear my grief alone; and who could comfort her so well as he?

I know Mary wept a great deal that day; but when I met her again she was calmer, and I could see, more resigned to his departure. Yet we could not bring ourselves to speak together about it then. We could not talk of anything very freely. Whatever remarks were made, related to the most indifferent subjects. The next day, also, passed without any allusion to it; Mary sewed silently with me in the parlor, while John read to us aloud. At evening, a little apart from her, I gained courage to ask the question that had been trembling on my lips all day.

"John," I said, "when are you going?"

"Next week, Lucy—next week Thursday."

"Next week! Does Mary know the time, John?"

"Yes." And his countenance wore a shadow of trouble and pain.

She heard us talking, and looked wistfully towards us. She seemed to know what we must be speaking of, for she turned away directly, with the quick tears in her eyes, and when I went up to her, she put her arms about my neck, and hid her face on my shoulder, giving way now, unrestrainedly to her grief. But it was the last time. She went away by herself a little after that, and when she came back, her gentle face looked calm and serious.

"John," she said, going up to him, "I am not going to cry any more. I am going to dry up the last tear. I will be cheerful, and think of the time when you will come back."

He caught her in his arms with a passionate blessing, and kissed her tenderly. The tears came into my eyes afresh; I thought her feelings would overcome her again; that she would give way now, despite her resolution. But she was braver than I thought. She kept down, with woman's firmness, the emotion that seemed struggling to rise and overflow; and with a wife's gentle courage and true love—unselfish love, shining alone in her blue eyes, she returned his kiss, with one warm, earnest and affectionate.

Then she turned to me. "Come, Lucy," she said, putting her arm about me, "I must learn of you. You shame my weakness. I must not be found less worthy than you, who put aside your own sorrows so bravely, for the sake of others."

And she shed no more tears. From that time till his departure, she was calmly, quietly cheerful, giving herself no time for idle sorrow, but devoting her whole attention to him, and her help to me, in aiding me to make the necessary preparations for his voyage, which I had hitherto on like occasions, made alone.

And the following week he sailed. Mary was true to herself to the last; and though her sweet voice trembled, as she bade him good-by, at the door of the stage which was to take him up to town, she kissed him without a tear, and bade him godspeed on his voyage. I know her generous courage affected him as deeply as her grief could have done. It increased his love for her.

"Heaven bless you, my darling!" he murmured, embracing her. Then hastily turning, to hide his emotion, he gathered me fondly to his breast, pressed his lips to my cheek, and releasing me, unable to speak, sprang into the stage. The door closed after him, the crack of the driver's whip sounded, and the heavy vehicle rolled lumberingly away. We stood looking after it, till it disappeared beyond the distant hillside. Then we threw our arms about each other. The tears that had been so long repressed; flowed fast on both sides now, but quietly, and we did not try to keep them back. He was not with us now, to have his courage shaken by them, and we each knew what the other felt. There was no need for us to repress them then, so we gave way for a little while to our tears, and then, with calmer and brighter feelings, went arm-in-arm up the garden-path and into the house, where we sat down by the parlor-fire together. The dusk was slowly drawing down, and filling the corners and far-away nooks of the great room with shadows. Deeper and deeper it grew, and brighter leaped the flames upon the hearth. Silently Hannah stole in and closed the shutters and let down the curtains, and went as silently out again. And there, in the glow of the red firelight, we sat side-by-side, the long November evening; and no sound was in the room but the crackling of the fire, and the deep ticking of the great clock in the corner. He was to be gone a year.

Once more, as in the past, so many times, a dreamy quiet settled down about the old house. The ancient silence had fallen there, when the last echo of the beloved footstep had died away from its threshold; the silence that seemed now waiting only for the sound of that footstep to break it, in a far, far-off day. But there were two now, instead of one, who sat together in the old parlor day after day, counting each, and recording its passage in her heart, as it slipped away in the golden solitude around her. Two now, who saw from morning till night, the lazy sunshine creep across the floor; two now, who listened to the monotonous tick of the old clock in the corner, and marked by its dull pace the slow hours that made up another day of those she was numbering. Two now, who in the gathering dusk, watched together the ever-moving ship on its broad face, tossing restlessly to and fro, and thought of John. And when the light was gone, and shutters and curtains closed, when the fire was replenished on the wide hearth, and the lamps brought in, we read aloud one to the other of us, that we might not seem so lonely; or resumed the sewing which generally occupied our leisure hours, and talked together as we worked.

She was invariably quiet, generally thoughtful; but I never saw her low-spirited. While we sat there together in the daytime, we were often silent for hours together, busied with our own thoughts; and I knew she was thinking of him. But I never called her from her reflections into conversation, that I did not find her calmly cheerful. She was true to the promise she had made John. She would not allow herself to idly lament his absence, but looked upon it as a reasonable necessity, and dwelt hopefully upon the time of his return. But it was only by a brave struggle that she had conquered the inclination to yield to her emotions, and I honored her for the effort and the victory.

We slept together; she had shared my couch with me ever since John's departure, and, lying awake myself, every night, for hours after retiring, I knew how sleepless she was also. She hardly ever slept until after midnight, and when there came a tempestuous night, she found no rest; the morning's earliest gray found her still waking. The first storm that came, after his departure, was about three weeks from that time; for we had an unusually mild and pleasant month for November that year. We did not retire at so early an hour as usual, for neither of us felt disposed to rest, and when we went to our chamber at last, I, wakeful as was natural to me, felt that she participated in my vigil most painfully. I felt her move restlessly once, but that was all. I suppose she thought me asleep, and feared to disturb me, for though awake, excited and uneasy, she kept quite still.

We always kept a lamp burning at night. Turning towards her at last, unable longer to refrain from offering my sympathy, I saw, by its light, that there was a feverish color in her cheeks, and her sleepless eyes were bright with excitement. She put her hand on mine.

"I am glad you are awake, Lucy—I can't sleep. Hear how dreadfully the wind blows. Listen!"

It came tearing with fearful violence past the house, with a tempestuous fury that was terrible; driving hail and snow against the shutters, till the casements rattled again, shaking the house to its very foundations, as it had come an hundred times before, when I lay there alone, listening to it fearfully, as she listened now. She shuddered.

"Lucy, it freezes my very blood! I cannot lie here listening to it. I must get up."

And she sat up in the bed, with a heavy, deep-drawn, laboring breath, as of one suffering from some terrible nightmare.

"It is very terrible, Mary," I said, "but it may be that he is as safe as we are."

"I know it—I know it, Lucy," she answered, "but I cannot rest. I am almost suffocating with terror lying there. I feel feverish, and yet the thundering of the waves, the violence of the wind, strike a chill through me."

I also had risen, and now with difficulty persuaded her from leaving the couch. She wanted to walk the floor, in the chill air, to calm her restlessness. I held her gently but firmly back.

"Mary, you will get your death of cold," I said.

She did not try to resist me, but sat quite still, and we were both silent for awhile, listening to the thundering of the surf, breaking madly upon the rocks; to the wild winds raving without, and rushing loudly and stormily past our windows. Midnight struck; and now there came a gradual lull in the tempest. Another hour passed; the roaring of the waves had sunk to a sullen murmur, the winds grew hushed, the night quiet.

"Now you will sleep, Mary?" I said, putting my arm about her.

A long and heavily-drawn sigh escaped her, as she laid her head on my shoulder.

"Yes, now, Lucy, I could not before. I know Providence watches over him as over us; but I must wake with him through the storm."

And she lay down and slept; and in her slumber, one or two large tears stole through her closed eyelids, and glittered brightly on her cheek. But I lay awake still, watching over her slumbers, and thinking of John. It was not till daybreak that I shared in her happy oblivion.

We had only a few of those terrible storms, during that fall and winter; and I was inexpressibly thankful. I know she suffered unspeakably while they lasted, though after the first one, she bore their terrors more collectedly. Those were the only occasions on which she betrayed her anxiety for him. At all other times she was calm, and quietly cheerful, and not a day passed that she did not speak with earnest anticipation of his return. Alas, poor Mary! it was far enough off.

November, December, January. These three months passed with their customary festivities throughout the village. The minister and his wife spent with us the evenings of Christmas and New Year's and not a villager passed our door but stopped to shake hands with us, and wish us happiness, and many pleasant returns of the day; for all remembered, in their joy, Captain Harrington's wife and sister. They all loved John, as much as they respected him.

February set in, and now we began to look for a letter. Not that there was more probability of receiving one now, than had been all along; but we had schooled ourselves, hitherto, to wait with patience, and not expect one too earnestly, that we might not be disappointed. So far, its non-arrival had not disappointed us, then; but now we had waited so long, that we could not call our rising anxiety unreasonable. But we were destined to receive news of John in a far different manner from that we had expected.

One afternoon, just before dark, I had an errand to perform, which would take me quite to the other end of the village. Mary had been suffering from a headache that day, and I left her sitting by the parlor fire, in an easy-chair. As I went through the village, I passed more than one group of men talking earnestly together; but the circumstance hardly attracted my attention then. I hastened to perform my errand, which was to carry some medicine to a poor woman who was ill, and who lived alone with her daughter. The daughter was absent. I sat a few moments with the sick woman, and then arose to go. I was about to open the door, bidding her good-by, when it was hastily flung open from without, and the daughter hurriedly entered the room.

"O, mother!" she began; and then, seeing me, she paused abruptly and stood quite still, looking earnestly and fixedly at me for a moment.

"Good evening, Martha!" said I, smiling.

She dropped her eyes, and saying, in a low voice, "Good evening, ma'am," went by me silently into the room, where she stood by the fire, with her bonnet still on, never moving to look at me again or speak.

"Are you well this evening, Martha?" I asked her, lingering a moment, somewhat perplexed.

She looked up now. "Quite well, I thank you, ma'am," was her answer. And again she looked, with a singular, wistful, earnest expression that I could not understand, towards me.

I thought of that look, as I entered the village—wondering what it meant. I knew soon enough. There were more people talking together now in the village street, than when I had come from home. Groups were standing here and there, in close and earnest conversation. They would touch each other and whisper, and then become silent, as they saw me coming—looking stealthily at me. Those whom I knew—and I knew nearly all of them—would bid me "good evening," as I passed; but it was in a strange way—a half-constrained, grave, troubled way, that puzzled me. Once, looking round, I saw several persons looking after me.

"What does it mean?" I said, mentally. "If I had met with some misfortune, I could not interest them more. How sadly they regard me!" I thought then of the strange manner of the sick woman's daughter. A thrill of undefined terror ran through me. "What does it mean?" I repeated, with sudden alarm.

I passed the parsonage gate, not far distant from my own home. Good Dr. Gray was just coming out. He, too, wore a melancholy air, and was perceptibly agitated at seeing me.

"Dr. Gray," I hastily ejaculated, "in the name of pity, tell me! What is it they are all talking of in the village?"

"Some news they have heard from B—," he answered, after a moment's hesitation; and then added: "I was just coming up to see you, Miss Harrington. Perhaps it is better that we have met. Will you—walk in, a few moments?"

His voice was slightly husky; he hesitated in speaking.

"Thank you, I cannot stop!" I answered, hurriedly. Then I laid my hand on his arm. "Doctor—you were coming to see me; you are very good. But what"—I could hardly utter the words—"what makes you look so sad? What has happened?"

"Lucy," he said, "I have something to tell you."

"Something to tell me? You have news? From whom?—from John?"

"Yes, Lucy." He spoke in a voice of infinite sorrow and pity.

"News from John, Dr. Gray? And you look so grave! Tell me! is it bad news, sir?"

I shivered; I was icy cold, from head to foot, as I asked the question. And yet I asked it with such strange, such terrible calmness!

I cannot tell, in so many words, the questions and answers that passed after that. I only knew that I learned this: That the "Lucy Harrington," when within two days' sail of Rio Janeiro, had encountered a storm, by which she barely escaped total wreck, and during which, the captain had been washed overboard and drowned. I just remember catching the sense of all this, and listening to the words as one petrified—bereft of life itself. I can remember that I was very, very cold.

And I can remember, too, a white figure that came flying over the hillside, with a wild shriek, towards me—Mary, John's wife—crying wildly, "Lucy! Lucy! John is dead!" And then her white, ghostlike face faded from before my vision, and I knew nothing more.

There was a long, long blank in my existence, before I recognized next those about me. I woke, as from a dreamless slumber, at twilight.

The curtains of my chamber were drawn partly aside ; but the sun had evidently set some time since, and the dusk of evening was settling down, and the shadows stealing into the corners of the room were broken, and moved restlessly about, as the flames on the hearth leaped up the wide chimney. The glow of the cheerful fire-light was shed, with increasing brightness, throughout the apartment, as the twilight deepened—resting brightest on the slight, white-robed figure sitting by my bedside, in the large easy-chair, with her head leaning upon her hand, and her large, sad eyes fixed on the flame. It was Mary. Yes, Mary ; who had herself nursed me through my illness, waiting on me day and night ; who had struggled with her own terrible sorrow, that she might serve me.

We seemed to have changed places. I, who had always been so strong, so enduring, so formed to bear misfortune ; and she, a slight, frail, delicate thing, whom all had looked to see crushed by the heavy blow that had fallen upon us ! But, in her hour of darkness, the beauty and holiness of Mary's character had shone forth in their loveliest light. In the furnace of affliction she had been tried and purified.

Very suddenly the terrible news of John's death had come to her. It was even while I was returning, that evening, from the village, that some incautious person had visited her, and told her the frightful story ; and then it was that she, half-maddened by her grief, had fled to meet me.

But while the oak had been riven and rent by the storm, the slender reed had bowed to its force, and risen again after its first fury was spent. The greater part of that fearful night she had passed in unconsciousness ; but she recovered from it, and the knowledge of my insensible situation nerved her to strength. She rose, patiently, from her own sorrow, to watch with me in mine.

To look at her now, you saw how terrible had been the struggle. She was the mere shadow of her old self. Her face was perfectly colorless ; and O, how thin ! Dark shadows encircled her large blue eyes, so pensive, so sadly beautiful now ! The soft auburn hair, no longer woven in shining braids, was put straight back from her delicate, blue-veined brow. The pale hand, which supported her head, was wasted almost to transparency, and the wedding ring, that his hand had placed there, had grown a world too large.

This was as I saw her, on waking from the long, long lethargy that had bound me. She turned and saw me looking at her. A soft glow of pleasure illumined her face. She bowed her head for a moment on her clasped hands, her lips moved as in silent thanksgiving, and then, as I held my arms feebly towards her, she came and knelt down beside me, clasping me silently.

There was news from the "Lucy Harrington." Mr. Harding, the first-mate, wrote to say that the business of the voyage was nearly completed, and that the vessel would come to port probably by the last of September—two months earlier than had been expected. He it was who had written to Dr. Gray the news of John's death, asking him to communicate it to us. He wrote now to me a few words of simple, sincere, and earnest condolence, that brought the tears to my eyes afresh.

The "Lucy Harrington" homeward bound—and without her master ! I could not think of it, and be calm, or resigned. It seemed too hard—too cruel ! I felt how sinful it was for me to murmur so ; I felt that I was rebelling against the will of Providence, but I could not conquer my grief, or still my murmuring.

No murmur escaped Mary's lips. And though, night and day, she never ceased to think of her lost husband ; though the slightest mention of him seemed to open afresh the wounds in her heart, her sorrow was locked in her own breast. She prayed for resignation, and leaned upon an arm stronger than that of mortal love. She was a meek, gentle, patient woman. It was sweet, yet sorrowful, to see her going about in her widow's weeds, young and beautiful, and heavily-stricken as she was ; going about among the poor and sick in the village, relieving their necessities, and lightening their infirmities. She took more pleasure in these things now, than ever before. She, who had known such deep sorrow herself, seemed to find her greatest comfort now in sharing that of others. They called her an angel ; and she was one.

It was not until sometime after I recovered from the long illness I had suffered, that I saw the letter Mr. Harding had written Dr. Gray. Mary had already seen it. I wonder it had not broken her heart. The writer gave as concise an account of the fatal accident as might well be, sparing the details as far as possible. And yet my heart fainted within me, as I read it. How that terrible storm had overtaken them, threatening them with instantaneous destruction ; how they had labored, in the tempest and the darkness, to save the vessel ; how wave after wave overwhelmed them, till that terrible one which swept him away—into the ocean, at midnight ! And they were powerless to save him. All their lives, offered at that moment, in exchange, could not have ransomed his. The storm lulled—the vessel reached her port—but he was gone !

I put the letter away, with anguish filling my very heart. The "Lucy Harrington" was homeward bound now; but O, how could I ever look on her again!

The summer went by, fall set in, and she arrived safely on the twenty-ninth of September. Mr. Harding called on us. The interview was a brief one. We could not find firmness enough, on either side, to speak steadily of our loss. The chief business of his errand, which was to render up all necessary accounts relating to my brother's affairs, was discussed as shortly as might be.

The cargo of the "Lucy Harrington" had been disposed of, the men paid off and dismissed, and the proceeds of the voyage deposited with Captain Harrington's bankers. The vessel herself Mr. Harding expressed a desire to purchase, if she was to be sold. To part with her, seemed both to Mary and myself like the breaking of a new tie. Neither could speak to answer him, at first. And yet, what else was to be done? It was as well that she should go—and it must be to none other than Mr. Harding, who had been so faithful to John and to us, and served our interests so well. But it was hard to think of it now; and he would not press the matter. Nevertheless it was arranged, by our mutual wishes, that he should make his next trip in her; and shortly, she commenced getting ready for sea again.

October came, and passed; October, with its balmy airs, its golden atmosphere, its quiet, dreamy, mellow days, slipping silently away, in the hazy, sleepy sunshine; October—the wedding-month of John and Mary. One year ago, the twenty-fifth of this month, they were married; one year ago, Mary was a bright and happy bride. And now—I looked at her, sitting by the parlor fire, on the evening of that mournful anniversary. How changed she was!

Captain Harding came down early in November, and called on us one evening. The "Lucy Harrington" was nearly ready for sea. He calculated on sailing by the twentieth. His manner was subdued, serious, almost grave. Just on the eve of leaving port, as he was, we were all but too painfully reminded of the last time that vessel had sailed.

Each felt what the thoughts of the other were, but neither named them. Mr. Harding never once alluded to John, in Mary's presence; but he said to me, as he bade me "good night" at the hall door:

"The 'Lucy' is a staunch little craft, Miss Harrington. It is a pleasure to command her; but I would give all I am worth, at this moment, to see him standing on her deck again!"—His voice was tremulous and husky. He wrung my hand silently, and was gone. I could not go in to Mary, then. My heart was full—full to overflowing, as it echoed his parting words. With the tears raining hot and fast over my cheeks, I shut the hall door and went up stairs to my room; and there I knelt down by the bed, and wept as I had never wept since John's death.

A step sounded in the room, I looked up. It was Mary, standing just within the door, her eyes fixed on me with an unspeakably mournful expression, and the heavy tears flowing from them, while her face was very, very pale.

"O, Lucy! Lucy!" she uttered, in a voice of suppressed anguish. And kneeling by my side, she threw her arms about me, and yielded unresistingly to the emotions so long hidden in her own breast.

I do not think she slept an hour that night, any more than myself. Not till the break of dawn did either of us sink to slumber. It was quite late when I awoke next. The sun was at least two hours high. Mary was sleeping, with the spent tears still glittering on her pale cheeks. I arose silently, and dressing, without disturbing her, draped the curtains more closely about the windows, that the light might not wake her, and stole from the room, closing the door behind me.

Breakfast was waiting, when I went down stairs, and Hannah sat knitting in the kitchen. It was past eight—an unusually late hour for me to rise; but she said nothing about it, as she bade me "good morning." She knew why, I guessed; her low voice and sad look told me that she, too, had been thinking of our loss. I did not care for breakfast, but I felt languid and unrefreshed; and taking a single cup of coffee, stood by the fire and drank it. Another hour passed, and a visit to Mary told me that she still slept.

I had gone down stairs, and was dusting the furniture in the parlor, when the sound of the knocker at the hall door attracted my attention. I heard Hannah go through the hall and open the door, and then the tones of a gentleman's voice, speaking with her, were just audible; a strange voice, light, sweet and musical. I was thinking who it could be, when Hannah ushered him directly into the room, and merely saying "a gentleman, ma'am, to see you," she vanished.

He stood there, just within the entrance—a gentleman of some thirty years, tall and slight, yet broad-shouldered and broad-chested, of fair complexion, with a fine, frank, manly face, light, curling hair, and large blue eyes. I had, plainly, never seen him before. I put down my brush and came forward, with a slight inclination of the head.

He too advanced, hat in hand, saying, with a bow, and at the same time with a quick but scrutinizing look :

"This is Miss Harrington, I believe—Miss Lucy Harrington?"

"That is my name, sir." I drew forward a chair. "Will you be seated?"

He sat down, and I followed his example.

"You will, I trust," were his opening words, "excuse me for introducing myself thus uncere- moniously. My name is Francis Rochefort. I have come to make some inquiries"—here he slightly hesitated—"concerning a circumstance, of a melancholy nature, which occurred but a few months since, and for information relating to which, I can apply only to you. It concerned—a very dear member of your own family."

I answered, as calmly as I could :

"You refer to my brother's death?"

He bowed, without raising his eyes to my face.

"You will pardon me for touching on this subject, painful as it must be. Will you permit me to ask a few questions relating to it?"

I bent my head—I could not speak.

A moment of silence ensued, during which Mr. Rochefort's eyes were fixed on the carpet, and he played mechanically with a black ribbon that crossed his breast. Then, without raising his eyes, he said, gently :

"Can you tell me the exact date of that occurrence?"

I told him.

"It was," he rejoined, "during a heavy storm, at midnight?"

"It was."

"The 'Lucy Harrington' was at that time, I think, within two days' sail of her destined port?"

I replied in the affirmative; but these ques- tions were beginning to harass me cruelly. It seemed like tearing open afresh a scarce-healed wound. I felt the hot tears filling my eyes. Why must he go over all this? He looked up. A shadow of intense pain crossed his face.

"Miss Harrington, you think me unnecessarily minute. Believe me, that I make these inquiries with reluctance. But the purpose I have in view, requires that I should enter upon the sub- ject in detail. I have but one more question to ask. Are you certain that Captain Harrington was drowned, that night?"

This question startled me. I looked at him dumbly. I had no words to answer. Was I

"certain?" I never had for one moment thought to ask myself before.

"Are you certain, Miss Harrington?" he re- peated, emphatically. "You were not there."

"O, sir! is it possible that there can be an un- certainty?" I ejaculated, rising hastily from my chair, excited and trembling. But I sank back, unable to stand.

He moved to my side, laying his hand, with gentle warning, on my arm.

"Calm yourself, I entreat, Miss Harrington. I do not wish to present this too suddenly to you. But I believe there is a possibility. Be strong, for your own sake and that of his wife, while I tell you why I think that you have no certainty in the belief you have entertained."

He regarded me earnestly, for a moment, be- fore he spoke again. I made a strong effort of control. He saw it, and went on, carefully :

"I have been very particular in ascertaining the exact date of his supposed death, because, during the storm, which occurred on that night, the English ship 'Flying Arrow,' bound from Rio Janeiro to Liverpool, picked up, near morn- ing, a man who had evidently been lost from some passing vessel, and who had saved himself by clinging to some floating object which had fortunately been in his way. He had, to all ap- pearance, been in the water for some hours, and when found, was in a state of utter exhaustion. He became insensible immediately on being picked up; and though we eventually saved him, it was only for him to encounter a pro- tracted and almost fatal illness. We took him to England, where he happily recovered."

"We!" I echoed. "Then you saw him— you know his name! Tell me—you know! if it was not my brother, why tell me this?"

I trembled, from head to foot. Mr. Rochefort looked at me—his color flushed and faded alter- nately—he was silent.

"Tell me—in mercy tell me!" I repeated, "See—I am calm—I can bear it."

"Miss Harrington, he has come back to America with me. He is near—shall I show him to you?"

I knew, by the tremulousness of his voice—I felt, the truth! I rose from my seat.

"John!" I articulated.

The door was flung open. I saw who stood without! I saw the face of the living! the face of my brother John. He sprang towards me.

"Lucy! my darling, darling sister!"

There was a step on the staircase—Mary's foot upon the threshold. She beheld us all, ut- tered one faint, thrilling cry, and then was clasped, fainting, to her husband's heart.

MY YOUTHFUL BRIDE.

BY HARRIET N. HAVENS.

I won her when a laughing girl,
When life was bright and fair,
Her dancing eye undimmed by tears,
Her brow unmarked by care.
And well I vowed to cherish her,
To guard from every ill,
To keep unchanged her bright, glad smile,
Her life with joy to fill.

A year passed by—her smile had fled,
Her ringing laugh was hushed;
Her trembling lip and tearful eye
Told of a spirit crushed.
Her eye's deep, pleading earnestness Sought mine in anguished prayer,
And from the wine cup's maddening draught
Besought me to beware.

Another year—and O the change!
A shrouded marble form
Reposed in dreamless slumber, where
No grief nor care might come.
I wept not; blessed, welcome tears
Came net to my relief;
The stunning weight had crushed my heart—
Dried were the founts of grief.

Long years have fled—a saddened heart
It hath been mine to know,
Mid songs of mirth and music's swell,
Mid scenes of joy or woe.
But the tempter's charms have ceased to lure,
His power I may not dare,
For a pale, still face guards well the cup,
And whispers low—"Beware!"

THE CHANNEL OF ICE.

BY J. GRAFTON ALLEN.

UPON the shores of St. Andrew's Bay stood a large and stately mansion, where a gay company were assembled. The bay, whose waters were usually subject to stormy tides and currents, was now frozen over, for the power of an unprecedentedly cold winter had proved superior even to that of the rushing water. So the vast sheet of ice now spread away before the house for many a mile, until the view was terminated by the encircling shores.

The gay company was assembled, but there was yet wanting one for whose arrival they impatiently waited. She had promised to be there early in the afternoon, but the evening was approaching and she had not yet come. And as Florence Aston was the gayest of the gay, the presiding genius and bright particular star of every festive gathering, her absence made a sad blank at the present time. There was one whose uneasiness was greater than that of any other.

Harry Egerton was a noble looking youth, tall, vigorous, and well formed. He had lately arrived at this part of the country where he had entered upon the profession of law. His talent had already made him very conspicuous, but as yet he had gained little else beside fame. At the very first sight which he gained of Florence Aston, he became one of her most ardent admirers, and she had not seemed indifferent to his address. But Florence was rich and Harry was poor, and so it came to pass, that when he offered himself, she rejected him. It was a bitter disappointment, and a still more bitter mortification to the ambitious lover. At first he thought of leaving the country forever, but afterwards, wiser counsels prevailed, and he resolved to remain—to battle manfully over his feelings, and show to Florence that there were other objects to excite his desire, than her love. Full of these thoughts he had come to this party, determining to show her how lightly he bore the disappointment.

But hours passed away, still she came not. Without her the party would be nothing to Harry. He only came to "show off" before her, and while she was absent, he was miserable. The guests wondered, the host wondered, and Harry wondered. Finally, as the evening came nearer, the darkness increased and brought anxiety with it.

"The ice isn't the safest in the world," said one. "If she has started from the island, she may have found such bad travelling that she turned back."

"I met with one large crack," said another, "and if I hadn't been on horseback I could not have crossed. As it was, I had to take a pretty good jump."

"The weather has been bad, lately," said another. "I heard the ice groaning this morning, and I felt a little afraid it would break up. That's the way it always does."

"For my part," said a fourth, "I would not cross at all from my end of the island. I came around over the bridge, and by the main road. As I passed I saw it open at the head of the bay."

"Open!" cried all in horror. "Open at the head?"

"Open at the head as sure as I'm a living soul!" solemnly averred the last speaker.

When fears once begin to arise in anxious minds, it is astonishing how rapidly they grow. They increase and spread until every heart partakes of the common panic. Thus it was amid this company, who now seemed to think of nothing but danger to the absent guest. Each one had something to say about the weather, the ice, or the tide. At last the general fear grew so strong that every cheek became pale, and every heart beat fast with anxiety.

Long before they had ended their gloomy conjectures, Harry Egerton had hurriedly left the room. He could endure it no longer. The fear which oppressed the others was felt far more strongly by him, and the panic which reigned among them made him quake with terror. What—should Florence be in danger—should she perish and he not be able to avert it? Never. Forgetting all her coquetry, his disappointment and his great resolution, he hurried out to the stables, and in about ten minutes his horse was saddled and he was off.

It was now dark. The sky was overspread with many clouds, but occasionally the moon shone through them, giving light to the scene. The ice was covered over by a thin crust of snow, the sheen from which prevented it from being so very dark as it otherwise might have been. Harry urged his horse forward at a great pace over the road. In this part of the world it is customary for the inhabitants in the winter time to mark out with stakes or bushes the line of such roads as they make across lakes or rivers. Guided by the line of these, Harry Egerton now rode along.

It was certainly fast becoming a wild night. It was not cold but wild. The wind blew fiercely from the south, and Harry's heart sank within him as he recognized it. He knew that this was the wind which breaks up the ice. Yet it was not for himself he trembled.

He rode along for two miles, until at last he was roused from a reverie into which he had fallen, by a sudden rear of his horse which almost unseated him. Roused to action, he looked forward: there immediately before him lay a sheet of open water, as much as a mile in width; while away on the other side the field of ice lay stretching toward the shore. Under his feet it shook and crumbled, and he heard all around him the thunder of the masses of ice which the fury of the tide now rent asunder and carried out to sea.

What was he to do now? Had Florence crossed, or had she not? If she had, where was she now? But of course she had not—she had attempted to go over, had been stopped by the open channel, and had returned. Thoughts like these rushed through his mind. Then he remembered that immediately before the time which Florence had appointed for leaving home, some of her neighbors had crossed in safety. If she had left—if the ice had then broken—O, where was she now? The thought brought agony to Harry's soul. Delaying no longer, he urged his horse to his full speed along the margin of the breaking ice, watching for a place to cross. With much satisfaction he saw the channel growing narrower, and at last, after riding several miles, the icy sides met. He rushed over, and then fled swiftly along straight toward Florence's house. It was six miles away, but so fast was his horse urged along that it took but a little time to reach it. Leaping from his horse he sprang into the house, and bursting into the parlor, in the midst of the astonished family he cried out: "Where's Florence?"

"Florence?" cried Mr. Afton, an old man who was reading a newspaper. "Florence—why she's over at the party."

Harry groaned and staggered back.

"Good Heavens! Mr. Egerton, what is the matter?" cried Mr. Afton, in amazement.

"She's not there; and the ice is breaking up!" groaned Harry, whose face was like that of a corpse.

"The ice—the ice breaking?" shrieked the others. And in a moment all was wild confusion, horror and dismay. Mr. Afton rushed from the room to give direction for immediate search after her, but long before the first man under his charge had left the house, Harry was off, and away down the bay.

The channel had grown wider! Under his feet the ice cracked and swayed like the ground during an earthquake. Around him rose fearful sounds, made by the breaking masses; now a long boom as the vast field cracked throughout its entire length; again a terrific crash as floating masses came into collision.

But Harry rode on, utterly reckless of his own life, and thinking only of Florence Afton. His excited imagination pictured her in the midst of breaking icebergs, or perhaps clinging to her floating sleigh amid the roaring waters. O, the agony of that moment, when his soul was in dark suspense, and he knew not what to hope or fear.

He had ridden about eight miles, and as he went on he had been compelled to ride nearer and nearer the shore. The open water was wider, and on the other side no ice could be seen. He now reached the channel which forms the entrance to the bay. He could not see it as yet, for a projecting cliff intercepted the view, but he could hear a deep and awful moan made by the swift tide as it poured out through the narrow opening; and he could hear loud reports, crashing, crackling, and deafening explosions. In vain he wondered what these last might be, until at length, on turning round the projecting rock, the whole scene burst at once upon his view.

Egerton, though he was to hurry onward, the sight was such that he reined in his horse with a violent jerk and stood horror struck. There lay a mountain before him. All the ice of the bay had been drifted here, but so narrow was the opening, and so furious the tide, that it had collected in this place, and now lay piled heap on heap in vast masses. The water rushed onward and dashing upon it roared underneath the quivering mass out toward the sea. And while Harry gazed, fresh fields of ice, with many smaller pieces, were hurried down and hurled upon the pile.

But amid the roar of rushing wave, and crashing ice, there came a sound which pierced to the very soul of Egerton. It was a wild, despairing cry—a human voice—a woman's wail! It was the voice of Florence Afton. O, how the heart of Harry leaped up at the sound.

"She is alive! Alive, O, Heaven!"

In a moment he had sprung forward, and dashing at a frantic rate over rocks, lumps of ice, and debris of shattered trees, he arrived at the very base of the icy pile. Leaping from his horse, while the animal ran from the shore, he clambered over the heaped up masses and gained an icy platform.

A piercing cry came from beneath him. There was the sleigh of Mr. Afton. It was overturned. The two horses lay crushed under masses of ice. The coachman was nowhere to be seen. But from some one underneath, shriek after shriek came, imploring rescue.

In an instant Harry had sprung down to the spot. A large mass of ice lay immediately upon the sleigh, but he hurled upon it a smaller piece, which broke it asunder. Then he tried to lift up the sleigh. As Florence heard the noise which he made, she uttered a cry of joy.

"O, blessings on your head; O, save me!"

"I will, Florence, or I will die!"

The strong and resolute voice of Harry echoed in her heart.

"O, Harry Egerton," she murmured in tremulous tones, "have you come to save me?"

Harry did not answer. He raised the sleigh and called to her. She came from under it and stood up. Claspings her hands she raised her eyes to heaven in gratitude.

"There's no time to lose—no time to lose!" cried Harry. "We must escape to the shore before it is too late. Are you hurt? can you walk?"

"I am unharmed," cried Florence. "O, what an escape!"

"Fly, then; come!"

He sprang up towards the icy platform. Grasping her hand he pulled her upon it. He looked toward the shore. A chill of despair seized his very life blood. The point at which he had arrived a few minutes before, was far up the channel. The ice was moving. They felt it sway under them. They heard the thunder of the crashing masses around. The fury of the tide was overpowering everything.

"My God!" cried Harry, "O, spare us! Let us not perish now!"

The ice trembled beneath them, toppled over. Harry sprang down, and hurriedly lifted Florence after him. Then he helped her toward the shore. It was a hundred yards away, and the ice was loose and floating. Florence slipped so much, and was so greatly entangled by her clothing, that she made but small progress.

"O, hasten—hasten—leave me!" she cried despairingly, finding that the ice was moving down more quickly than before.

"Never!" cried Harry. And at this moment, lifting her over a large block of ice, they found themselves on the brink of an open space of water full sixty feet from the shore. Harry looked over it, and looked down the channel, but it was separate from the shore for a long distance, only coming in contact at one place where the ice lay piled up high across the strait.

Florence saw it all. Chilled through by her long exposure, she could stand up no longer, but sank senseless at his feet, murmuring: "Fly, dear Harry! Leave me!"

But the high courage of Harry Egerton did not sink, though surrounded by such tremendous dangers. He raised Florence in his arms, and with compressed lips and knit brows, prepared to make a final and desperate effort. It was the occasional glimmer of the moon through the clouds which showed him all the scene, and the gloom which succeeded the fitful brightness, only made his situation the more perplexing.

But scarcely had he started than he stopped. For a sudden roar like loudest thunder burst upon his ears. For some time the tide had moaned beneath the vast collection of ice, heaping it up, pressing it more closely together, but still failing to clear the channel. But now the ice could resist no longer. With a crash, a loud report, and a long deep roar, it burst, it shook, it yielded to the tide and moved onward to the sea. In an instant all was one grand scene of terrible confusion. The waves rushed under the ruined mass, crushing them altogether, shaking them to pieces, and crumbling them into innumerable fragments. The swift current, with a deeper moan, bore the entire mass forward rapidly to sea. And now the wind, which had been increasing throughout this dreadful night, had arrived to the strength and fury of the most violent tempest. It roared around the rocky cliffs, and "howled with a savage will."

Amid this great confusion, this warfare of wind, wave, rock and ice, Harry Egerton stood erect, resolved and fearless, waiting his chance. The ice where he stood was swept with the rapidity of lightning past the shore. Should he be carried out to sea, he would be lost; yet the sea was now close at hand. But one more point of land intervened between him and its rolling billows.

But he held Florence in his arms, and raised her high in the air. Her weight seemed to be as nothing to him. The thought that it was really Florence Afton, and that they were together, even though death should seize them, gave him superhuman strength.

And now he neared the pond, he was sweeping past it; it was now the time. The shore was but three yards distant. Summoning all his strength he sprang. He fell into the water, a lump of floating ice hurried by, and struck him with terrible force, but in another moment he was on the shore. The vast collection of ice rushed past him, and in a few moments, even while he was yet taking breath, the mad current, now all smooth and free from ice, rolled by, carrying away to sea the last vestige of the ice.

Saved! saved! O, it was a feeling of almost delirious ecstasy that swelled within him then, as he felt his foot upon the firm ground, and knew the danger that he had escaped.

But the house was yet a long way off. He had yet to bring his dear burden there. He raised her up once more, and with vigorous steps mounted the bank. From this point a rough road lay through the woods which joined the main road not far away. He walked forward quickly toward his journey's end. Florence was still senseless, and he had to carry her all the way. There were no houses near from which he could get assistance, so that his task was toilsome indeed. Scarcely had he gone three miles when he felt himself failing. The dreadful knowledge that his strength was exhausted forced itself upon his mind. Not even the thought that the life of Florence Afton depended upon his exertion, could give him strength any longer.

But now, even when he sank down to rest, and looked around him in despair, a familiar sound met his ears. It was the neigh of a horse. It sounded far away in the distance, but by the sound of the footsteps Harry knew that he was coming up the road toward him. Nearer and nearer the horse came, and at last arrived at the spot where he was sitting.

"Hey, Bruno! Whoa!" shouted Harry.

The noble animal knew his master's voice. He stopped and came toward him. In a moment more Harry was on his back, with his precious burden, and riding like the wind to Mr. Afton's house. The rough motion roused Florence from her long stupor. She moved, looked up, and murmured the name of her preserver.

The sound of the voice gave new life to him. Pressing her more closely to his throbbing heart he urged his horse forward at such a rapid pace that they soon arrived at the door of the house. As the sound of the horse's hoofs came to the ears of the Afton family, they sprang forth to see who it was. Their search had been fruitless, they had given up Florence for lost, and now when they saw her safe before them, their joy can more easily be imagined than described.

"O, Mr. Egerton," cried Mr. Afton, in a voice that trembled with emotion, "how can we ever repay you for this?"

But Harry could not speak. He watched Florence till they took her away. He followed her into the house, and then, after they had carried her up stairs, the strength and unnatural energy which had so long sustained him, gave way completely. He sank senseless to the floor.

Florence was as well as ever the next day, but Harry did not get off so easily. For months he lay sick at Mr. Afton's house, hovering between life and death. It was found that in his severe exertion he had broken a blood vessel. But nature triumphed finally over his sickness, and during his convalescence he was hurried back to health by the presence of Florence, who knew not how to show enough gratitude to the noble youth who, though wronged by her, had saved her life.

Indeed it seemed to be a more tender feeling than gratitude, and when at last, about a month after Harry had entirely recovered, there was a great wedding at Mr. Afton's house, people said that there never was a handsomer or more loving couple than Florence Egerton and her husband. The same company who had formed the party at the time of the disaster, assembled now to see her happiness, and those who once pitied the misfortunes of Harry, now congratulated him on his final success.

Jeremy Taylor, speaking of marriage, says, "It is not written that in the beginning God created man rich and poor, philosopher and peasant, but male and female created he them."

TO SISTER KATE.

BY COROLLA H. CRISWELL.

Thou art not here—but yet I feel
Thy presence everywhere:
When into solitude I steal,
Thou seemest by my side—
And when at eventide
The forest shades my path conceal,
Sister, I see thee there,
In fancy's dream, in fancy's dream,
Nor dearer, Katie, dost thou seem,
Than when I gazed on thee
In life's reality.

Imagination paints thee now—
A gentle, friendly smile
Rests on thy lips—thy placid brow
A shade of thought doth wear—
And o'er thy dark brown hair
Streams soft moonlight. O, pure art thou—
True-hearted—without guile.
O, love me yet! O, love me yet!
Though far from thee, I'll ne'er forget
The hours I passed with thee
In sweet reality.

GERTRUDE WILLIS'S BETROTHAL.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

"O, Gertrude, pity me!"

Marion Willis leaned her head upon her sister's shoulder and wept. The sunset stained with red the narrow panes of the window, by the open casement of which they were sitting, and enveloped in a crimson glory the drooped figure and bowed head of Marion, and the sweet, pitying face of Gertrude which bent above her.

"Look there!" and Marion's white finger pointed to a robe of snowy satin, and a long, delicate veil that were thrown carelessly over the back of a plain chair, and trailed on the uncarpeted floor. A box of jewels stood beside them, glimmering in the pink glow of the sunset, and looking strangely out of place in that poor though neat apartment. "He will dress me like a queen, and I—I shall hate him. Satin and lace were better sackcloth and ashes, and those pearls will burn upon my neck and arms like living coals. God grant that I may die ere the time comes for me to wear them!"

"Hush, hush, Marion! Have you not told me that Lynn Durant was noble? And is he not rich, and proud, and handsome? What more do you desire?"

"Simpleton!" was the bitter answer, "will my chains gall less because a royal master holds the key? He might be holy as heaven, and I should loathe him—count his gold by millions and my heart would break in his keeping; be beautiful as an angel, and my eyes make him deformed!"

"I cannot see it so. It is not possible that a woman can be utterly wretched in the love of any man who is strong, and true, and tender. You will forget this by-and-by, dear Marion."

"Lynn Durant does not love me. He fancied me, because I looked like some one he once loved; and with the ashes of that other affection still warm in his fickle heart, he bought me, bought me, Gertrude. Forget, do you say? Shall I ever forget, think you, that I have wronged the noblest man God ever made—forget that Edgar Hammond cursed me?"

"And yet you voluntarily gave him up."

"No no! do not wrong me so. I was a simple child, not knowing my own heart. You, Gerty, who have seen more of the world, might have been wiser. But I, born and living always in this quiet, country home, as ignorant of life as the birds, and flowers, and sunshine about me; seeing nothing grander than these rough walls; painting no pictures for the future that did not have in them Edgar's brown farm-house and speckled clover-fields; what wonder that I was flattered, dazzled, cheated, when Lynn Durant came, with his polished words and fascinating promises? He told me of his elegant home, his splendid furniture, his orderly servants. He was eloquent, very eloquent, and hearing him talk of my beauty, and my fitness for the station which he offered me, I grew to look with a feeling little short of contempt, upon my humble life. Father and mother, proud of the offer which was so far beyond their simple hopes for me, seeing opulence and ease waiting to gild their declining years, beset me with their entreaties. You were not here, Gerty, to advise me with your clear, straight-forward views of things; intoxicated, flattered, importuned on all sides, I yielded at last, and put away the pure, sweet dream that had filled my heart so many years."

"But surely, Marion, you will not marry with these feelings! It is not yet too late. Go to Lynn when he comes, tell him what you have told me, and rely upon his manliness to release you. It were better to deny him at the very altar, in the sight of God and his witnesses, than to carry a perjured heart into his home; better than to act out a wearisome falsehood in his presence all your life; to return his caresses with feigned delight, kiss him with lips that have spoken, lyingly, the holiest of vows; live upon his bounty, and lie in his bosom, while, all the time, your traitorous heart was aching to bless another with its love. O, Marion, beware!"

"You know not what you say," answered Marion, with a dreary sigh. "You would but wound another heart, instead of healing the one you had already broken. If I could so far forego my pride as to seek Edgar Hammond now, and sue for the affection which only a week ago I trampled under my feet so pitilessly, he would spurn me for the guilty, faithless creature that I am. No, no! it is too late, I would die a thousand deaths, rather than show him how the blow that smote him so cruelly has crushed me with its rebounding. Generous as he is, he could but triumph over and mock me in my desolation. Lynn Durant thinks I love him; let him think so still, if words and deeds of mine can keep up the pitiable deception. I will atone for my sin by making him happy at least."

There were tears in Gertrude's eyes as she stroked tenderly the shining head that lay upon her shoulder, and wound her arms closer about the slight form of her sister.

"I do not know," she said at length, "but perhaps you will not be very wretched after all. I have never seen this Lynn Durant of yours, but if he is all you have pictured him to me, I think I could love him."

"You, Gerty, you! Strange that I never thought of it before. You are handsomer, better, more accomplished than I. If you might only exchange places with me! And why can you not? He cannot help loving you infinitely better than he does me. I should be only a shadow in his grand house, where you would be a sunbeam. Say, Gerty, is it not possible? I will break the matter to him, tell him how kind, and good, and pure you are, and I am sure he will not deny me. Tell me, Gertrude, will you save me if you can?" And the poor suppliant lifted her head, and regarded her sister with an expression of earnest, agonized, hopeful entreaty.

Gertrude returned her gaze with one of compassionate wonder, as though she thought she had gone mad, but shook her head with a sad smile.

"You do not realize what you are asking, dearest. You do not realize how almost impossible it would be for me to do so, without a complete sacrifice of maidenly delicacy,—how hardly a sensitive woman could, as you propose, be pushed, unloved, unappreciated, and unasked for, into the place which another was only too glad to relinquish. Think in what a ridiculous light I should stand before your betrothed husband, did I offer myself in your stead, when I have never seen him, or heard of him save by report. I would do anything this side of womanly modesty and truth to serve you; but your plan is too wild. Besides—"

Gertrude faltered and blushed.

"You already love," suggested Marion, whose quick eyes were not tardy to notice her agitation.

"Yes, and still more hopelessly than you," was Gerty's low answer. "Listen, and I will tell you about it. Four years ago, when I went from here to B——, I was obliged, as perhaps you will remember of my writing to you, to travel in the cars the whole of one night. It was a lonely road, and I was not surprised to find that only a single passenger occupied the cars with me. This was a man, young and well-dressed, and as I scrutinized him by the dim light of the car lamps, I thought I had never seen one who came so near my ideal of manly beauty. A fine, clearly-cut profile; hair not curly enough to look feminine, but sufficiently so to fall in black, luxuriant waves; a handsome, well-kept beard, and strong, muscular, but perfectly symmetrical figure, composed his list of personal attractions. To beguile the tediousness of the journey, I had been reading 'Jane Eyre,' until my mind was tinged with that romantic imaginativeness, which invests every person it meets with the characteristics of a hero or a heroine. By one of those sudden impulses of feeling, which can hardly be called intuitions, and are yet more than presentiments, I looked on the stranger as one who would sometime be dear to me—dearer than a friend. I could not help it, although I tried at first; and finally, thinking it was a sentimentalism which the next day's realities would dissipate forever, I gave myself up to the indulgence of my curious fancy.

"Long I sat there, watching the quiet, dark, dignified face turned partially away from me, and summing up the probable virtues and vices of its owner. I read there of determination and strength of will, of passions kept under resolute control; of tenderness that would stoop to fondle a dove, and fierceness, that if once aroused, would find no restraint, save in the promptings of a clean heart and an unstained conscience; I read of temptations conquered, trials borne with, and wrong forgiven. And then I followed out an imaginary future, with such a man for my companion. I saw how we went along, hand in hand, over the rough paths and the smooth, never faltering, never stumbling, never failing in kindness to each other, his strength the guide of my weakness, my weakness the channel for his strength; each a mutual reproof and comfort, hope and ambition to the other."

"As Edgar and I might have been," interrupted Marion, with a sigh that was half a sob.

"My reverie was broken in upon by a few words from the stranger himself, who had taken a seat near me, and was commenting on the beauties of the moonlit landscape, that swept past us like a fairy dream. We soon became quite sociable, and if I had been interested before, I was completely enthralled then. He spoke with graceful ease and naturalness, and his musical voice was toned to perfect harmony with the time and place. I had thrown down my book, and sat with my head partially bent forward to listen, my cheeks burning, and my lips half-parted, as with the indistinct praise they would have spoken.

"All at once I became aware that my unusual interest was making itself noticeable even to him, and with a blush of unutterable shame and confusion, I drew back, stammering a few incoherent words that only added to my painful embarrassment. A gratified smile lingered a moment about his mouth, and then with a respectful considerateness for which I thanked him, remarked pleasantly that perhaps I was sleepy, and turned away from me, first asking if I would lend him the book I had laid aside.

"I did not stop to see him open it, but drew my veil over my eyes, and tried to profit by his suggestion. But I could not sleep. That smile haunted me. I could see his clear, dark eyes dancing around under my veil, and mocking me with a steady, magnetic, triumphant gaze. A thousand intangible visions floated before me, in which he was an actor, always with that calm, fascinating, immovable smile upon his features. I grew sick of my own silly fancies, and threw up my veil with a gesture of impatience; but I started with an indefinable thrill of pleasure and surprise, as I found the eyes of the unknown haunter of my thoughts fastened intently upon me. I thought he appeared momentarily embarrassed, as I drew myself up with an air which I would have gladly had him interpret into one of displeasure, though it was far from being so. He returned my book with a pleasant 'thank you,' and a laughing remark about its extravagance. That my hero should speak sarcastically of the novel for which of all others I felt the most enthusiastic admiration, wounded my vanity, for I had not thought of him as a stern, practical man, and I did not like to find myself mistaken. I defended it warmly.

"Perhaps," he said, smiling at my earnestness, 'I am too skeptical in regard to the remarkable adventures which are said to befall people in love; but it has always seemed to me, that a woman who became my wife in a rational, common-place sort of manner, would just as completely fill my heart and bless my home, as though I had waded through fire and water after her.'

"That may be," I replied, 'but if fire and water should happen to sweep between you and the woman you loved, just as you had stretched out your arms to make her a shelter, I cannot believe you would think any hardship a sacrifice, any affliction or endeavor extravagant, that helped to bring her near to you again. Blessings hardest won are longest prized, and for my part, I had rather be gained with difficulty than ease, though my heart was wrung till I shed tears of blood, and my way blinded till I knew not where to step for fear of going wrong, I should have faith to believe that for every perplexity an extra harvest of blessing awaited me in the future.'

"But were you placed in the situation where the heroine of Jane Eyre was, do you think your faith would be strong enough to uphold you in the long, dreary separation from one in whom every joy in life was bound up, to hope against hope, by tracing out even indistinctly, the coming re-union?'

"I do not know as I quite understand you, sir.'

"Let me suppose a case then. If you and I—pardon my boldness—should form one of those sudden attachments which it seems to be the especial delight of novel-writers to portray, and some unavoidable circumstance should hinder us from becoming better acquainted with each other's names, characters, or destinations than we now are; though that love might be pure as heaven, and lasting as eternity, would you have faith enough in an overruling Providence, to make you courageous and contented through years of parting, keep your heart fresh and whole for my claiming? Could you believe that time and chance would ever bring us, strangers, together under circumstances favorable to the crowning of our love with the happiness it deserved?'

"I trembled while he was speaking. His eyes were fixed upon mine with a questioning, eager, almost passionate glance. Had he read my thoughts, and taken advantage of them, to enjoy a momentary triumph over my womanly weakness? I could not believe it, and so I answered firmly, yet half involuntarily, 'Yes.'

"He bent towards me, and still those eager, bewildering, tender eyes searched my face. Then he reached out his hand, and while my heart leaped with an instinctive foreboding of what was coming, he said, 'I dare you to the trial!'

"I have wondered since at my imprudence. I know not whether my good angel or my bad one prompted me, but an irresistible spell was upon me, and had my salvation been staked on the action, I could not have helped putting my hand in his, and answering back, 'I accept your challenge!'

"Henceforth, then, you are my Jane!"

"And you my Mr. Richard."

"I have never seen him since, dear Marion, and yet every day has strengthened that singular fascination. I believe that he is true, and good, and pure, and that he has loved me all this while. It may be a foolish hope, a vagary too wild ever to meet fulfilment. He may be dead, or standing, even now, at the altar with another, for all the outward evidence I have to the contrary; yet my heart tells me persistently, 'Nay, he is coming—he is very near; your love has been strange and brave beyond common loves, but its reward is certain.'"

It was late in the evening before Gertrude finished her narration; and when, in their humble bed that night, the sisters wrapped their arms about each other, and breathed together their nightly prayer for pardon and protection, one could hardly tell which to pity most, she who would wake to meet on the morrow an unwelcome bridegroom, or she whose heart yearned so confidently and with such a delusive trust, for the arrival of one who might never come.

Early on the afternoon of the next day, the village stage-coach came rattling down the road that led to the cottage, and stopped before the door. A tall, dark, singularly handsome man leaped from it to the ground, and with a few pleasant directions to the driver about his baggage, walked rapidly up the path to the house.

Marion's cheeks blanched whiter than the muslin dress she wore, and her hand which sought Gerty's in a convulsive grasp, was cold and clammy. Mrs. Willis smoothed down the plaits of her gingham apron complacently, and looked with a sort of motherly satisfaction on the approaching stranger. The features of good farmer Willis relaxed with a broad, honest smile; while Gerty, the least interested of them all, stood with one white arm thrown over her sister's neck, and trembling from head to foot with an unaccountable emotion.

A moment later Lynn Durant was among the little group that had gathered at the door to welcome him. But what! It was not Marion's hand he snatched so eagerly in both his own; not Marion's dewy eyes he looked into so reverently, and yet so passionately; not Marion's smile that brought such an expression of glad, quick, wondering surprise into his proud, almost haughty face. With a rapid bound he stood at Gerty's side, and drawing her towards him with an impulsive, caressing motion, he whispered, in a voice hoarse with tender emotion, "Found at last, my Jane!"

"My Mr. Richard!"

It was all they said, but Marion read the whole story at a glance, and going up to them, with the vague hope shining in her eyes, and deepening and broadening over her whole face, till it was fairly illuminated with the radiance of an unexpected and unspeakable gladness, she said, softly, "God be praised for this undeserved mercy! I have never loved you, Lynn, as she will, and though I would have wronged you by giving you my hand while my heart's best allegiance was another's, you can afford to forgive me now, my brother."

And then, after she had left the room, to shed tears of quiet happiness in the solitude of her own chamber, and the lovers had partially satisfied the wonder of the bewildered parents, Lynn Durant, holding Gerty in a close embrace, as though he feared she might vanish from him into nothingness, told her of the past four years. How the memory of her and their mutual and singular promise had haunted him, until every fibre of life and hope seemed bound up in the desire of seeing her once more; and how that for three long years he had wandered, searching, waiting and praying, with no aim save the faint possibility of finding her, his unknown betrothed; how, at last, when the utter hopelessness of his weary search first dawned upon him, and he had begun to tire of the lonely, restless, wasteful life he led, he had met Marion Willis. Her resemblance to Gerty had first attracted him, and afterwards, although he loved her but indifferently, he had asked her to become his wife, hoping that by having some one dependent on him for care and protection, he might be weaned from the mad dream that tormented him.

There were two weddings instead of one, at Farmer Willis's cottage; and among Gerty's bridal gifts, was a handsomely bound edition of "Jane Eyre," on the fly-leaf of which was written, in the delicate chirography of her sister, now Marion Hammond: "Blessings hardest won are longest prized, and for my part, I had rather be won with difficulty than ease, though my heart was wrung till I shed tears of blood, and my way blinded till I knew not where to step for fear of going wrong, I should have faith to believe that for every perplexity an extra harvest of blessing awaited me in the future."

And underneath, in Lynn Durant's bold hand writing, "God bless and spare her to me till I die—my Jane—my Gerty—my wife!"

THE EMIGRANTS.

BY ELISA F. MORIARTY.

The white waves kissed the smiling shores,
With love's unchanged devotion,
Where Hudson, queen of rivers, pours
Her homage to the ocean.

As Conal and his fair young bride,
His Irish rose transplanted,
While sunset's gorgeous splendors died,
Behold the scene enchanted.

"I'm thinking of the days," he sighed,
"When we were blithe and merry,
Ah! when we crossed the ocean wide,
We left our hearts in Kerry.

"Twas there amid its green hills old,
Disporting like a fairy,
I first beheld with love untold
My own, my child wife, Mary.

"And there the good priest's holy power
Our yearning hearts united,
But in a dark and evil hour
Our wedded joy was blighted.

"We saw our parents' hallowed hairs
Pale white with want and sorrow,
Our lightsome hearts, unused to cares,
First tumbled for the morrow.

"A wail went out of wild despair,
And woful lamentation,
Egyptian darkness filled the air,
While famine smote our nation.

"The churchyards could not hold the dead;
What woe to see the dying,
Like autumn leaves the ground o'erspread,
Along the wayside lying.

"Dear Lord, my heart was withered up,
Despair its life consuming,
To see their drain want's poisoned cup,
When o'er the waters looming

"Upraise before our furnished gae,
A white-winged ship* advancing,
Aftward her path flashed morning's rays,
The glad waves round her dancing.

"The star-gemmed banner o'er her waved,
On Eire's breezes streaming,
The scene upon my heart engraved
Is present in my dreaming.

"We praised our God the nation blest
That sighed o'er fallen Eire,
And from the bounty of the West
Our lot was made less dreary.

"She came from 'freedom's land' to save
The famished thousands dying,
But shrouded in a common grave
The millions starved were lying.

*Two national vessels, the Jamestown and the Macedonia, the former offered by volunteers, were despatched from the United States of America, with the voluntary contributions of the citizens in money, food, and clothing, for the starving poor of Ireland."

"We fled the soil that gave us birth,
Where once our hearts were merry,
Forsook the dearest spot on earth,
Our broken home in Kerry.

"To this great land by mercy led,
From famine, death and danger,
We love the soil that gives us bread,
And shields the hapless stranger.

"With peace and plenty in the west,
The future smiles before us,
Yet in our own land we would rest,
The shamrocks blooming o'er us."

As thus they mourned their native tale,
With Irish hearts' devotion,
The day-star with a parting smile
Went out upon the ocean.

COUSIN ANNE.

BY MRS. A. E. RUSSELL.

"Now which of us do you like best, Anne?
Can't you make up your mind?"

"Really, William, I'm sure I don't know!
Sometimes I think I like you best, and then I'm sure it's Lawrence; and between you both, I'm tormented most to death." And a silvery laugh finished the sentence.

"It seems to me that you might know by this time. You've lived in the same house with me for more than a year, and you've flirted with Lawrence about as long. Now when you go down in the depths of your heart and search, can't you tell which of us you'd prefer to spend your life with?"

"I don't know as I've got any heart, William.
I think, on the whole, I haven't, or I should have fallen in love with one of you before this time.
But what's the use of all this fuss? Why can't we go along just as we have done? We're the best of friends now, and I have two nice beaux, whereas I shouldn't have but one, by the other arrangement."

The young man smiled and sighed together, and drummed on the table softly, in his perplexity. The pretty, merry thing beside him was worth something of a sacrifice, and he loved her too well to give her up willingly; but to share her smiles and attentions with some other, when it was doubtful who might have the better right to them, was rather more than he was prepared to do.

"Come! you'd better make such an arrangement," she said at length, tapping his fingers with the branch of myrtle she had brought in.
"Let alone all this folderol about loving you alone. Why, I could love a dozen of you at a time! Let us be good friends, and flirt in a good-natured sort of way, and leave the rest to chance. Come! you and Lawrence shall be my colleague beaux."

He couldn't help laughing at the speech and the comical expression of her face, but he shook his head and grew grave in a short time.

"That is something that a man will not consent to be colleague in, Anne," he said. "The woman I love must be mine, or nothing to me. I can have no partnership in her love. Now, if you really think that you like Lawrence better than me, I haven't a word to say. I confess he's handsome, and more gallant, and I really think he's better suited to you; but then if one loves, you know, all these things go for nothing. Sometimes, I've thought that you did love me a little, and that I might make you happy. Was it all a fancy, Anne?" And he drew her towards him, and tried to look in her face.

"Pshaw, William! how sentimental you grow!" she exclaimed, with a pretty, laughing pout. "I like you just as well as Lawrence, and no better. What's the use of talking so?"

"Well, then," he said, with a sigh, letting her go from his arm, "I suppose I must give up the field to Lawrence, for I can't hear it said that we are both hanging round you, and waiting to see which will be chosen."

"It's a fact, though," she laughed, gaily.

The young man colored deeply, as he rose from the sofa and went towards the door.

"It has been a fact, perhaps, Anne; but it ceases to be from this time," he said, coldly.

"Now how cross he is!" exclaimed the little sprite, springing before him and standing against the door. "I sha'n't let him go out until he's good-natured."

It was impossible to resist the sparkling good-nature of the pretty face, and William Mason's anger and pride all evaporated in a hearty laugh.

"It's of no use to try to do anything with you, Anne," he said. "You take the dignity all out of a man, before he knows it. We'll be friends, if we can't be anything more; and I won't trouble you with my serious ways again. I really think they are thrown away upon you."

"Yes, indeed they are!" cried the little beauty. "You must distribute your pearls more judiciously, William. And now that you are in a proper mood, come and look at my geraniums."

"You're nothing but a geranium, yourself," he answered, smiling, as he followed her into the garden.

"What kind—a pennyroyal?" she asked.

"A rose, just budding, child."

"Child!" she pouted. "That's pretty talk."

"Nevertheless, you are a child, Anne," he answered, more seriously. "A child unconscious of the great, sorrowful, grand world that rolls all around you. But there! I'm talking sense to you again. Pardon me this once, and I promise not to commit such an indiscretion again."

Anne pouted again. This was not exactly what she had required. She loved gay, flattering conversation, and hated to be in earnest; but she hardly wished to be treated like a child. Just then, the sound of steps coming up the gravel walk announced a visitor before he appeared from the thick shade of the lilac-bushes, and a handsome, well-dressed young man, with a cheerful, commonplace looking countenance, approached and shook hands with both of them. There was a great contrast between the young men. William Mason was only of middle height, stout, firm-built, with a plain face and a sturdy, common-sense look and manner, not at all attractive to a pretty little flirt like Anne; while Lawrence Wells was just the ideal of a silly girl of eighteen—tall, slender, with little feet and hands, regular features, bright eyes that meant nothing but flirtation and its accessories, and a very pretty mouth that talked of nothing else. But Lawrence was as kind-hearted and as thoroughly well-intentioned as a wiser man could be; and between him and his old neighbor and playmate, William Mason, there was as much friendship as could well subsist between persons of such different tastes.

When Anne Staples had come to live with her guardian and distant relative, Mr. Mason, the elder, Lawrence had become acquainted at once, and the two had struck up a flirtation that continued for months without any serious termination. Not but that the young man would have been glad to gather such a flower as Anne, but because she would never hear of anything serious, and always laughed and pouted him out of all grave thoughts and questions, as we have seen her do with his rival. Lawrence was one of the best beaux in the world; he danced finely, drove a horse well, gave as pretty a turn to a compliment as the prettiest girl could desire, but after all, Anne felt that Cousin William's good sense and profound feeling had something better in them than all Lawrence's accomplishments. The little gipsy saw his growing preference for her, his involuntary acts of affection, his manifest vexation when she was more than usually frivolous, with secret delight, quite as much for the excitement of flirting with such a superior man, perhaps, as from any preference she might feel for him, but still with a deeper sentiment of respect and regard than she was aware.

"Good morning, Miss Anne—you are a perfect rose-bud of beauty this morning," was Lawrence's salutation, before he spoke with his friend.

"William just said something similar to that," Anne answered, carelessly. "How your hair shines this morning, Lawrence! I think you must have taken particular pains with it. William's doesn't look so, now. I presume he combs his in a fit of lofty abstraction—don't you, Cousin William?"

Both young men colored, and then laughed. It was impossible to quarrel with her, however rude she might be.

"There is to be a ride and ball, to-night," Lawrence said. "Are you engaged, Anne?"

"No, indeed! I never heard of such a thing," she said.

"Then will you honor me?" he asked, making a dancing-school bow.

"Yes, certainly—if you will try to appreciate the honor," she answered, laughingly, glancing up with a merry look of mischief towards William. "You'll go too, Cousin William, won't you?"

"I dare say I shall," William said; "provided I find a lady as ready to accept my invitation."

Anne looked up into his face again. Instead of the jealousy she thought to find there, there was nothing but an amused smile. Was he laughing at her and Lawrence too? She tossed her pretty head at the thought, and telling the visitor she had some new prints to show him, invited him into the parlor without another word to his companion.

William found a partner quite as attractive as his pretty mistress, and Anne was no less annoyed by his earnest attentions to her rival, than by the frank, good-natured way in which he approached herself. If he had only behaved disdainfully, or angrily, she might have thought he cared for her treatment in the morning, and her various flirtations that evening; but no stranger could seem more pleasantly indifferent than he. She thought of it all the evening, and lay awake thinking of it after she was in bed, and thought of it the next day when William was absorbed in study and seemed to have forgotten that such a person lived.

When he had studied many hours, and Anne had peeped cautiously into the library two or three times, she went into the garden and gathered some rose-buds and heliotrope, arranging them prettily as she went in.

"Haven't you studied long enough at that old book, Cousin William?" she asked, holding the bouquet before his eyes, and laughing at his sudden start.

"You think so, at any rate," he said, laughing and closing the book. "Are these for me?"

"Certainly. I brought them as a peace offering."

"A peace offering? what did you want of that, Anne? We are good friends, are we not?" he asked, in surprise.

"I didn't know as you liked my rudeness, yesterday morning, and I wanted to say that I was sorry," she said, with much the air of a convicted child.

"Why, you're dreaming, Anne," he said, with a gay laugh. "I didn't even know that you were rude. You are privileged to do as you please, and you know we made a contract yesterday to be good friends, and never have anything serious between us. In future, you must remember that I forget all your pretty impudence as soon as you are out of sight; will you?"

"Yes, if you wish it so," she said, half vexed, and not a little hurt at the implied indifference.

"Most certainly I wish it so, Anne. I wouldn't have you think that I refuse to be a good friend to you, and enjoy your society, because you don't choose that I should take a deeper interest in you. My mind is occupied with serious things, you know, and there isn't much room in it for these little trifling matters. Come! let's go out in the garden. I want to see your flowers, and I think I've studied about enough for this afternoon."

Anne smothered her mortification and anger. Trifling things! She'd let him see that her society, and her likings and dislikings were not such trifles, as he thought. So she flirted more gaily than ever, laughed and sang and danced about the house like a pet bird, and was alternately kind and cold to the young man apparently without a reason.

But in a few weeks, a new actress appeared upon the scene. Another cousin, one really related to William, came on a visit to the family, and won all hearts at once. She was so dignified, so superior, and so good, too! Anne could not but love her; and she, in turn, petted the little beauty, and treated her with the same affection that she would have bestowed upon a baby sister. She braided and decked her hair, and arranged her dresses for rides and parties to which Lawrence invited her; she praised the pretty girl without stint, and contrived always to draw her out in company when she seemed shy, or come to her relief when she was out of sorts—and Anne generously admired and praised her companion also. But William talked to Caroline, as he never had to her. Caroline could enter into all his ideas and plans. Her cultivated mind comprehended all his studies and arguments—his proud aspirations for the future. Both would trifle and romp with the gay girl, but when any vein of real sentiment or valuable thought was struck, they seemed to forget her entirely. William's eye would flash and his cheek glow, as he poured out his feelings and speculations; and Carry's face always wore an aspect of pleased appreciation, while she listened and replied.

They studied together, too, great heavy books, while Anne worked idly at her embroidery, or drummed on the great piano in the parlor, wishing from the depths of her little heart that she was wise and learned. Anne had begun to think that she might have a heart, after all. At any rate, there was sometimes a very definite ache down there in the region where a heart should be. When William turned from flattering her, and laughing at her nonsense, to such an earnest, respectful manner with her companion; when he so plainly treated her as a plaything, and Caroline as an equal; when he only gave her the foam and froth of his idle hours, despised and forgotten in a moment, and opened the stores of study and thought that had accumulated so long, as soon as he turned to her rival—Anne felt that she was justly punished for trifling with him and with herself so long, and crept away alone to cry with mortification and real sorrow. As for Lawrence, his nonsense and his attentions were absolutely hateful to her, and in a fit of anger one evening, she told him never to come there again, if he always came to see her. The sight of William and Caroline going out to walk together, quite destroyed the little patience with which she had been trying to listen to him.

"What is the matter with Anne?" asked Mrs. Mason of her son and niece a few days afterward, when they were sitting together in the library, and Anne was pensively watering and weeding her flowers.

"Is anything the matter with her?" asked William, looking out at her, as she stood now beneath a tree, watching the flight of a bird upward.

"She hasn't been so well, lately, as usual, and she seems sort of strange, too—not half so cheery as she used to," said the kind old lady. "I wonder if she and Lawry hasn't quarrelled! He hasn't been here, lately."

"Poor child!" said William, looking with a sort of pitying admiration at the graceful young figure. "She's so happy in her world, it would be a pity if it should disappoint her."

"Not so much of a child as you think, Willy," his mother answered. "You treat her as though she was a baby, and how can you expect her to be serious with you?"

"She never would let me treat her any other-wise," the young man said, gravely, still looking at Anne, who had gone back to her flowers again, but had forgotten to pull up the weed she had her hand upon, and knelt thoughtfully by her favorite rose-tree, quite oblivious of what she was there to do.

"You didn't try long and patiently enough, perhaps, my son. Besides, Anne's only sixteen, you know, and was an only child—poor thing! I suspect she came up pretty much as she pleased, and never knew what a serious thought was, until she came here."

William's eyes looked decidedly misty now, but he still looked in the same direction. Anne had raised her hand as if to dash away a tear, and then risen and gone slowly down the walk out of sight.

"Anne's got the foundation of a nice, sensible woman in her," persisted the old lady; "and I think she's too good for Lawry. But what's to be, will be, I suppose, and she seems to have her heart set on him. I only wish I knew what ailed her." And the old lady went thoughtfully back to the jelly she had left boiling.

Caroline, too, went out to see the operation, and William turned to his writing again. But Anne's sweet face, pale and tearful as his fancy pictured it now, would sit on his pen, and spoil all his lines. He couldn't write, and he couldn't study; so he took his hat and went down the garden walk.

But if he sought for Anne, he sought in vain, for she was not in any part of the garden. Sitting down, he heard slow steps coming along the street and lingering as they neared the garden.

"Why, Lawrence!" he said, recognizing his friend. "What a stranger you are! Why don't you come in now? It's as much as a week since you were here last. You and Anne haven't quarrelled, have you?"

"Yes we have; and she told me not to come again," answered the young man frankly, half smiling at the confession. "I felt vexed enough to stay away in earnest, but she's such a witch of a thing a man can't stay away from her long, and then I know she likes me, and I fancy she feels as badly as I do."

"There's no reason why you shouldn't come to see the rest of us then, Lawrence," William said. "Just walk in and take tea with us tonight, and you shall have an opportunity to see Anne alone, if you wish."

Lawrence was full of spirits, laughed and chatted with Caroline who tried to entertain him, as one stoops towards a child they wish to amuse, complimented Mrs. Mason's cooking, talked about the weather with the squire, and tried to approach Anne, who was as coolly indifferent as possible. After tea, Anne must play and sing, which she never refused to do, but much to Lawrence's annoyance, and the amusement of the rest of the family, she broke down in the middle of every piece he attempted to sing with her, and took no notice of his efforts to propitiate her. William proposed a walk, and both Caroline and Lawrence eagerly seconded him. But to their surprise, Anne declined going, and wishing them a very pleasant walk, went up the broad staircase, singing the air of a new opera. Lawrence's look of disappointment and vexation was a study for a painter; but he was too proud to complain, so he bade the old people good evening with as good a grace as possible, and tried to talk very cheerfully until he was alone. Then he solaced himself by wishing all girls in the Red Sea, and declaring that he would never speak to that little jilt again, and finally wound off with three cigars which he smoked with great energy.

William found it difficult to study or write, and impossible to sleep for many hours that night. Mathematical figures, problems of history or philosophy, all run to brown curls and pouting lips, and pretty little feet that danced just like Cousin Anne's. What could the girl mean? Did she really like Lawrence, as he thought, and as William had made up his mind that she did? and was all this coldness and change in her manner in consequence of a lover's quarrel? William resolved to speak with her the next day, though it seemed rather a delicate matter for him.

Morning brought just the opportunity he wished. Anne had begged permission of Mrs. Mason to take charge of the parlors, and after William had been seated for some time in the library, with his book upside down before him, he heard her singing softly, as she dusted and arranged the furniture. It was a very pleasant sound, much like the warbling of a bird, and as William listened, he fell into a day-dream, half forgetting the intended interview. But the sudden ceasing of the tune broke the spell, and with a sigh and half smile, he rose and went through the hall.

"This is not taboed, is it?" he asked, just putting his head in at the door.

"Not now," Anne said; "but if you had come half an hour before, I should have said yes."

William looked admiringly at her. Was ever anything so pretty as the pink morning dress and nice collar, the wrought slipper on the little foot, the brown, wavy hair, tucked away behind her ears, the dimpled arms, with the sleeves pinned up on them? Nothing could be prettier and daintier than Anne, not even the flowers she was arranging in the vases.

"You see I'm in housekeeping trim," she said, laughing, and glancing at the calico apron.

"You look charming in any trim, Anne," he replied; and he really thought so.

"I can dispense with compliments," she said, with a scornful curl of her pretty lip. "If you have nothing more sensible than that to offer, you'd better go back to geometry."

"I thought you liked compliments," he answered.

"I like them when they can't help themselves," said Anne; "but not when they mean 'what a fool you are!'"

William laughed, and colored at the distinction.

"Do my compliments mean that, Anne?" he asked.

"Yes, always," she said. "Some people's flattery comes from their heart, but you always despise people you flatter, William. If you really felt such things, you'd be the last one to say them."

"Then I'll never say them to you again, But I have come to say something more serious, only that compliment couldn't help itself, you know. I scarcely know how to begin, for I'm afraid you'll think me impertinent. Will you promise me absolution if I offend, Anne?"

"I won't make any promises," she said, stooping over the flowers so that he could not see her face. "You ought to know whether it should offend me, certainly."

"Well, I'll risk it any way, then. I don't believe your anger would be very terrible, Anne. I wanted to say something about Lawrence. The poor fellow feels very badly because you treat him so coldly. Anne, I know he went home in very low spirits last night, and you don't seem exactly as you used to. Now, Anne, if there's an atom of trifling separating you, why can't you have some explanation, and be friends again. These things are hard to bear, and you ought not to subject such a good fellow as Lawrence to them, from any pique or pride. Hadn't you better make up your quarrel?"

Anne raised her head proudly.

"Did he ask you to come to me?" she said, in so dignified a tone that William began to feel ashamed of his errand.

"No, not exactly, certainly," he said. "But then I thought myself such a good friend to both, that I might take the liberty to speak without giving offence."

"You are very kind," she answered, haughtily. "But I really cannot see what concern you have in the matter. 'As for advice, when I wish it in such a delicate matter, I shall hardly ask it of you. I think my aunt would be the more suitable person.'"

Gathering up the refuse flowers, she swept by him and up the staircase with the air of a princess, while he stood in silent astonishment and shame. It was too delicate an office for him—and why had he not seen it? He had made a great mistake in thinking Anne a child, and treating her as such in all things, when she had all a woman's sensitiveness in this. No doubt she loved Lawrence, and was suffering from some causeless jealousy; but it would not do for him to interfere again. He only wished that he had had sense enough to mind his studies and let Anne alone. With a slow step, and rather a heavy heart, he went back to the library and bent his head over his book again. A loud laugh disturbed him at last, and looking up, he saw Caroline standing beside him.

"You must have a new gift, cousin," she said, still laughing. "No wonder you were too much absorbed to hear me come in. Is it just as easy as the other way?"

William looked at his book. It had been upside down all the forenoon. Laughing and coloring deeply, he threw it from him and went out. At dinner-time, he came in quite serious and handed a letter to his father. The old gentleman read it, put it in his pocket silently, and waited until the meal was over and the family all in the sitting-room before he made any remark upon it.

"You pay a great compliment to our patience," Mrs. Mason said, when she had gone twice round her knitting-work, and her husband had gone twice through the letter again. "What is it, William?"

"It is an offer of the very post I have wished for!" he said. "A capital situation in Philadelphia! But it takes me away rather soon—in three days. I'm sorry there's no more time."

"There is ever so much for you to do. You can't possibly go so soon."

"I can buy all the clothing, mother; and as for the rest, you can all say your last words in three days, I should think," William said.

He turned to look at Anne, curious to see how she would take the announcement. She was not by the window where she had been sitting, nor in sight anywhere. He would have given the world to have seen her face then, but she was not to be found, and did not come back until twilight. She had been down in the field and meadow searching for a rare sort of flower, and heard the announcement of William's intended departure very quietly indeed.

"We shall miss you very much, cousin," she said, turning to him calmly, and then going to put her flowers into a vase.

William felt more hurt than he would have been willing to acknowledge, but he determined to make up his quarrel with her that very night; so when she sat at the piano, playing and singing softly, as was her habit at twilight, and the rest of the family were discussing his affairs at the other end of the parlor, he went up to her, and begged she would excuse his impertinence that morning. He wasn't really aware what a fool he was making of himself until afterward.

They wouldn't think or talk any more about that, Anne said. It wasn't worth troubling about. She should forget it entirely, by the next day. William winced slightly, as though some one had struck him. Anne's indifference was not of so little moment to him as he had begun to think; but he was too proud to speak of his feelings, and only told her all about his intended journey and the place he should occupy.

"And now, Anne, may I sometimes write to you?"

"Write to me? No—not if—" But she could say no more, for her pretty lips trembled so visibly, and a quick tear dropped from her eyes.

That tear! There was no misunderstanding that. It was a diamond lens, through which, as with microscopic power, was revealed all the story of Anne's heart. He saw in one instant how much he had misconceived her—how poorly he had understood her delicate maiden heart.

In a moment more he was kneeling at her feet, with both her fair hands in his own, and with all the true eloquence of his full heart, was pouring into her willing ear a flood of tender confession.

His departure was delayed for a month, and when he went to fill his new situation, he took with him his young wife—COUSIN ANNE.

To be satisfied with the acquittal of the world, though accompanied with the secret condemnation of conscience, is the mark of a little mind; but it requires a soul of no common stamp, to be satisfied with his own acquittal, and to despise the condemnation of the world.—Lacan.

THE MOONBEAM.

BY I. W. STANTON SANBORN.

Lightly my boat I row
O'er the silvery lake;
Calmly the breezes blow,
Ne'er a ripple make.

How beautiful thy beam,
O Moon of silver light!
As in my bark I dream
Of fairy visions bright.

Celestial ray of love,
Dispelling gloom and fear;
Fit symbol of "above,"
To beautify and cheer.

How dark would night appear,
Without thy modest smile;
Lonely, long and drear
Would seem to us the while.

THE LOST HEIR FOUND.

A TALE OF THE COURT OF LOUIS XIII.

BY MRS. J. D. BALDWIN.

THE last rays of an October sun were resting in fading beauty on vineyard, stream and flower, where slept the old town of Blois, in the centre of an extensive amphitheatre of hills, and forests—the gloomy towers of St. Nicholas looming up in stately grandeur, high above its multitude of low red-tiled roofs—while the Loire's bright waters in the foreground murmured peacefully as though they slept, running above the golden sands of their yellow bed.

"Thank heaven, he has gone at last!" exclaimed Mary de Medici, as Armand Duplessis retired from her presence, to his bishopric of Luçon, from which he was shortly after exiled to Arignon.

So long as Richelieu had been of service to her, Mary de Medici protected and assisted in aggrandizing him; but when she saw the colossal power to which he had attained, she regretted the treaty entered into, to save her troops from the army of the Prince of Conde (liberated by Louis XII. from the Bastille), wherein she had promised a cardinal's hat to the warlike bishop of Luçon. His influence over the fickle king raised her resentment, and she determined on his fall. Generous in her friendships, she would have sacrificed her best interests for those she honored with her attachment, though none could deny that her own imperious disposition brought on a large portion of the misfortunes that clothed her latter days in want and wretchedness.

Her goods confiscated, her remittances stopped, her faithful attendants shut up in the Bastille, the unfortunate queen was glad to effect her escape from the chateau of Compiegne, where she had fled after her last interview with Richelieu, to the Low Countries, where she was kindly received by the Archduchess Isabella; but the war breaking out between France and Spain, again caused her to flee, a wanderer, with but indifferent resources, to England, where she was kindly welcomed by her daughter Henrietta, wife of Charles I., of England. Amid all her wanderings, it was noticed that the widow of Henry the Great was accompanied by a stripling page, called Armand, a slender, dark-eyed, beautiful boy. Many supposed him the son of Gaston, Duke of Orleans: the more, that Charles I. promised protection to him, if he choose to remain in England. But parliament, with the redoubtable Cromwell at its head, compelled Mary to again flee, when finding her petition to the Parliament of France unheeded, the unfortunate queen took refuge in the imperial town of Cologne. It being free and neutral, she took up her residence there, her only companion, the handsome boy, thought by all to be her grandson. He it was, who in her last moments, sought out the Elector of Cologne, bringing him to her bedside; her conference with the elector being long and private, committing to his care an asbestos box, which she said would fully substantiate the stripling's claim to his protection—and then her care-worn, weary spirit departed to its rest. The young Armand, grieving deeply for the loss of his benefactress, accompanied her remains to France, where with much pomp they were placed in St. Denis, by the side of Henry IV. On that occasion he first saw the beautiful Henrietta de Montmorenci, daughter of the Duke of Montmorenci, Constable of France, and then the wife of the Prince of Conde. She had been brought to Henry IV.'s court in her fifteenth year by her aunt, Diana d'Angouleme. She was at that time contracted by her father to the great Bassompierre; but Henry entreated him with tears to resign her. He at last consented, when the aged king proposed in his stead his own nephew, the Prince of Conde, first prince of the blood, and heir presumptive to the throne, in case of the death of the two young sickly princes. On the occasion of their marriage, so munificent were the presents made the gay princess by the king, that Conde, fearing for the consequences, persuaded her to fly with him to the Low Countries, then governed by the Archduke Albert, who had married Conde's cousin, Isabella. Henry the Great mourned her loss as one gone frantic.

Meantime, the beautiful princess, caring much less for the king than the costly presents he gave, and the homage amounting to adoration which he paid her, soon wearied of the monotony of the Low Countries, the more that Isabella exercised a strict watch over her actions.

Determined to compel her return, Henry united with the Duke of Savoy and the Venetians, invading Spain with the most formidable array that had ever menaced its power. Meantime the princess saw with a feeling of exultant pride, like another Helen, all Europe in arms on her account; when Ravillac's assassinating hand, ever supposed to have been directed by Henry's vindictive queen, stopped the progress of the war by striking Henry IV.'s death blow on the very day following her coronation.

Sent to induce the princess to return to France, Richelieu had paid her much attention, insomuch that she accused him of being influenced by a more tender feeling than the interest of the case required, remarking pleasantly, "Mon étoile me destinait à être aimée par des vieux." Finding his love repulsed, Richelieu formed as sincere an attachment as his changeful mood could know, for her friend and confidant, Leonora Galligai, a beautiful young Languedocian, whom he after married to the man he caused to be assassinated, Concini.

When Henry fell beneath the assassin's hand he was not regretted much beneath his palace dome. The warrior was wept beneath the cottage thatch far more than the unfaithful husband by the queen within the palace walls, who ere he was two hours dead, had taken every precautionary measure to assure herself of the regency. Conde returned to France, and his wife shortly after rejoined him; her friend, Leonora Galligai, with her infant son, being in her suite, when accompanied by the Princess of Orange, she re-entered Paris, to rejoin her husband. The queen regent, Mary de Medici, forming a strong and enduring attachment to Leonora, placed her near her person, retaining her obstinately, long after Richelieu, angered at Concini, demanded of her to dismiss them both.

While Richelieu's cool brain was plotting the destruction of the woman he had once loved, neither his promises of protection, nor threats, could induce her to give up his infant son, whom she had confided to the queen's care. While Cardinal Richelieu was foiled by Leonora Galligai, in like manner did the old Cardinal Bentivoglio use every inducement to persuade the Princess of Conde, in whom he took a lively interest, to urge her husband to lay claim to the throne of France. Conde, however, indignantly repelled his insinuations, fearing that even should he attain the crown, the perfidious cardinal would prove as great a rival as Henry IV. had been. These men, whom posterity have called "the great," descended often to dark strategy when it might further their views. It suited them both, to affect unbounded friendship for the Duke d'Epemon, colonel-general of the French army, who having never been remarkable for his attachment to Henry, happened to be sitting by his side when Ravillac struck the death blow. He neither attempted to prevent it nor to arrest the assassin, but hastened to surround the House of Parliament with troops, and haranguing the members, prevailed on them to nominate Mary de Medici regent.

One of her first unskilful acts was to shut up Conde in the Bastille, where his beautiful wife sought permission to go, remaining with him during all the years of his captivity, leaving it but once, when she went to Richelieu to solicit the pardon of her brother, the virtuous and heroic Marshal de Montmorenci. The minister looked coldly on her as she knelt supplicating her brother's life at his feet, then raised her with his habitual gallantry, and in turn flung himself at hers. His suit was scorned, as it had been years before, when the irate despot, inexorable to her prayers, hastened the decapitation of her brother at Toulouse. Ever anxious to reclaim his son, Richelieu's hatred of the queen, and Concini, to whom he had married Leonora Galligai, amounted to execration. Urged by him, the young king, Louis XIII., signed his death warrant. Marshal Concini, arriving at the Louvre, unconscious of this, was crossing the court proceeding to the council, when the captain of the guard demanded his sword, the next moment he received three pistol shots, expiring instantly, Louis, standing on the balcony to give his countenance to the dastardly murder. Mary de Medici's apartments were next blocked up, and the beautiful and unfortunate Leonora Galligai arrested in her presence. Intrepid, though modest, she at first shrunk from the mob, until certain she was being dragged to execution, when occupying herself solely with her religious duties, she prayed aloud for forgiveness for her enemies, especially naming the cardinal, without seeming to heed the sentence which the advocate-general, Servin, refused to countenance, causing it to be annulled, that declared her son Gaspard Armand Concini, a bright, intelligent, beautiful boy, to be ignoble, and unfit to hold any post under government. Richelieu little dreamed that in the supposed son of Concini, he was dooming his own long-mourned, long-sought heir.

After a lapse of many years and wanderings, the stripling protege of Mary de Medici once more trod the streets of his native Paris, an officer composing the guard of the Elector of Cologne, on the occasion of the interment of his royal mistress at St. Denis. There he first met the Princess of Conde, who, accompanied by her daughter Anne Genevieve de Bourbon, was so struck by the resemblance of the young officer to her murdered friend, Leonora Galligai, that she requested him to be presented to her. Fortunately also for our hero, her sons, Armand de Bourbon, Prince de Conti and Louis II. de Bourbon, afterward known to posterity as the great Conde, took him under their especial protection, as one who had been from very infancy the caressed and indulged favorite of the late queen.

It was a dark and dreary night in the autumn of 1637, as a beautiful girl in the first blush of youthful loveliness sat by a tall, pointed, Gothic window of the chateau de Conti, in the old town where Mary de Medici had taken refuge from the tyrant of the bloody hand, Richelieu, escaping from the Bishop of Luçon into the old town of Blois. The young beauty was negligently attired in a loose white robe of gossamer texture, which, though concealing her symmetrical figure by its ample folds, still flung back at the neck, exposed a bust of voluptuous mould, while the small foot resting on a low stool, and hand of delicate form and whiteness, were true and unerring indications of her rank and position. Very pensive seemed the youthful Genevieve de Bourbon,* as occasionally stealing a dreamy glance from her embroidery frame to her superb mother, the still beautiful Princess of Conde, she would sigh, look out of the window, and then again resume her embroidery, as though her thoughts were far away.

Very beautiful were both mother and daughter, yet unlike. The Princess of Conde was a magnificent brunette, with dusky ebony tresses, while Genevieve's neck and brow were fair as alabaster, with masses of brown, waving ringlets floating unconfined over her rose-tinted cheek and snowy shoulders. While the magnificent proportions of the mother were calculated to excite passion, the vestal-like simplicity of the young girl's dress, and languid attitude, raised a sentiment of respect and love. The mother could fascinate, the young Genevieve would win. The large, lustrous eyes of the mother seemed lit more by earth's impassioned love, than a more celestial flame; the mild, hazel eyes of the daughter, according well with the melancholy languor of her young face and attitude, had all of heaven's purity in their soft glance. Pride reposed on the mother's haughty lip, while the flashing of her dark eye and the flush of her rich cheek told of emotions of love or determination easier raised than lulled; the sweet expression that wreathed Genevieve's told that the spirit was tractable and gentle, fond and yielding.

The chateau de Conti was one of the old castellated edifices of the feudal times: The apartment in which the Princess of Conde and her daughter sat, indicated the old fortresses of an ancient and lordly character. The window by which they sat opened on a balcony, overhanging the narrow street, commanding a view in either direction, of its low frame houses with their red-tiled roofs; while at the opposite extremity of the apartment a door opened into the chief hall of the castle. This door, like all in the portion inhabited by the princely family, was overhung by ample drapery. This was now pushed aside, and a handsome young man stood in the doorway. Pale and slender, though his slight form was well moulded, Henry d'Orleans, Duke de Longueville, was dressed after the mode of that era in France; his long fair hair falling upon his shoulders in scrupulously arranged curls. Making a telegraphic sign to the Princess of Conde, he released his right shoulder from the encumbering short manteline, while grasping the suspending chains of his rapier to prevent their clinking, he stepped lightly across the apartment unperceived by Genevieve, and placed his hand upon her shoulder. The young girl started and looked up, when meeting his earnest gaze she blushed, saying:

"You here, Henry? We thought you in Paris!" Then she resumed her embroidery.

"Well, certes, this is a pretty reception, truly; I ought to be in Paris, yet lured here by your bright eyes, Ma Bella, voici the thanks for my devotion!"

While he sat conversing gaily, the Princess of Conde left the apartment. No sooner had the drapery fallen, closing upon the flowing train of her robe, than the young Duke de Longueville changed his light bantering manner for a graver tone, as he inquired:

"Have you seen that young foundling of the elector's, Armand de Concini, lately?"

Genevieve blushed, and averted her head, remarking that she thought a maiden safe from a suspicion of wildering either protege or provencal in Blois.

"Are you sure of this?" he asked with earnestness.

"The young officer rode out here to Blois

*Afterwards married to Henry d'Orleans, Duke de Longueville.

yesterday with my brother Armand," was her quiet reply, as her two brothers, Armand de Bourbon, Prince de Conti, and the young Conde entered the apartment.

"Let us take a stroll, Longueville," said the elder, after some light, preliminary converse.

"What, in this narrow street; to get assassinated perhaps by robbers?" he said, looking at Genevieve as he spoke.

"Pooh; we wear swords!" remarked Conde. And the three departed.

"Now the virgin be praised!" was the exclamation of the young Princess de Bourbon, as opening the window she sprang out on the balcony. It was already dark. "O, if they should meet with him, and suspect—"

But her exclamation was interrupted by a hurried step, scaling the balcony's height, and lightly vaulting over the low balustrade, Armand Concini stood before her. In his face and form was embodied the perfection of manly beauty. Very pale was his young, intellectual face, contrasting with the waving black hair that curled on his fair brow. Though evidently very young, yet was his tall figure muscular, his countenance calm and dignified, characterized by an expression of seriousness, seldom seen in one so young.

"My beautiful Genevieve!" he exclaimed, raising her white hand respectfully to his lips, while she averted her face, murmuring reproachfully, "Ah, truant, I have waited so long." For thus are moments estimated in love's calendar.

"I loitered in the street until I saw your brothers pass by, accompanied by Henry d'Orleans. O, how I envy Longueville! Envy him the bright fortune to pluck Bourbon's matchless lily from its stalk. Nay, turn not coldly away, sweet Genevieve; what though you have pledged me your love? I have no right to accept the peerless gift. I, branded with ignominy from my early boyhood, how dare I think to mate the worse than midnight gloom that surrounds Concini's name, with the sunlight of your purity—with a daughter of Bourbon?"

"Speak not so gloomily, dear Armand. Come, you are weary, sit down by me here, and rest. I too have my tale of care," she continued, drawing a chair near her own, and pointing to it, while placing herself in the tall high-backed seat, carved with the crest of the Contis.

"No, not there, Genevieve; but here, lowly at thy feet." And the enamored youth, weary, exhausted, sank upon the low footstool near, regarding her for some minutes without speaking. Mute and mournful was his gaze, and deep and sad the sigh that broke the silence, as he said,

"As the protege of Mary de Medici, and the son of her friend, your mother welcomed me. I well remember the first night on which I accompanied the Elector of Cologne to Luxembourg—magnificent in its adornments, flashing with lights, and resounding with music. The scene was hateful to me, for there I met the arbitrary, priestly premier, Armand Richelieu, the tyrant of the despotic Louis XIII., with the malison of my young mother's murder enstamped upon his wan and wrinkled brow. Turning away from his execrated presence, I was about to fly into the gloom of night, when by the light of the flambeaux I caught a glimpse of that sweet face of thine, my peerless Genevieve, and those soft eyes returned my gaze—not haughtily; but O, how kindly! Again and again we met; sometimes at your mother's chateau of St. Vallery, where you wandered with me through the apartments of that old castle of the Montmorencis, showing me the haunts that had been my mother's favorites there; then we met at Notre Dame; at Fontainebleau; and at your princely father's chateau of Verteuil, in Picardy; and now again in your own native chateau de Conti, in Blois. To me you have been as a guardian angel, protecting me from very madness. Since your soft eyes wore ever for me one expression, the tones of your sweet voice the one soft accent, I felt that my soul was given up to their influence—that my reason was deserting me. Irresolute, wavering, doomed, I requested this last interview, determined to tell how devotedly I love, and then say farewell. With me, to love signifies a passion forming the very light of life, purifying the heart, consuming all meaner regards to ashes, becoming part of my very being; giving to my clouded life either a sunny hue, or shrouding it in more than midnight darkness and despair."

Genevieve pressed the hand that held her own, her lips quivered, and her only reply was a falling tear from her soft hazel eyes, bent down on him there—a tear that said more than any word might from those quivering lips.

"My property confiscated, my name dishonored, myself a wanderer, why do I linger near Bourbon's fair lily—the affianced bride of Henry d'Orleans? How ask Conde's daughter, the promised bride of the Duke de Longueville, to share my obscure fortunes, be my companion, mistress, wife?"

The princess turned away her head with a shudder, an expression of bitterest anguish passing over her pale, beautiful countenance. Concini saw this, and started to his feet.

"My dream is over! It was sweet; but, Genevieve, it is past!" He stood before her, his arms crossed on his breast, gazing sadly and earnestly in her averted face. Her only reply was a passionate burst of tears. "Farewell, sweet Genevieve, I go to my lone, desolate fate, leaving you to fill out your high destiny—farewell!"

The young girl extricated herself from his wild, parting embrace, and sank back into the chair, while he, vaulting over the balustrade, was lost in the darkness.

Upon a bench in front of one of the principal cafes of Blois, lounged the young Conde, his brother De Conti, and Henry d'Orleans, listlessly looking at the promiscuous company assembled therein, reading the latest edict of Richelieu, posted on the large pillars that supported the entrance room. Against each of these pillars was suspended a lustre, by whose light the various groups were commenting upon the edict against duelling, just issued by the priestly premier.

"What are they reading there?" asked the young Duke de Longueville, of a burgher who was sauntering out of the cafe.

"An edict consigning duellists to the gibbet, may it please your grace," replied the man, respectfully doffing his hat.

At the same moment, Concini entered the hotel, his eyes bent on the floor, his arms crossed on his breast. Enveloped in his mantle, his step was slow, and his air abstracted. Struck by the extreme pallor of his countenance, De Longueville divined at once that he had been to the chateau de Conti. Jealousy prevailed over his better nature, however, and he called aloud:

"Sir commoner, will you be so good as to inform me what all these people are reading?"

"Do you speak to me, sir?" was the haughty reply.

"Yes, to you, not happening to know what name you lay claim to, I gave that which I supposed you would understand."

"The edict, then, may it please you, consigns bullies like yourself to the gibbet."

"My valiant fellow, you somewhat mistake its purport; no power in Europe can gibbet a noble. Nevertheless, I hold it a wise purpose to hang such canaille as yourself, as the best means of getting rid of them."

"Beware, d'Orleans, beware!" cried Conde.

"You have called me commoner and canaille; I call you poltroon and coward! Can your dukesome highness comprehend the meaning of that?"

"Insolent! do you lay claim to any other title than that I gave?"

"What matters that to you? The blood that heaves my heart is as brave as your own."

"I had forgot; I had heard that you were the son of my kinsman, Gaston of Orleans, and being the protege of Mary de Medici, the chances are in favor of the report. I will waive my rank, and meet you. Your hour, and place?"

"The present, and here."

"Good. And your second?"

"Here!" And he laid his hand on the cross of his sword hilt.

Despite the furious remonstrances of the young Conde and De Conti, hats and mantelins were flung aside, and their swords unsheathed.

"Where take we our places?" asked De Longueville.

"Here, beneath the tyrant's edict!"

And planting foot to foot, the combatants glared fiercely on each other, crossing their swords, when suddenly a side door was flung open, and in rushed a captain of the night watch followed by a body of the guard, who, entering the cafe, expressed surprise that the assembled company could permit a duel to be fought beneath the very edict enforcing the punishment of death against such offenders. Disarmed, the two young men were immediately conducted to prison, to await their trial, and sentence.

Within a dimly lighted saloon of the old feudal castle of Beaugency sat a thin, gaunt man, whose cadaverous visage was impressed with an air of subtlety and finesse. A closely fitting red cap covered his head, from beneath which straggled a few thin white hairs, bordering his bald, furrowed brow. He was dictating to a page, notes and memoranda to copy. Another of these young striplings—for the old duke had a number of them, all cadets of noble and powerful families—stood near a door, whose richly gilded panels were of iron. On the outside hung a small gilded hammer, and this was now raised with a trembling hand and struck against the reverberating panels. At a sign from the duke, the page unlocked the door, pushing aside the ample hangings, when a lady closely veiled entered the premier's presence. For the old man with the close red cap, and gaunt lean figure, was Armand Duplessis, Cardinal de Richelieu.

"What would you, lady?" asked the cardinal, blandly. The cloak and hood were permitted to fall back from the beautiful head and shoulders, and then a smile of strange triumph lit up the old duke's cadaverous features, as his cold gray eyes rested on the magnificent Charlotte de Montmorenci, Princess of Conde.

"I have come to pray your eminence to spare those two unfortunate young men."

"This is a strange place to be honored by the presence of Charlotte Montmorenci; yet stranger is the interest she takes in an unknown foundling, methinks."

"The son of Marshal Concini is no nameless foundling; yet do I claim his life by the memory of his mother. Has France's premier no memory of Leonora Galligai?"

"A most perfect one, lady; listen, 'Mon étoile me destinait à être aimée par des vieux.' You see my memory is excellent."

The princess shuddered. "Is there no hope?"

"Royal clemency is a fragile hope to lean on."

"And yet Louis of France is generous, surely he will not refuse my petition?"

"And what of the king's pardon, unless I sanction it?" demanded the haughty despot.

"Alas! poor Leonora!" sobbed the weeping princess, "is all hope for thy son indeed lost?"

At a sign from the cardinal, both pages retired.

"No, beautiful Charlotte, not wholly lost. He who holds in his hand all the power in France, whose word is life or death, would reverse our position, becoming thy suppliant; telling thee now, as he did twenty years ago, that his happiness or misery rested with thy beautiful self. A word—say that thou hatest me not—and not only will I give life and liberty to young Concini, but restore his father's titles and confiscate estates. Armand Duplessis is powerful, yet is he but mortal; and must fulfil humanity's condition in loving thee."

"God grant me patience!" gasped the princess.

"Prate of patience to saints, fair Charlotte—Richelieu is but human!"

"Is my last hope gone?"

"You knelt and wept, praying for your brother, Montmorenci: I offered you his life and my love, and yet you let him die on the scaffold. Eight o'clock to-morrow decides the fate of d'Orleans and Concini!"

The next morning at eight o'clock, was heard the deep and sullen clang of the old tower bell. The prison doors were thrown open for the prisoner's last exit, when a confused murmur of the crowd was heard, then shouts of "A reprieve!" was followed by an officer of the guard, spurring a panting charger at headlong speed to Beaugency, followed by a dense crowd, shouting, "Pardon! a pardon!" The prison doors were flung wide to admit the feeble cardinal, leaning heavily on the Elector of Cologne, who held in his hand a small asbestos box, graven with the cipher of Mary de Medici. The officer of the guard read the pardon aloud, for Henry d'Orleans, Duke de Longueville, and Armand Gaston Duplessis, the long lost heir of Richelieu!"

THE FATAL LETTER.

BY BERNET HESTER.

It was almost dark in the little parlor of the cottage, which Mr. Mason and his daughter inhabited. Not that it was so very near night, but there were heavy, black clouds in the sky, which threatened soon to open and pour down a deluge of rain. The very air was heavy and oppressive, and the waves came rolling upon the beach with a long, sullen roar.

At each of the front windows of the cottage parlor stood a figure shrouded in gloom. Mr. Mason drummed upon the window-seat in a vague, uneasy way, seemingly unmindful of the coming storm and of everything about him, so intently was he wrapped in his own thoughts. His daughter stood gazing earnestly out upon the ever darkening sea and listening to its sullen roar. It was in the frightful pause of the elements, when they seemed gathering strength for some awful conflict, that the voice of Mr. Mason was heard, rendered terribly distinct to his daughter by the unnatural calmness that brooded over everything except the sea.

"Milly."

"Yes, father," said Milly, with her eyes still fixed upon the water.

"I do not know how it is," said Mr. Mason, solemnly; "but I feel as if something were about to happen to me—something serious. It is not often that I am troubled with presentiments as I am to-day."

"It is only the effects of the storm," said Milly, without changing her position. "You will be quite bright and cheerful when it is over, and, father, we shall laugh at your presentiments then."

The father leaned back against the window and muttered to himself: "She does not know—how should she? As if twenty years remorse could bring cheerfulness. As if I could be cheerful with this burning pain at my heart. I am an old man now, and could ill bear the sneers of the world—but for her, it is ten times worse. O, why did I yield to temptation! Why did I?" and he sank back with a stifled groan of anguish. "It will be lost," cried Milly, suddenly. "See, father, that small vessel lying so near the shore. They cannot know what a dangerous coast this is."

"Child," said Mr. Mason, raising himself, and speaking with a fierce energy, not hearing or not heeding his daughter's remark; "Child, if anything should happen to me, secure as soon as you can the papers in my desk—they are of great importance. Through them you will learn the secret of my life—the fatal secret, which has made my life a burden. And, Milly, you must promise to carry out my last wishes, which I have transferred to paper and deposited in my desk. Child, will you promise, even though it should bring life-long misery, perhaps death upon you? Promise that you will not spare my memory, but do what justice demands of you?”

“I promise,” was Milly’s low, solemn answer.

And then as if the tempest had been waiting for that critical moment to ratify the solemn promise just made, the terrible calm was broken, and there occurred one of the most sudden and the most terrific storms, which had ever been known on the coast before.

Both father and daughter closed their respective windows, but still stood in their former positions as if fascinated by the sublimity of the scene. Milly’s eyes were fastened upon the water, whose low, sullen moans had changed to a hoarse, roaring sound. But in the gathering darkness and the turmoil of the waves, nothing could be seen of the little vessel, which ten minutes before had caught Milly’s attention.

Suddenly her eyes were blinded by a vivid sheet of lightning, and the next instant there was a heavy fall upon the floor. Slowly recovering from the effects of the shock she had received, Milly’s eyes wandered around the room, while a vague and undefined fear oppressed her.

Right upon the floor where he had fallen when stricken by the relentless messenger of death, right in sight of his daughter, whose gaze rested upon the inanimated mass, lay the old man, who a few moments before had gloomily foretold his own fate. And still the daughter gazed on and on, and watched the proceedings of her old nurse, who vainly sought to restore life to the mass, with a sort of fascination, the horror of which no words could express. By-and-by, when the nurse had turned away sorrowfully from her useless task, the daughter came resolutely nearer to the dead, whose eyes had closed so suddenly and mysteriously upon the things of this world. Forever and ever had the light gone out of those loving eyes, forever and ever was the pulse still, and the weary heart at rest. People had whispered that he had been a hard, stern, even a cruel man. He might have been so to the world, but to his motherless child he was ever kind.

The expression of the dead man’s face reminded Milly of her last, solemn promise. She half fancied that the white lips moved as if to form the words he had so lately spoken—“Promise that you will not spare my memory, but do what justice demands of you.”

Half an hour afterwards, Milly was seated at her father’s desk, reading over and over again with a white face and compressed lip, a letter addressed to herself in her father’s hand-writing. And in the next room, which the old nurse had solemnly darkened, was that father stiffening in death, the lines on his rigid face growing sterner and sterner, making him look even harsher than he had in life. Without, the storm having spent its fury, was moaning and sobbing drearily—but through all and over all, was the sound of the water dashing fiercely, madly upon the beach.

But Milly saw nothing, heard nothing but that terrible secret, which the letter had revealed. The familiar sights and sounds within the house, the storm and the raging sea outside, even that terribly unfamiliar sight in the next room was nothing to her—nothing when compared with the secret of her father’s life.

Over and over again she read the letter beginning with, “To my dearly-beloved daughter,” and ending with his signature. Each word in it, even the smallest was weighed separately, until the reader again reached the name at the bottom. In the formal phraseology and the clear, distinct handwriting of the dead man was the following traced :

“I, Alexander Mason, being of sane mind, but believing that Heaven has heard my prayers and will soon put a merciful ending to my life, do solemnly affirm to the truth of the following. Twenty years ago, I was a lawyer struggling for competence. Though I was strictly honest and never descended to any meanness and had consequently gained a good character, yet fortune was slow to come to me. I was not over young, and therefore beheld with a keen disappointment the years passing on, which I had once fondly hoped would bring me fame and wealth. In the building, which I occupied was another’s lawyer’s office lower down than my own, the occupant of which I was very intimate with. Both poor and friendless, both striving for the same object, Frederick Vale and myself became fast friends—even our joys and sorrows were shared in common. In many respects our fates were alike—we had both known poverty in our younger days, we had been friends at school, at college had gained the same honors, and were at the time of which I write, both struggling for a livelihood.

“It happened one day that a man came to my office to abuse me for something, that I had said or done in a case in which I had been engaged. I did not pay much attention to his words, believing them to be the ravings of an angry man and of not much importance. Finally, when nothing else could move me, he taunted me with my obscure birth and poverty—he even struck me contemptuously. Then I could bear it no longer, but rising suddenly felled him like an ox to the ground. The blow killed him, though Heaven knows I did not mean it should—the next instant, I would have given worlds if I had had them to have brought my victim back to life. But he was dead—even my slight medical skill told me that; and in agony I turned away from the glassy, staring eyes, which seemed to reproach me for the deed I had committed. A thousand burning thoughts rushed through my brain with the rapidity of lightning. I saw myself dishonored, lying in a prison cell, while my wife and child were dying a horrible death of starvation. I saw my name a common by-word all over my native land—and last of all, I saw myself dying a disgraceful death on the gallows. One way of safety suggested itself to me, but by taking it I should commit another great wrong of parallel enormity, with this my first crime. But I could not resist the temptation, and consequently, at an hour when I knew Frederic was absent from his office, I removed the body from my apartment into his. I wished to fix the suspicion of the murder upon him, and I succeeded admirably. He was arrested, but owing to the absence of some link in the chain of evidence, he was acquitted, without the real murderer's being brought to light. But though Frederic went forth a free man, the taint of murder hung about him. People shunned him, he became terribly poor, his wife died of a broken-heart, his own health failed, and he became a miserable, broken-down man.

"I, on the other hand, grew rich and famous without a single effort on my part. But wealth and fame brought me no happiness—on the contrary I suffered the most exquisite agony. I declare before Heaven, that no punishment that I may suffer hereafter can equal that which I have already endured.

"To my daughter, who learns my crime for the first time from the perusal of this paper, I leave the solemn duty of making to those whom I have wronged all the reparation which lies in my power. To the dead I can make no reparation, but the living I may yet benefit by the admission of my crime. Every year since the fatal event, have I sent anonymously to Frederic Vale a sum of money—this has kept him above want, but has not placed him in comfort.

"I do therefore pray and beseech of my daughter, to seek out the residence of the said Frederic Vale, and to acquaint him with all the particulars which I have enumerated, that he may remove from himself the stain of murder, and fix it upon the rightful one. I do moreover desire that my daughter, having reserved for herself a sufficient competence, shall convey to the said Frederic Vale and his heirs, all the residue of my property, as a small atonement for the years of misery which my crime has brought upon him. In conclusion, I would humbly ask his forgiveness, and pray him to be merciful to my innocent child.

"And my daughter, my good, kind, faithful daughter, may she also forgive me for the doom which I have brought upon her. I know she will not falter in the right path, but will unshrinkingly pursue it unto the end. But let her remember, whatever is her portion, that Heaven is merciful, even though men are not."

Milly could not tell how long she sat with the letter before her, learning the words by heart, and endeavoring to comprehend the extent of her wretchedness—but she was aroused by the voice of her old nurse, saying something about the storm.

"What did you say?" asked Milly, vacantly.

"I said it stormed badly now, and that there were some poor, unfortunate men in the water, that they are trying to save. They are the crew of the schooner, that went upon the rocks."

"I will go down upon the beach," said Milly, rising with sudden energy.

"But it storms hard, dear!"

"I don't care for the storm, I must go." And as Milly spoke, she carefully locked up the fatal letter, and put on her shawl and bonnet.

"Then let me go with you," said the old lady, hurrying after her.

There was a miscellaneous crowd upon the beach—one stern group of fishermen stood close down to the water, which came rolling up with terrific sound. There was a look in their faces as they glanced intently off upon the water which told how thoroughly they were wrapped up in the scene before them. The flaming torches which they bore, whilst they revealed the expression of the faces, also showed one man with a rope twisted about him, evidently watching favorable moment to go out to the assistance of the poor wretches, clinging to the spars. The various fires on the beach showed other groups of men and women, all attracted thither by the horror and anxiety which human life in jeopardy spontaneously calls forth. Away from the fires and the torches, an intense gloom prevailed, and in this gloom a few yards from the cottage stood Milly and her companion, regardless of the rain drops and the wind, which threatened to sweep them away. The man with the rope about him was struggling with the waves.

when there came suddenly from the men on the spars a long, despairing wail.

"They are perishing, will no one save them?" cried Milly, starting forward, with a vague idea of throwing herself into the sea.

Some one came rushing from the gloom behind them, and in a moment more, Milly saw by the light of the torches on the water's edge, an athletic-looking stranger, wildly snatching a rope from one of the fishermen and plunging into the surf.

A time of awful suspense followed, and then two dripping men were drawn upon the beach—then others, who had battled with the waves, some with and some without a burden, were cast from the surf.

But the stranger was gone—a shout arose that he was drowned. Five minutes passed, a time which seemed an eternity to Milly, who had taken a strange interest in the fate of the missing man, and then another shout arose—a shout of triumph, for the stranger had gained the shore bearing in his arms an old, gray-headed man. The young man soon recovered from his exhaustion, but he, whom he had saved, lay apparently lifeless. A rumor went round amongst the various groups, that the two were father and son; but it did not reach the ears of Milly, for she was following the group, who bore the old man to her cottage. It was the nearest house upon the beach, and the easiest of access, but some of the little band paused as they came near the door, for there had been a rumor abroad that afternoon, that the master of the house was dead.

"Bring him in," said Milly, who understood their hesitation, "and we will endeavor to restore him." The young stranger threw a grateful look upon her as she stood speaking in the doorway, and then carefully bore his father over the threshold.

A clear, mild day succeeded that of the storm. But the coast for miles around bore witness of the terrific conflict of the elements. Milly was seated in her father's library when there came a knock at the door. She crushed the fatal letter in her hand at the sound, and waited for the appearance of her visitor. It was the gray-haired old man, whom she had restored to life.

"I came to bid you good-by, my child—but before I go let me ask you if I can be of any service to you? though I cannot repay you for all you've done for me. You seem desolate here."

"I am desolate," said Milly, with a cry of agony.

"Then call upon me for any service, as you would upon a father. My name is Frederic Vale, and—"

"What did you say?" cried Milly, interrupting him, whilst every trace of color left her face.

"I said my name was Frederic Vale."

"Then this is for you," and Milly, handed him the letter, and crouched timidly back in a corner.

He read it over once or twice, then threw it down upon the table and walked across the room in an ungovernable rage, muttering to himself:

"Justice at last—but it comes too late to bring back what is lost. But at least I may remove myself from the suspicion under which I have always lived—and my son, too, shall no more be pointed at as a murderer's child. Perhaps the coward thought I should spare him when he was in his grave, but I will not—I am not too old for revenge."

The old man had forgotten that he was not alone. In his hurried walk across the room he stumbled over Milly.

"How dare you remain here?" said he, fiercely.

"I have a right here until he is buried. Then I will go off and endeavor to earn my living—that is, if any will give work to a murderer's child! All his property belongs to you—I will not touch a cent of it."

"Child, who did you say was not buried?" said the old man, in a whisper.

"Come and see," and Milly led the way into the presence of the dead.

The gray-haired man gazed long and earnestly upon the face of his early friend, and then silently sank down upon the floor.

"Child," said he, after a long pause, "I was not myself just now. For the sake of the love I once bore him, I can do him no harm now—his memory is sacred to me. What matters it if the world believes me guilty, as long as I am not guilty in my heart? Therefore I will destroy the fatal letter, and the world shall be no wiser. And you, if you will, shall be my daughter, and I will endeavor to supply as far as I can his place to you. Shall it be so, my child?"

"Yes, my second father," and Milly also knelt down by the dead. In the doorway was a shadow, and Milly looking up, saw standing reverently on the threshold, the stranger, whom she had seen the day before.

* * * * *

A year afterwards in the same season of the year, there was a quiet bridal—the daughter of Alexander Mason had married the son of Frederic Vale. There was a happy family circle to celebrate their wedding, and foremost amid the group was a white-haired man, who blessed God for having given him in his declining years such children.

Curious Matters.

A curious pair of Children.

Mr. John Davis of Slaughter Neck, Delaware, has twin daughters, five years old, that cannot be told apart by strangers; and the nearest neighbors, who see them daily are not able to distinguish one from the other. A gentleman recently had the children brought before him, placed side by side, when he scanned every feature, determined if possible to show the friends present that they could be distinguished. They were then removed from the room for a short time only, and on their return he was completely foiled, and could only guess. A lady relative of the family, a near neighbor and frequent visitor, declared that she could not learn to tell one from the other though she labored constantly to do so. The only method for determining with certainty which is which, is by a small mark on the ear of one of them.

Strange Event near Rome.

A singular incident is mentioned as having occurred about twenty-five miles from Rome, at a country place called Sabina, near the Fiano district. Some laborers were at work in a basin-shaped hollow, when they suddenly felt a shaking of the earth like an earthquake, which caused them to run off to a distance. They then saw the earth open in the place they had left, and a black smoke rise; the surrounding ground seemed to fall in, and the place filled with water, forming a lake of about one thousand metres, which has been increasing daily in size ever since. The water is salt, and the general idea is that this is the site of an extinct volcano.

Power of the Sun.

A distinguished chemist, in a recent lecture, while showing that all species of moving power have their origin in the rays of the sun, stated that while the iron tubular railway bridge over the Menai Straits in England, 400 feet long, bent but half an inch under the heaviest pressure of a train, it will bend up an inch and a half from its usual horizontal line when the sun shines upon it for some hours. He stated that the Bunker-hill monument is higher in the evening than in the morning of a sunny day. The little sunbeams enter the pores of the stone like so many wedges lifting it up.

Mosquito Tobacco.

Mosquito tobacco is used in China for protection from what to us is a great summer pest. The ingredients are pine and juniper sawings, wormwood leaves and tobacco leaves, reduced to a powder; a small portion of un-icang and arsenic. The quantity of the latter is exceedingly small, and can hardly be injurious to health, as this tobacco is used by probably one hundred millions of human beings. The odor is not at all disagreeable. It is no luxury to the mosquitoes, for in two or three minutes after it is ignited, not a bug or mosquito is to be seen.

Mud Fish.

A very curious and hideous mud fish, from the river Gambia, which was kept in the aquarium at the Crystal Palace, London, escaped from his tank some time since, and wandered none knew whither. The other day, however, while cleaning out a large flower fountain at the north end of the building, the mud fish was at the bottom, grown twice as large, having passed his leisure time since his escape in devouring the immense quantity of gold and silver fish with which the fountain was stocked.

Catalepsy.

A gentleman, crossing a street in Paris, was noticed suddenly to utter the cry "O, my God!" and to fall upon the pavement. He was taken by those passing near him, into an apothecary's shop, when he was found to be pulseless and apparently dead. Attempts having been fruitlessly made to restore him, and having been pronounced by a physician dead, of an apoplectic stroke, he was taken to the Morgue, as no means of identity were found about the body. After having removed the clothing, as is the custom, and allowing the body to remain naked some little time, one of the attendants thought he noticed motion in one of the eyelids, and, approaching for closer examination, saw the other lid open. Stooping to ascertain if he breathed, he was astonished to see the man extend his arms and grasp him about the neck. In a few minutes he completely recovered, and then stated he was accustomed to such attacks of catalepsy, was aware when he uttered the cry of what was to happen, and was conscious all the while of what had been done.

An Autograph worth having.

When Dr. Mackay, now on a visit to this country, was editor of the London Morning Chronicle, Sydney Smith placed in his hands the MS. of his subsequently world-renowned letter on Pennsylvania Repudiation, requesting him to look carefully over the proof. Dr. Mackay retained his "copy" as an autograph, which now has a kind of historical value as well as a curious personal interest. It has one or two characteristic jokes, erased by the author as too broad. This autograph excited the admiration of a Boston gentleman, when in England, well known for his literary taste and publishing enterprise, and Dr. Mackay gave him an agreeable surprise, the other day, by presenting him with this most desirable production of the reverend wit.

Subterranean Discovery.

During the excavation of a street in Evansville, Indiana, the workmen came across the remains of a cabin eighteen feet below the surface of the earth. This wonderful subterranean house was about twelve feet in length, formed by upright posts set in the ground, and boarded up with split oak puncheons, secured by wooden pins. The posts, puncheons and pins were partially decayed, but still stuck together. Within the wall were found portions of an old-fashioned spinning wheel, a wooden maul, several pairs of boots and shoes, and the identical charred stick which the former occupants of the house had used to punch the fire with.

Extraordinary Lucus Naturæ.

A living negro child, with two heads, four arms and four legs is exhibited in Mobile. It is six years old, very intelligent, speaks with both mouths, sings well, waits and keeps time. This much the bill says, but the beholder cannot dismise from his mind that he has before him two children, though strictly speaking there is but one. The connection is with the spine, and the best physiologists of Europe and this country have pronounced it one individual child.

A voluntary Mute.

The Boston Traveler says among the inmates of the Bridgewater State Almshouse, is a man by the name of Shay, who has been there about two years, and who—although able to speak—has for that long period remained dumb.

A Romantic Reality.

The Cincinnati Gazette relates that recently a white-haired old man was standing in one of the market-places of that city recounting the incidents which had happened to him during a checkered existence. It seems that about twenty years ago he deserted, in a cowardly mood, his wife and three children, living in Lancaster, Pa., because he had no means of supporting them, and took to the sea, visited various parts of the world—Europe, the Holy Land, South America (where he remained several years), California, and lastly China—but in all his wanderings, poverty adhered to him, like the shirt of Nessus, and a few months ago he returned to New York, infirm, needy, and almost worn out. He commenced a search for his wife and children among his old friends at Lancaster, but the deserted wife and one of her children had lain years in the grave, and the old man again set forth a wanderer and a stranger in the land. Chance directed his footsteps to Cincinnati, and while relating his story to a group of listeners, as above mentioned, a young cabinet-maker paused to listen as he was on his way to dinner, and questioning the old man, discovered that he was his father! The son was a young man when his parent left home, but had heard enough of his history to know that the wanderer before him was his father. He took the old man warmly by the arm, carried him to his boarding-house, and will smooth his footsteps to the grave with filial kindness.

An Old Soldier.

There is now living on the Boulevard de la Chapelle St. Denis, Paris, an old soldier named Hermand, who was born on the 30th November, 1750, and therefore has entered his 108th year. He has received no less than forty-two wounds, and has undergone the operation of trepanning. Two years ago he was able to read without glasses, had the use of his hearing, and took walks alone. He retains his memory in an extraordinary degree, and relates, without mistaking a scene or a date, all the different scenes through which he has passed. His fine face served as a model to Ary Scheffer for one of his pictures, and he is also represented in several other pictures by the first French masters. The emperor has generously added 120 francs to the small pension which he receives, and has conferred on him marks of his beneficence.

Great Curiosity.

At a recent county fair at Barraboo, was a piece of a white oak tree with a part of an elk-horn grown into the solid wood. It was found a few miles west of Barraboo, near the river; the horn was discovered by one or two projections from the side of the tree which appeared like dry limbs, but which, upon attempting to cut them, proved to be horn. The horn, some four feet long, was found to be mainly embedded in the heart of the tree, but some of its branches or prongs projected from the side of the tree. A part of the tree, including part of the horn, was cut out and shown at the fair.

Curious Power.

Puff-balls, which you scatter to the wind with your finger and thumb, can raise huge flag stones; and an anecdote is told in Chambers's Journal of Sir Joseph Banks, who, putting by a cask of over-sweet wine for three years, at the end of that time found his cellar filled with a fungus so thick and strong that it had to be cut down with an axe, while the cask, which was empty, was carried up by it to the ceiling. What a good subject for a natural fairy tale! It is almost as beautiful as the tangled hedge round the castle of the Sleeping Beauty.

A Deserter in Disguise.

The following strange story is given by the "Droit:" "Some months back a bishop was celebrating Divine service at Corunna, and amongst the congregation was a retired soldier, who recognised the prelate as a man who had served as a common soldier in the same regiment as himself, and who, after long-continued misconduct, had deserted. Surprised to find a deserter become a bishop, the man made communication to the authorities, and a searching investigation was instituted. It led to the discovery that the bishop, whose name is Pereira, really was a deserter, and that after deserting he went to Portugal, where he gave himself out as chaplain of a regiment. As he displayed considerable knowledge of theology and was of good address, he was introduced to the ecclesiastical authorities of the district, and they after a while gave him a curacy. In this post he distinguished himself by his eloquent sermons, and after a while he was invited to Lisbon, where crowds, charmed by his eloquence, also flocked to hear him. At Lisbon, he was consecrated a bishop. In 1854 he went to Madrid, where his fame had preceded him, and there likewise became famous. He has been condemned to eighteen years' hard labor. The Pope has declared that all the ecclesiastical acts performed by the man shall be considered valid; but doubts are entertained whether the marriages celebrated by him are legally valid.

Pott's singular Dream.

On one occasion the famous Dr. Pott had performed a complicated and dangerous operation. He had seen the patient three times during the day; and during the following night he dreamed that the assistant at the hospital had forgotten to administer a particular medicine that he had ordered, and from which he had anticipated much good effect. He could not remain easy whilst this impression was on his mind. He rose from his bed, dressed himself, and in the middle of the night, without disturbing any of the family, went to the hospital, gained admission, had the house-surgeon summoned to his side, in order to satisfy himself that his instructions had been punctually obeyed, to his great astonishment he found that the medicine had not been exhibited! Pott always declared that his dream had saved his patient's life.

The Mystery of Felting.

Wool, when examined through a powerful microscope, gives the short fibre the appearance of a continuous vegetable growth, from which there sprout, all tending in one direction from the root to the extremity, numerous leaves like calices or cups, each terminating in a short point. In a fibre of merino wool the number of the serrations or projections amount to 2400 in the space of one inch. In a fibre of Saxon wool of acknowledged superior felting quality, there were 2720 serrations. Southdown's wool, being inferior to these two for felting power, only contains 2080 serrations in one inch of fibre, while Leicester wool contains no more than 1850 in one inch.

Remarkable Mortality.

In the Ely Cemetery is a gravestone, on which is the following inscription: "To the memory of Mr. Richard Worster, who died May 11th, 1756; also to the memory of his twenty-two sons and five daughters." The twenty-seven composed the whole of Mr. Worster's family, but not one remains; the mother of them all still lives, and is in good health.

The Florist.

The violet with purple eye,
The lily with its sunny cheek,
And all bright flowers beneath the sky,
Some great and holy lesson speak;
They ever take my heart above,
And fill me with a heavenly love.

Prints of Flowers.

The prints of flowers, plants and other similar objects can be obtained in great perfection by a very simple process. The mode of operating is as follows: the original being passed between a copper plate and a lead plate, through two rollers closely screwed together, its image, by means of the pressure, is left, with all its peculiar delicacies, on the lead plate. If the colors are applied to this stamped lead plate, as in printing on copper-plate, a copy in the most varying hues, and bearing a striking resemblance to the original, can be obtained. If a large number of copies are required, which the lead form, on account of its softness, is incapable of furnishing, it is stereotyped, if intended to be printed at a typographical press; or galvanized, if at a copper-plate press, and the impressions are then taken from the stereotyped or galvanized plate, exhibiting great beauty of appearance.

Soil for Green-house Plants.

More mischief arises from the use of improper soil, than any other cause. A large proportion of turfy peat earth is desirable; also a good supply of loam; and that sort obtained from turfs cut from a pasture as if they were for laying down, and stacked close until they have rotted, is best. The decayed vegetable enriches the soil, and when the grass and roots have rotted, it may be counted on as best for all uses. Road sand, if it has been amended with gravel, and silver sand should always be at hand to lighten any compost that may be too adhesive. If only one kind of compost be used for flowers, it should be one-third loam and two-thirds peat.

Rodriguezia—Secunda.

This plant is a native of tropical South America. It bears beautiful pink flowers, but there is another species which has generally drooping racemes of greenish-yellow flowers, more graceful than positively beautiful. All the kinds should be sown in mass, and they all succeed better in wood than in pots.

Monopsis—Lobeliaceae.

A very beautiful trailing plant, having dark blue flowers with conspicuous yellow anthers, and the flowers on long foot stalks. It is a native of the Cape of Good Hope, and should be grown in sandy peat. It is suitable for rock work.

Gelsemium.

A very pretty climbing evergreen shrub, generally kept in a green-house or conservatory. It is grown in a mixture of sand and peat, and is readily propagated by cuttings struck under glass.

Hamamelis—Hamamelaceae.

This is the botanical name for the Witch Hazel. It has the peculiarity of blooming during the winter, dropping its flowers only when its branches begin to be clothed in leaves.

Garden Walks.

This is the month when the walks should be attended to, and should be occasionally rolled, particularly after a thaw; and if the thaw be attended with heavy rain or melting snow, care should be taken to open the drains, and keep them clear of rubbish and withered leaves, which are apt to choke them up. Snow should never be suffered to lie on the walks of small gardens, as it is apt to render them soft; and gutters or drains should be provided on each side, particularly on sloping grounds, to prevent heavy rains from washing away the gravel. If the season is wet and rather mild, weeds will appear which should be instantly destroyed, either by hand picking or watering with a strong solution of salt and water. Honeysuckles, Clematises, and other deciduous shrubs may be pruned if the weather is open. Snails and slugs may be destroyed.

Lophospermum.

A beautiful climbing plant, with pink, bell-shaped blossoms, which grow luxuriantly in the open border, covering a trellis work or wall in an incredibly short space of time. As the plants are killed down to the ground in winter, cuttings should be taken off in autumn, and kept in a green-house or frame during the winter to plant out in the spring. The plant will grow in any light garden soil.

Veronica.

This is a pretty perennial, commonly known as Speedwell. There is an annual variety also—both are very pretty, bearing beautiful blue flowers. These plants grow wild in Britain, and thrive nicely in any common garden soil that is tolerably light, and at the same time moist; they are propagated by seeds and divisions of roots. Many of the kinds are suitable for rock-work.

Illicium—Winteraceae.

Half-hardy shrubs, with very dark, strongly-scented flowers, which smell like aniseed; hence the popular name of Aniseed Tree. They are very nearly hardy, requiring only to be sheltered during a very severe winter.

Rhodiola.

Rose-root this plant is commonly called, because of the thick, fleshy root smelling very much like rose. The flowers are yellow and terminal. Plants require a moist, rocky situation.

Sea Holly.

An umbelliferous perennial with blue flowers, a native of Spain, which should be grown in sandy loam. The peculiar bright blue of the blossoms makes it very beautiful.

Scottia.

An Australian shrub with deep red, pea-shaped blossoms, and quite hardy in our gardens in any common garden soil.

Box-Edgings.

The kind of Box used for this purpose is Buxus sempervirens nana. Any other species is more easily winter killed.

Jaca—or Jack Tree.

A species of Artocarpus, or bread-fruit—not beautiful, but simply curious.

Pomegranate.

The pomegranate is a very handsome deciduous shrub or low tree, which, in this climate needs considerable care. The fruit, which is of globular shape and retains the calyx, has been much admired for its form from earliest ages, and is one of the most conspicuous ornaments directed to be used in the decoration of Solomon's temple. There is a double-flowered variety, very elegant, of dwarf habit, and when kept in a green-house, producing its beautiful vermillion blossoms from August till November. The plant requires a dry loamy soil, south wall, and an airy situation. Much care should be exercised in pruning, not to cut out the small lateral twigs or spurs, as upon them only are produced the blossoms.

Saracha—Solanaceae.

These plants are both annual and perennial, and natives of Mexico and Peru. S. viscosa, which is the handsomest species, has large cream-colored flowers beautifully marked in the centre with olive dots, and which are succeeded by large red berries. When the plants are treated like annuals, the seeds should be sown in a slight hot-bed in February and the young plants placed in the border in May.

Santalum—Sandal-Wood.

This is a stove plant, native of the East Indies; though there is one species from New Holland. The flowers of the S. album, the true sandal-wood, are small, and are produced in spikes or racemes; but the great value of the plant consists in its fragrance, which is so great that the wood is burned for incense. The plants should be grown in light sandy loam, and kept rather dry.

Raphiolepis.

This is commonly called Indian Hawthorn. Very elegant shrubs, natives of China, with white flowers, the centres of which are red; the bark is also reddish; and there is a reddish tinge to the leaves. The species are only half-hardy here, and are generally kept in a green-house, though they will grow in the open air against a sheltered south wall.

Peristeria—Dove Flower.

A beautiful Peruvian epiphyte, which should be grown on wood. It forms a very handsome addition to a green-house, when hanging from a basket or cocoa-nut shell filled with moss.

Halimodendron.

The Salt-tree; it is a Siberian shrub, very hardy, and will grow in any soil or situation. When grafted on a laburnum it forms a very handsome drooping tree, with silvery leaves and purple blossoms.

Draba.

Very low plants, admirably adapted to rock-work, as in a wild state they grow in the fissures and crevices of rocks. They have pretty white or yellow flowers. The soil should be sandy and the situation sunny and open.

Hippuris.

Mare's tail. A British aquatic; sometimes planted in ponds, etc., to hide their termination, and to give the water the appearance of a natural stream.

Cyrtanthus.

Cape bulbs, with heads of showy tube-shaped flowers, cultivated like lily bulbs.

Woman's Love of Flowers.

In all countries women love flowers—in all countries they form nosegays of them; but it is only in the bosom of plenty that they conceive the idea of embellishing their dwellings with them. The cultivation of flowers among the peasantry indicates a revolution in all the feelings. It is a delicate pleasure which makes its way through coarse organs; it is a creature whose eyes are opened; it is the sense of the beautiful, a faculty of the soul which is awakened. Those who have travelled in the country can testify, that the rose tree under the window, a honeysuckle around the door of a cottage, are always a good omen to the tired traveller.

Ixora—Crassulaceae.

Splendid stove plants. The history of the Ixora coccinea, the best known species of the genus, is rather curious. It is a native of China, and some of the East India islands, where it is worshipped as a sacred plant; and where it is said to form a small tree about six feet high, rising with a single stem, and having its head formed entirely of clusters of bright scarlet and yellow flowers, whence it received the name of the Tree of Fire.

Coryanthes—Helmet Flower.

This plant bears a curious red and yellow flower, which resembles a skeleton's head, with the vertebrae of the neck, and part two folded bat's wings. The plant is grown in a pot in sandy loam, mixed with lime rubbish. It requires abundance of heat and moisture to throw it into flower.

Allamanda.

Climbing stove plants, with splendid deep yellow convolvulus-shaped flowers. A native of Guiana. They require a light, rich soil, kept frequently watered, and are increased by cuttings. If the vine can be introduced into a cooler atmosphere than the roots, the flowers will be much more brilliant.

Milla.

A Mexican plant, with flowers of the most brilliant and purest white, which continue expanded day and night till they fade. They will grow in any common garden soil, and only require a slight protection from frost, such as covering with dead leaves.

Dortmannia.

This is simply a new name given by Professor De Candolle to a common species of lobelia. It is an aquatic plant, and is generally found in ponds or small lakes. There is an American species with blue flowers.

Santolina.

Lavender cotton. Evergreen dwarf shrubs, which will grow in any common garden soil, and can be propagated by cuttings. It is well worth the little trouble required for its collection.

Dittany of Crete.

A kind of marjoram, with pink flowers: a native of Candia, which is quite hardy, but should be grown in rich mould.

Gypsocalia.

The Moor of Coorish Heath. Very pretty indeed, and should be grown in peat mixed with white sand.

The Housewife.

To make Coffee.

Coffee-drinkers should on no account purchase the article ready ground, for in that state its aroma flies off in a few hours; and the infusion is 'insipid and worthless. A small coffee-mill is a kitchen necessity, and can be purchased for a small sum. Purchase the coffee in the berry; grind it only just before it is to be used; throw it into the pot with one-fourth of its weight of chicory; then place the pot beside the fire, and let the dry coffee get well warmed, stirring it round two or three times to prevent burning; then pour on it sufficient boiling water; fine it by pouring out a cupful, and putting it back again; and in five minutes you will have a bright infusion, of far superior strength and flavor to any you can make by boiling it, or by the use of the ready-ground coffee sold by grocers.

The Best.

You will often hear a housekeeper who does the marketing, say, "I always buy the best of everything, and get the choicest cuts." But the best of everything, and the choicest cuts often make very poor eating, for the amount of good food spoiled in cooking is enormous. Give more to the preparation of food, before it comes to the table, and you may save ten or twenty per cent. by taking "cuts" of a poorer quality, and imparting to them delicacy and flavor. Here is a way to economize.

Eggs for Burns.

The white of an egg has proved of late the most efficacious remedy for burns. Seven or eight successive applications of this substance soothes the pain and effectually excludes the burned parts from the air. This simple remedy seems to us far preferable to collodion or cotton.

Fruit Puddings.

Make a crust same as for biscuit and roll it out, and spread it thick on the upper side with any kind of fruit you like—cherries, plums, or any dried fruit. Roll it up tight, put it in a cloth and boil it an hour and a half, and you will have a delicious pudding.

Foam Sauce.

One teacup of sugar, two-thirds of a cup of butter, and one tablespoonful of flour, beaten together till smooth; then place over the fire, and stir in rapidly three gills of boiling water; season with nutmeg. A very rich and delicious sauce for puddings.

Pickled Cabbage.

Slice red cabbage very thin; put on it a little coarse salt, and let it rest twenty-four hours to drain; add sliced onions if you like them. Roll four spoonful of pepper and four of allspice in a quart of vinegar, and pour it over.

To purify Water.

As much pulverized alum as will lie on the point of a small case knife mixed thoroughly with a bucket of water, in an hour will settle all impurities at the bottom, making it clear and pure.

Wholesome Food.

Apples and pears, cut into quarters and stripped of the rind, baked with little water and sugar, and eaten with boiled rice, are capital food for children.

Preventing Moths in Furs or Woolens.

Sprinkle the furs or woollen stuffs, as well as the drawers or boxes in which they are kept, with spirits of turpentine—the unpleasant scent of which will speedily evaporate, on exposure of the stuffs to the air. Some persons place sheets of paper, moistened with spirits of turpentine, over, under, or between pieces of cloth, etc., and find it a very effectual method.

Chicory with Coffee.

Shake the suspected coffee in water in a wine-glass. If the coffee is pure, it will swim, and scarcely color the water. If adulterated, the chicory will sink, and give a deep red tint to the water. Or, throw the mixture into a glass of water, a deep tint will be produced almost immediately if chicory be present.

Lemon Flavoring for Puddings.

Peel six lemons very thin indeed; put the peel into a glass bottle, and add a tablespoonful of bitter almonds, blanched, or the same quantity of peach or apricot kernels. Cover the whole with brandy, shake it frequently, and in a month strain it, and if kept closely corked it will keep for years.

Eggs for Burns.

The white of an egg has proved of late the most efficacious remedy for burns. Seven or eight successive applications of this substance soothes the pain and effectually excludes the burned parts from the air. This simple remedy seems to us far preferable to collodion of cotton.

Tough Meat.

Meat, if naturally tender, will be made as tough as may be desired by putting a little salt upon it, "just to keep it till wanted." Salt is an excellent hardener. If the tenderness is to be preserved, as well as the purity of the meat, a "dust of pepper" will do all that is needful.

To make Apple Pie from Pumpkin.

Select a good pumpkin, and cut and slice it very thin as you would apples. Lay it in the paste, as if fresh apple; then add sugar or molasses to salt, with an equal quantity of vinegar. Spice to the taste, and cover with paste and bake the same as apple.

Pomatum for the Hair.

Take one ounce of spermaceti, one ounce of castor oil, four ounces of olive oil, and two pennyworth of bergamot, and melt them together in a pot, placed in boiling water, stirring the mixture all the time; when thoroughly mixed, pour the mixture into pots while hot.

Delicate Cake.

Add to the whites of sixteen eggs, beaten to a stiff froth, three-fourths of a pound of flour, one pound of sugar, ten ounces of butter. Flavor with lemon or rose water.

Force Meat Balls.

Mix, with a pound of fine chopped veal, one egg, a little butter, or raw pork chopped fine, and season with salt and pepper, or curry powder. Fry them brown, done up in small balls.

Dysentery.

Milk and lime water may be freely used; or soda water and milk; when the patient is feverish, it should be iced. No other diet during the attack.

Arrow-Root Mucilage.

This is made by rubbing the arrow-root powder with a little cold water in a basin, by means of the back of a spoon, until it is completely mixed with the water; then pouring boiling water over it, at the same time stirring it assiduously until a soft, gelatinous, tenacious mucilage is formed, and lastly boiling it for five minutes. A tablespoonful of the arrow-root powder is sufficient to make a pint of the mucilage. It may be moderately sweetened and rendered palatable by the addition of a little lemon juice.

Remedy for Chapped Hands.

Take one ounce of bitter almonds; peel them and mash them into a paste with oil of sweet almonds and the yolk of an egg, adding a little tincture of bensoin, so as to form a thick cream. Now add a few drops of oil of caraway. It is to be rubbed on the hands at night, and a soft kid glove to be worn during the treatment.

To take Ink out of Muslin.

Dip the part stained with ink into cold water; then fill a small basin with boiling water, and on the top place a pewter plate; lay the muslin upon the plate; strew salts of lemon or tartaric acid upon the ink spot, rubbing it with the bowl of a spoon; the spot will then immediately disappear.

Lemon-Peel Tea, or Water.

Pare the rind of one lemon which has been previously rubbed with half an ounce of refined loaf sugar, put the peelings and the sugar into a jar, and pour over them a quart of boiling water. When cold, pour off the fluid and add one tablespoonful of lemon-juice.

Cure for a Felon.

Take a pint of common soft soap, and stir in it air slacked lime till it is of the consistency of glazier's putty. Make a leather thimble. Fill it with this composition and insert the finger therein, and change the composition once in twenty minutes, and a cure is certain.

Hooping Cough.

Half a scruple of cochineal, one scruple salt of tartar, and one gill of pure water. Mix them together and sweeten it with loaf sugar. A teaspoonful, a dose for a child, three times a day. This has been used in our family and found invaluable.

Remedy for Bronchitis.

Take honey in the comb, squeeze it out and dilute with a little water, and wet the lips and mouth occasionally with it. It has never been known to fail, in cases where children had throats so swollen as to be unable to swallow.

Roast Sweetbread.

Boil sweetbreads, either heart or throat; trim them and dry them; then egg and bread-crumbs them; brown them before the fire or in the oven; put good clear gravy under them, and watercresses, as a garnish.

Paper Hangings.

In consequence of an apartment never being too light—for we can always diminish superfluous light—paper hangings should be of a light color, that they may reflect, not absorb, light.

Stewed Beefsteak.

A beefsteak is much improved by stewing. The steak should be an inch and a half thick. It should be fried a light brown on both sides with two small onions sliced, then put into a stewpan with a carrot and a turnip cut in dice, a little celery, salt and pepper, covered with a little broth or water, and then stewed gently over a slow fire, or in an oven for two hours, when the steak will be exceedingly tender, and the gravy delicious.

Mock Hash Venison.

Two or three cloves, a little allspice, one table-spoonful of red currant jelly, a table-spoonful of port wine and a little water, thickened with a small quantity of flour; add salt and pepper. Cut the mutton in slices, and let it simmer a few minutes. Part of a cold leg or shoulder of mutton, very underdone, is best for this dish. Cover the bottom of the dish with toasted bread.

Toast Water.

Toast thoroughly, but not to a cinder, half a slice of a stale quarter loaf, put it into a jug, and pour over it a quart of water which has been boiled and cooled; and after two hours decant the water from the bread. A small piece of orange or lemon peel put into the jug at the same time as the bread, is a great improvement to toast-water.

Brandy Bitters.

Bruised gentian, 8 ounces; orange-peel, 5 ounces; cardamoms, 3 ounces; cassia, 1 ounce; cochineal, 1-4 ounce; spirit, 1 gallon. Digest for one week, then decant the clear, and pour on the dregs, water, 5 pints. Digest for one week longer, decant, and mix the two tinctures together.

Tennessee Corn Bread.

One quart of thick sour cream, one spoonful of fresh butter, one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in hot water, one table-spoonful of sifted flour, white corn-meal to form a soft dough; work well with your hands, and bake in a buttered pan. Serve very hot.

Southern Biscuit.

Two quarts of sifted flour, two large spoonfuls of lard, a little salt, two teaspoonfuls of soda, mashed fine, and mixed with the flour; sift both together; mix up to a soft dough with sour cream; do not handle too much, but work well, and bake in a quick oven.

Potato Coleanon.

Boil potatoes and greens, and spinach, separately; mash the potatoes; squeeze the greens dry; chop them quite fine, and mix them with the potatoes with a little butter, pepper and salt. Put into a mould, buttering it well first; let it stand in a hot oven for ten minutes.

To bone Birds.

Begin to bone any birds by first taking out the breast-bone, when you will have sufficient space to remove the back with a sharp knife, and then the leg-bones. The skin must not be broken; but the meat of the legs must be pushed inwards.

Custard Tart with Preserves.

Line a dish with puff paste, then put in some preserved fruits or marmalades, and add a good custard flavored to the taste.

Editor's Table.

BOSTON PUBLIC CHARITIES.

The poor and helpless are well provided for in Boston, as compared with other large cities. Not so well as they might be or should be, perhaps, but still far better than in almost any large community, whether in this country or in Europe. Occasionally a beggar solicits charity in our streets, and of late more frequently than usual, owing to the hard times and want of employment for labor; but so little is there of this street begging, as compared with other cities, that strangers remark upon the difference, and ask with surprise, "Where are all your beggars?" The charitable institutions of Boston are numerous, well provided, ably managed, and highly effective in ministering to the distress and want of suffering humanity. Of the city institutions the principal are the House of Industry, the Lunatic Hospital, and the Board of Overseers of the Poor. There are also fifty charitable societies in full operation, and ministering to the physical wants of the poor, and some of them as well to the moral need of those whose destitution has engendered vice and depravity. The House of Industry, which is the city poorhouse proper, is situated upon Deer Island, and supplies with food, clothing, shelter, medical care, and instruction, some four hundred men, women and children, who are chargeable upon the city. The cost of this establishment is a little short of $50,000 per annum. The city Lunatic Hospital is located at South Boston, and provides comfortably for about two hundred and fifty insane persons, at an annual expense of about $28,000. The whole number is not however chargeable to the city, and a part of the expense is reimbursed by the State. The Board of Overseers of the Poor is an incorporated body, having charge of certain trust funds which it dispenses for charitable purposes. The members of the board are elected annually, one from each ward, and they have the disbursement of a large amount among the poor, each in his own ward, which money is drawn from the city treasury. These disbursements are in fuel and cash, and during the year 1856 they expended about $48,000, mostly in this way, helping over four thousand people to fuel during the winter months, and giving money where needed. Of the fifty charitable societies which are the proud boast of Boston, a portion are for the exclusive relief of women, others for children, others for seamen, for mechanics, for natives of foreign nations, for clergymen; and others still, for general relief, without reference to age, sex, profession or country. Of the societies for women, we may mention the Association for the relief of Aged and Indigent Females, which has a large and comfortable establishment in Charles Street; the Needle Woman's Friend Society, the Fatherless and Widows' Society, the Society for the Widows and Orphans of Episcopal Clergymen, the Lying-In Hospital, for the benefit of the poor and destitute, and the Penitent Female Refuge, for the reclamation of wanderers from the path of virtue. There are nine different societies for the benefit of the young, all of which are well supported, and doing a vast amount of good according to their means. Among the principal of these are the Asylum and Farm School for Indigent Boys, a noble establishment on Thompson's Island, in Boston Harbor; the Perkins Institution for the Blind, at South Boston; and the St. Vincent de Paul Orphan Asylum, which is under the charge of eight Sisters of Charity, who support, rear and educate eighty orphan children, and instruct several hundred poor children besides. This magnificent charity is entirely supported by individual contributions.

For the relief and benefit of seamen there are the Boston Port Society, the Sailor's Snug Harbor, the Seaman's Friend Society, and the Seaman's Aid Society. These excellent institutions are well supported, and do a vast amount of good, in rescuing the honest Jack Tar from the harpies that infest his shore paths, and promoting his comfort and happiness. The Aid Society is composed of ladies, and their labors and influence are kindly devoted to raising means for the relief of destitute sailors. For the special relief of mechanics there are the Mechanics' Mutual Aid Society, and the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanics' Association. This latter association, in addition to its well performed charitable duties, has proved itself one of the most valuable aids to the growth and prosperity of Boston. It was the pioneer in the establishment of popular lectures on scientific and literrary subjects in this city, and by its noble exhibitions of mechanic arts, and its prizes for excellence, it has done most valuable service in developing the talent and industry of the State, and establishing its honorable fame. The Scotch, British and Irish charitable societies, and the German Emigrant Aid Society are all efficient in dispensing their valuable aid to the natives of their respective countries who need a friendly hand among strangers, and they are cherished and honored by all our citizens for the laudable efforts of their members to mitigate the hard lot of the poor exile. There is an Episcopal Association for the Relief of Aged and Destitute Clergymen, and the Unitarians have one for the same worthy object. Among the charitable institutions for general benefit, we may enumerate the Massachusetts General Hospital, a noble foundation for the relief of suffering, and for ministering to the poor; the Boston Dispensary, which furnishes medicine and surgical and medical aid to the poor, gratis; the Massachusetts Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary, also free to the poor; the Boston Provident Association; the Howard Benevolent Society; the Massachusetts Charitable Society, founded in 1762; the Charitable Association of the Boston Fire Department, and the Society for the Prevention of Pauperism. But our space will not permit us to dwell upon the subject, and our readers must estimate for themselves the millions of dollars invested in these numerous charities of Boston, and the hundreds of thousands that are annually expended.

CHILDISH INNOCENCE.—We have read that when a Scotch duchess, once "the admired of all observers," was questioning the children at one of her charity schools, the teacher asked: "What is the wife of a king called?" "A queen," bawled out one of the philosophers. "The wife of an emperor?" "An empress," was replied with equal readiness. "Then what is the wife of a duke called?" "A drake!" exclaimed several voices, mistaking the title duke for the biped duck, which they pronounced the same.

A LARGE BUSINESS.—There is a playing-card factory, in London, which consumes four hundred gallons of paste daily.

HARD UP.—A bankrupt merchant at the West says that his business has been so bad that he could not pay his debts even if he had the money.

EXTRAVAGANCE.—A purse which does not possess the clasp of discretion.

TEA BRICKS.

M. Huc, a Jesuit Missionary to Tartary and Thibet, informs us in his published travels, that tea is prepared by the Chinese for the use of the Tartars and the Russians, in the form of bricks. The coarser leaves of the plant and the tendrils are mixed together and pressed very hard in moulds of the shape and size of ordinary house brick. Thus prepared it is a leading article of commerce in those regions, and is known as Tartar tea: When required for use, a piece is broken off from the brick, pulverized, and boiled in a kettle until the decoction becomes of a red color. Some salt is then thrown in, which produces effervescence, and the liquid becomes almost black. Milk is next added, and the beverage transferred to the teapot for use. It is drank in great quantities by the Tartars and the Russians, being estimated quite a luxury, and made the Alpha and the Omega of every feast. When the Tartars can get butter, they mix that with the tea, and consider that it is a great improvement to stir in barley meal. What would our fine-spun tea gossips say to such a dish of tea as that?

MUSTACHIOED CLERGYMEN.

Nearly all the English clergymen living between two and three hundred years ago, wore the mustache. In a list of those who wore the beard on the upper lip, we find the well-known names of John Donne, George Herbert, Robert Herrick, Jeremy Taylor, Thomas Fuller, and Robert South. The famous John Knox and the celebrated John Bunyan wore the mustache; also Wicliffe, Cardinal Pole, Archbishop Cranmer, Bishops Ridley, Latimer, Jewel, Holbech, Thirldey, Goodrich, Skip, Day, Archbishop Laud, and a host of others. Yet Rev. Dr. Chapin says that mustaches are a sign of mourning on the upper lip for the lack of brains in the head. When Chapin shaves off his eyebrows, we shall applaud his consistency.

THE BUSTBODY.—He labors without thanks, talks without credit, lives without love, dies without tears, without pity—save that some say, "It was a pity he died no sooner."

A WITTY ROGUE.—A student in a neighboring college, being recently rather "short," sold his books, and wrote to his father that he was subsisting on literature.

A MIXED COMPLIMENT.—Kit North says that it is no wonder that women love cats, for both are graceful, and both domestic—not to mention that they both scratch.

THE ISLAND OF HAYTI.

What a contrast does the present condition of this beautiful island present to the aspect of its early history. As the curious mind regards its miserable and deteriorating state under the present negro military despotism, we are forced to recall those days when Columbus bore from its shores these wondrous tropical trophies which announced to Europe the discovery of a new world! The days when thither flocked, in search of gold and adventure, the restless and daring spirits of the brilliant court of Ferdinand and Isabella. Of what golden dreams was this fairy-like island the theme; to what brilliant prophecies did it give birth; how the ease-loving and indolent Spaniards revelled in its tropical luxuriance, and what a floral paradise it presented on all sides.

Though the most fertile of all the West Indian isles, and with the single exception of Cuba the largest, it is yet the lowest and most utterly degraded spot of its extent in the world. Within a few days' sail of our southern shore, yet nine-tenths of the people of the United States know nothing more concerning it than that it is the seat of a negro empire. Torn and distracted by civil-war, disgraced by the vilest immorality, and sunken to the lowest possible condition of existence, its people and present character are simply a burlesque upon humanity. Its slave-born emperor, who can neither read nor write, in his continuous debauches, is, if possible, lower in the scale of decency than any of his subjects.

In theory the form of the government is a limited monarchy, composed of a legislature of two branches, and the emperor, in whom resides the executive power. It is such, however, in theory only, being in reality a military despotism of the worst description. The members of the legislature are the mere tools of the emperor, used simply for the purpose of giving some slight additional weight and authority to his arbitrary decrees. All measures proposed by him pass unquestioned, it being well understood that any opposition would be promptly punished by imprisonment or death. In the emperor also resides the sole power of issuing patents of nobility and of appointments to all offices of honor and trust. His power is upheld by a standing army of twenty thousand men, commanded by officers devoted to his interest.

It is impossible, says a late writer, to give an adequate description of the Haytien soldier, which must be seen to be fully appreciated. The coat is of coarse blue woollen cloth, faced with red. The original colors are generally in a short time obliterated by dirt, and frequently, as it advances in years, it loses a skirt or a sleeve. The pantaloons are of tow cloth, and likewise bear the marks of rough and constant usage, being dirty and ragged, and occasionally the greater part of one of the legs is wanting. Shirts and vests are luxuries in which the Haytien soldier does not indulge. Their arms are in keeping with their dress, some having rusty muskets, some bayonets, some swords, and some all three. The officers dress as their fancy dictates and means allow—a wealthy corporal often casting in the shade an indigent general.

Coffee, one of the principal productions of the island, is a government monopoly. No one except the government is allowed to purchase it from the producer; and from the government the producer is forced to receive whatever price it chooses to allow. By the government it is sold to the exporting merchants, being distributed among them in proportion to the value of their imports. In addition to the oppressive character of these laws in themselves, they are rendered doubly so on account of both merchant and producer being obliged to receive in payment for their property the worthless paper currency of the country. This currency is issued by the government as occasion requires, and is the representative of no value whatever. At the time of the first issue its value was about ninety-five cents for the Haytien dollar, since which time it has been constantly depreciating, until it is now worth eight or nine cents for the Haytien dollar. The bills are clumsily executed on coarse paper, two dollars being the highest, and indeed almost the only denomination issued.

It would be difficult to invent a more amusing caricature of a monarchical court, its pageantry and nobility, than that at present existing in St. Domingo. Soon after his assumption of imperial power, the emperor conferred titles of nobility upon a large number of his adherents, which number he has since been constantly increasing with an unsparing hand, as no emoluments whatever are attached to them. The island consequently swarms with a needy and beggarly nobility. The Chevalier of the Legion of Honor of the Cross of St. Faustin begs pork of the foreign shipmasters, while his wife sells soap and candles to her neighbors. One may buy oranges and bananas of a duchess in the market place, or make the acquaintance of his grace, her husband, in an adjoining grog shop. Princes eke out their scanty subsistence by old jobs of tailoring, and countesses take in washing.

Nothing in the island more forcibly impresses the stranger with its degradation than the army.

When we reflect that, by these undisciplined and ragamuffin troops, whose appearance provokes the contemptuous mirth of every foreigner, a population of six hundred and fifty thousand people are kept in a state of subjection but little short of absolute slavery, an opinion most unfavorable to their capacity and intelligence is necessarily forced upon us. The naval force of the empire consists of four or five vessels of very light burden, and one small steamer. The vessels are poor, the sailors ignorant and undisciplined, and against a well-organized and determined invasion would afford no protection whatever.

WOMEN AND MARRIAGE.

Robert Southey, in a chapter on "Marriage," delivers himself as follows: "A man may be cheerful and contented in celibacy, but I do not think he can ever be happy; it is an unnatural state, and the best feelings of his nature are never called into action. The risks of marriage are far greater on the woman's side: women have so little the power of choice, that it is not perhaps fair to say they are less likely to choose well than we are; but I am persuaded that they are more frequently deceived in the attachments which they form, and their opinions concerning men are much less accurate than men's opinion of their sex. Now, if a lady were to reproach me for having said this, I should reply that it was only another mode of saying there are more good wives in the world than there are good husbands, which I verily believe. I know nothing which a good and sensible man is so certain to find, if he looks for it, as a good wife."

A DOUBLE PUN.—When Sir Richard Steele was made a member of the Commons, it was expected from his ingenious writings that he would have been an admirable orator; but it not proving so, De Foe said, "He had better have continued the Spectator than the Tatler."

RESPECT FOR WOMAN.—Those who respect, love and reverence woman, as true womanhood ought to be respected, loved and venerated, need no incentives to be courteous and considerate to their wives.

GENUINE ELOQUENCE.—A celebrated lawyer of Boston once concluded an eloquent harangue to the jury against the prisoner with, "He bared his arm to heaven and—stole the sugar!"

FRENCH LUXURIES.—In Paris, the police have caught men catching cats, to be sold at the low eating-houses as rabbits. Rare bits, truly!

MENTAL POWER.

Rev. T. A. Mills, one of the most practical, clear-headed, and efficient workers of our time, in his first annual report, as secretary of a permanent committee for the promotion of ministerial education, says: "A few years ago, on a wintry morning, a boy in the habiliments of poverty entered an old school house among our western mountains, and avowed to the master his desire for an education. There was poverty laying one of her richest gifts on the altar of religion; for that boy was Jonas King. On his humble shoemaker's bench, Carey laid the foundation of British Baptist Missions. John Newton found in his congregation an unfriended Scotch boy, whose soul was then glowing with new-born love to Christ. He took him to John Thornton, one of those noble merchants whose wealth, whose piety, and whose beneficence, increase together. They educated him; and that boy became Claudius Buchanan, whose name India will bless, when the names of Clive and Hastings are forgotten. John Bunyan was a gift of poverty to the church. Zwingle came forth from an Alpine shepherd's cabin; Melancthon from an armorer's workshop; Luther from a miner's cottage; the apostles, some of them from fishermen's huts. These are the gifts of poverty to the church."

THE COCOS ISLANDS.—The Cocos Islands, in latitude 12 deg. 5 min. S., and longitude 96 deg. 53 min. E., uninhabited except by one small British settlement for the manufacture of cocoa-nut oil, have been formally annexed to the British crown, with a view, it is said, of forming a depot for steamers on the Ceylon and Suez line, midway between King George's Sound and Point de Galle. They were discovered by Keeling, in 1609, and are sometimes called the Keeling Islands.

A SERIOUS QUESTION.—Why is a penmaker the most dishonest man in the world? Because he makes people steel pens, and says they do write.

HOPE.—The best definition of hope we ever saw is this: a sentiment exhibited in a dog's tail when waiting for a bone.

COURTING.—The man who courted an investigation, says it isn't half as good as an affectionate girl. We presume not.

REMEMBER.—Be cautious of giving credence to the ill you hear, and doubly so of reporting it.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH.

How strange that two nations, separated only by a narrow strip of water, should be so totally dissimilar in language, habits and tastes, as the French and English! The poet tells us that

"Mountains intervened Make enemies of nations."

Sometimes, however, only an imaginary dividing line produces the effect. A writer in the "Crayon" very happily, as we think, analyzes some of the differences between the French and English. He says:

"We find the English woman ever boldly grappling with realities, but the French woman ever striving to coquette with idealities; the one sternly faces the facts of life with clumsy pluck, the other gracefully endeavors to mystify them with a jeu d'esprit; the one becomes actually unlovable by a grim subserviency to facts, while the other is decidedly unreliable through a fanciful admiration of ideas. The English woman grows excessively selfish, out of pure consciousness; the French becomes self-forgetful out of pure vanity. The conscience of the one, however, is prompted by matter-of-fact considerations, and the vanity of the other by allurements of fancy. The selfishness of the English woman is, to some extent, atoned for by her loyalty to principle; while the vanity of the French is made palatable by her attempt to please others. The English woman wants to be respected, the French loves to be admired; the one, in short, tries simply to please herself, the other only aims to make herself agreeable.

"Sentiment is the ruling passion in France. The aim is not so much to do the thing, whatever it may be, as to feel it; to be pervaded with an affection for the idea and to express it. Such manifestations of sentiment are generally confounded with real actions. The French statesman, when he has made a powerful speech, smiles upon himself with ineffable satisfaction—the echoes of his sentiments are to him shouts of victory; he sits down to crown himself with laurels, and actually believes that his sentiments, his words, have saved la Patrie. The French lover presents the same characteristics of sentiment and vanity. He seems not so much to be in love with his inamorata, as to be in love with himself. He declares his love in the most bombastic terms, and the scene which follows is the dramatic incarnation of his sentiments.

"Open to ridicule, as explosions of mere sentiment without action always are, it should be borne in mind that the apparent egotism of mere sentimentalism is ever surrounded in France by a positive desire to please others. However much the intellect may protest, the heart is always subdued by this last and all-pervading desire. Exquisite politeness becomes the rule of social life; rudeness the great exception. The Teutonic element of thought, and the Roman element of ambition in the French nature, may be frequently baffled by their inability to coalesce, but the Greek sense of beauty in his character is sure to establish a species of graceful harmony, and whatever fault you find with a Frenchman, you are always forced to answer his polite bow—he is so desperately æsthetical."

A MILITARY TOAST.

We read in some paper of a toast, or rather a part of one, that was given at a military celebration some years since. A militia colonel was called upon for a sentiment. He arose, and thinking it must be something partaking of a military character, commenced with, "The military of our country—may they never want—" Here he stuck. "May they never want—" Stuck again. He looked imploringly around the table, when a friend, who noticed his dilemma, whispered, "And never be wanted." "And never be wanted!" shouted the colonel at the top of his lungs. Two heads are better than one, is an old saying, and the correctness of it was proved in this instance, as between them they manufactured the following capital toast, "The military of our country—may they never want, and may they never be wanted."

USES OF FORTUNE.—A good fortune, well spent upon objects of real merit, upon works of art, the cultivation of the mind and soul; upon the poor, the sick, and the struggling men of talent; upon the advancement of science and general intelligence, is a desirable thing. But how few acquire money for such purposes!

ENCOURAGEMENT TO SCIENCE.—The subscriptions to the new work by M. Agassiz, entitled "Contributions to the Natural History of the United States," amount to $1,250,000.

GOOD ADVICE.—If you wish a boy to graduate from the State Prison, you should let him pick up his preliminary education in the streets.

THREE THINGS TO BE DESPISED.—A brawler in a workshop, a fool in fine clothes, and a slanderer everywhere.

CARD-PLAYING.—Gamblers are always within an ace of losing their stakes.

A MARINE MILITIA.

According to the New York Journal of Commerce, the British government have lately taken an important step towards providing a supply of trained seamen for time of war. In the late conflict with Russia, the Lords of the Admiralty found themselves greatly embarrassed to obtain men; and Admiral Lord Berkeley was forced to confess that had it been a maritime war, the difficulty would have been apparently almost insurmountable. The seamen actually enrolled—nearly 10,000 less than were called for—were in great raw hands from the shore, and but faint imitations of the ready British sailor whose high reputation has been gained in many a terrible sea fight. The government, adds the Journal, have now determined to organize a volunteer coast force, consisting of seafaring men enlisted for twenty-eight days' drill and training in naval gunnery during the year, and paid a small sum, with free provisions and uniform. What progress has been made in organizing the force, the Journal is not informed; but the plan will doubtless be successful, and thus England will hereafter be prepared with a militia of seamen who, like our own volunteer land militia, will be ready at the first sound of war to take up arms in their country's defence, with sufficient knowledge of their duties to be capable of most important service.

REASONS FOR MARRYING.

If you are for pleasure, marry; if you prize rosy health, marry. A good wife is Heaven's last best gift to man; his angel and minister of graces innumerable; his gem of many virtues; his casket of jewels. Her voice is sweet music; her smiles, his brightest day; her kiss, the guardian of his innocence; her arms, the pale of his safety, the balm of his health, the balsam of his life; her industry, his surest wealth; her economy, his safest steward; her lips, his faithful counsellors; her bosom, the softest pillow of his cares; and her prayers, the ablest of Heaven's blessings on his head.

A CAPITAL PUN.—A gentleman having fallen into the river Exe, relating it to Sir T. A., said, "You will suppose I was pretty wet." "Yes," said the baronet, "wet, certainly, in the Exe-deme."

A CROOKED QUESTION.—A distinguished writer says that "nothing is best achieved by indirection." The workings of a corkscrew would seem to be a refutation of that plausible theory.

GOAT VERSUS CHINAMAN.

The Sacramento Age relates the following amusing incident: "We witnessed an encounter between a Chinaman and a goat, lately, which was probably more amusing to ourselves than to the Celestial. The Chinaman, residing near the north bank of the slough, had placed a lot of fish on a drying platform made of twigs, and, as is usual with that race, had arranged them with great care. A large he-goat, in his perambulations, wandered around in that direction, and thinking he had found a good place to sun himself, jumped upon the wicker platform, which at once yielded beneath its burthen, and fell partially to the ground. The Chinaman came out of his little hut, greatly enraged, and, swearing some Celestial oaths, picked up a club, which he threw at the animal, striking him on his horns and making him reel as he entered the neighboring bushes. John went to work picking up his fish, muttering to himself, when the goat, observing his stooping posture, came out, unobserved, and standing on his hind legs, made sundry comical gyrations, and suddenly, with extraordinary impetus, rushed upon the Chinaman, striking him in the most available point, and sending him down a precipice about ten feet high, in the descent of which he turned two or three somersets, lighting on his head on soil which had fortunately been moistened by the recent rain. The goat at once beat a retreat, which was creditable to his discretion, and the Chinaman returned to his work, exclaiming with indignation, 'He goatee no good.'"

THE FURS OF MINNESOTA.—Furs to the amount of $180,000 have been exported from Minnesota, the past year, being an increase of $3000 over that of 1856. The fur trade is an item of considerable importance to that territory, and is continually increasing.

A PERTINENT QUESTION.—Is it well for actors always to wear black wigs in Roman characters, when it is acknowledged that black hair was uncommon among the Romans, and that they had an aversion to it?

MISTAKE OF THE PRESS.—A Yorkshire paper, in recording the assembling of a regiment of militia, gravely announced that the regiment had "mutinied," instead of "mustered."

REMEMBER.—Beware of too sanguine a dependence upon future expectations—it has ruined many.

EASTERN LIFE AND MANNERS.

ARABS THRESHING.

The romance of Eastern life, though fast disappearing before the advancing strides of a higher civilization, is yet sufficient to invest the Orient with a peculiar interest in the eyes of the citizens of the Western world. An almost instinctive sentiment bids us turn our faces towards the cradle of our race, and we listen, with a natural avidity to accounts of the characteristics of the peculiar people who dwell in the land over which the day god rises, and who have preserved many distinguishing customs and observances for centuries and centuries. The tales of the Arabian Nights possess nearly as much charm for us, as we read them by our firesides, as for the bearded Oriental, who with the amber mouth-piece of his pipe applied to his lips, reclining in some Eastern caravanserai hears them from the mouth of a professional story-teller, the medium of the popular literature of the East.

It is among Eastern scenes that we propose to make a brief excursion with the reader, aiding our conceptions of them by glancing at the engravings from designs by a traveller perfectly familiar with Algeria, Egypt, Palestine, and Turkey in Europe. Our first picture is an agricultural scene. In the foreground of a level field, surrounded by swelling hills and ornamented with the graceful palm-tree, an Arab is employed threshing out grain by means of horses—agricultural machinery being unknown in the East. The horses are driven round in a circle, assistants turning the straw, until every particle of the grain is completely separated from the ear. The animals are fastened together and also attached to a post in the centre of the space round which they revolve. The practice of employing animals to thresh grain is of the remotest antiquity, and is spoken of in scripture. The Dutch at the Cape of Good Hope employ the same process, and the descendants of the Dutch and German settlers of New York and Pennsylvania thresh out their oats with horses, in the manner of the Arabs, to this day.

Our next illustration represents a group of Arabs returning from hunting the gazelle. This sport is one which they follow with the keenest zest. A trained falcon is used in taking this beautiful animal, as its speed baffles the fleetness of the swiftest hounds. The hawk dashes swiftly on the gazelle, and so terrifies and confuses the poor animal that it easily becomes the prey of the sportsman. The gazelle is the smallest of the deer family, and is exceedingly slender and graceful. It is easily tamed. Its large eyes are celebrated by the Eastern poets for their lustrous darkness, and no higher compliment can be paid an Eastern belle than to tell her that her eyes are like those of the gazelle.

The animated scene presented by an "Arab bazaar" next arrests our attention. Here are veiled ladies making their purchases of costly silks and perfumes, youths bargaining for luscious fruits, the returning traveller on his trusty camel, while the vista discloses that characteristic feature of an Eastern settlement the dome of the sacred mosque. The bazaars present the most ample field for the study of the European tourist, or the artist who wishes to familiarize himself with the costumes, manners and physique of the East. Here are to be seen those costly wares which have a world-wide reputation, the shawls, slippers, pipes, robes, sabres, dyes, perfumes, etc., much prized in the East. Jewels, fruits, the "kohl," henna and other articles indispensable to the ladies' toilettes, are here exposed for sale. All colors and costumes are mingled in the tide of life that flows among the bazaars. The Eastern ladies pay much attention to their personal appearance—indeed they have little else to occupy their minds about. They wear no stockings. Their pretty feet, undistorted by tight shoes, are as spotless and well kept as their hands. Yellow morocco, or richly embroidered velvet slippers, a kind of pointed shoes, without heels or lacings, are commonly worn on the feet. In their toilette they adopt many curious practices to heighten their natural charms. Instead of allowing their eyebrows to grow freely, they diminish their breadth, and preserve only a very narrow arch. They dye the edge of the lids black with a preparation of antimony called kohl. To heighten the whiteness of their skin, they commonly dye their nails, the ends of their fingers and the soles of their feet black and red, with a preparation of the leaves of the henna, the launsonia inermis of Linnæus. Large black eyes, shaded with long lashes, and sparkling with vivacity, impart a grand expression to their countenances. Their noses are small, and often slightly flattened. They have large but well formed mouths, although the lips are sometimes thick. Their teeth are very even and brilliantly white, and contrast with their complexions. They are generally remarkable for the elegance of their shape. The vertebral column is arched, the limbs regular and rounded, the hands and feet small and smooth. The bust is large and well developed, and undisfigured, as in Europe, by the tyranny of fashion. Their step is light and firm; their attitudes majestic; their gestures, full of grace, remind you of the souvenirs of antiquity of which they have preserved some practices and traits of resemblance.

The large engraving which follows represents the arrival of a band of travellers at one of those diamonds of the desert, an oasis with its welsome spring of water. They are like sunny spots in the waste of a fruitless life. If the desert has been like to the ocean, the camel to the ship, then these verdurous patches are islets in the sand-deep. Who can describe the joy of the caravan, as after toiling through many weary miles of burning sand, the supply of water nearly exhausted, even the patient and long-enduring camels showing tokens of suffering, the feathery crown of the palm-trees, serving as landmarks, indicates that the place of rest and refreshment is near at hand,—where the hand of God has placed an ever-during fountain, and the hand of man walled in and fenced it from injury. Fatigue, even despair, is forgotten in a moment. Every foot regains its elasticity. The horses and camels, surer in their instincts than man in his reason, feel that relief is at hand, and need no urging to press forward. And O the delicious draughts of gladness that are quaffed from that abounding fountain. The halt of a caravan in a well is one of the most interesting episodes of desert life.

The next picture delineates the Arab's tent, his movable home, all the house that he can call his own in his long wanderings. Here he finds shelter from the parching rays of the noon-day sun, and rest after the fatiguing journey of the day. To this tent the stranger who claims hospitality is ever welcome, and though the host might rob the same man if he met him in the desert, still he is secure from pillage when once beneath the shadow of the tent. A violation of the rites of hospitality, in this respect, is very rare, and is as very discreditable. Still, I am reminded, some time ago, that an Arab of the tribe of Zerdesas, who was going to Constantine (in Algeria), to buy cattle, was plundered in a douar of Hamma, a village on the road to Philipeville, where hospitality had been accorded him. The sight of his girdle, swelled with specie, was the cause of this violation of the sacred rites of hospitality. When he had partaken of a hearty supper, and was sound asleep, his disloyal entertainers seized him, tied his hands behind him, gagged him to prevent his outcries, then took his money, unbound him, but did not remove the gag. When his hands were once free, our hero, who did not lack courage, was suddenly inspired with an idea which he acted on. Seizing his knife, he cut off a piece of his burnoos, dug a hole in the ground opposite the offending tent, and placed the fragment of cloth in it. This operation accomplished, he went to Constantine with all possible speed, where his first care was to lodge a complaint before the Arabic bureau. "Hast thou witnesses?" asked the officer. "No, Sidi," replied the Arab; "but you can send and seek for the guilty ones." These last, arrested and brought before the officer by the Moorish police, energetically denied the theft, and declared that they did not know the complainant. The latter, then, showing the hem of his garment from which the piece had been cut, related what he had done, and indicated the precise spot where the officers would find the piece, buried before the robbers' tent. This was done, and the fragment fitting the gap exactly, the chief ordered the accused to restore the stolen money, inflicted a heavy fine upon them, and, moreover, sent them to prison.

The last engraving of this series represents the females of an Arab family preparing food. The burthen of domestic labors of all kinds falls upon the women, the men, like the Indian chiefs of North America, deeming it a degradation to engage in them. The women, whatever may be thought of the style of their gastronomy, are very dexterous in their performance of culinary operations, baking and broiling even when mounted on camels, in the case of a retreat before an advancing enemy. Ordinarily the cooking is done in the manner represented in our sketch.

Though retaining many of the traits and customs of their ancestry, and occasionally boasting of some chief, such as Abd-el-Kader, worthy of their old renown, the Arabs of to-day are a sadly degenerate race. The invasion of the west by the Arabs, in the 7th century, is, without question, one of the most surprising revolutions in the history of humanity. In the Asiatic peninsula designated by the name of Arabia, lived, from time immemorial, a people who, although they had acted as intermediaries in the commerce of Europe and Asia, never felt any of those great shocks of which the East had been the theatre. Their sands or their valor had always shielded them from foreign invasions and conquests; they had never experienced the want of changing their country, or of exercising any influence whatever on the destinies of the world. If, as certain philologists assert, they had at one time extended outwardly, they soon fell back on their peninsula, and there their independent and solitary existence surrendered them to all the influences of the soil they inhabited. "The earth," says a contemporary writer, "had acted profoundly on man, and in the midst of their constantly-moving sands, the Arabs had accustomed themselves to a wandering and vagabond life, and ceaseless evolutions. No common centre, on this shifting ground, had been able to group their numerous tribes, which seemed constantly to float at hazard in a wild independence. They lived without order or rule. The anarchy which consumed them armed them continually against each other, and they wore out, in these intestine struggles, the energy peculiar to their race." Their religion had first been Sabbatism, that is to say, the belief in a divinity chiefly inhabiting heaven; but, at the same time, spread throughout the whole universe, and communicating to all things, through the medium of the stars, motion and life; one in his essence, manifold in his exterior manifestations, appearing in the world in various forms, which were his successive personifications, and which changed incessantly from one to the other; a god, in a word, the cause and material of a universe and eternal metamorphosis, very similar to the divinities of India, and the god of the Stoic philosophy. This religion they dated back to Abraham, the father of Ishmael, and first author of their race. They ended by sinking into a superstitious adoration, either of celestial bodies, or of terrestrial symbols, designed to represent them on the earth, temples, idols, sacred stones, amulets, etc., and their religion was almost entirely changed into a gross idolatry.

This people, who lived in ignorance, almost unknown by the rest of the world, and who hardly knew their own history, were yet summoned, in the 7th century, to high and glorious destinies. The old world had just perished; the new world was not yet born. To the painful death throes of antiquity succeeded, amid a terrific chaos, the laborious birth of the modern age. For the accomplishment of this great transformation of humanity, it was necessary that the East and the North should strive together, and mingle, in some way, on the battle-fields of the West. In this encounter, and necessary commingling of all the great races, the Arab nation was the champion, the representative of Asia, the oriental element. They possessed, in fact, all the qualities useful to the great part they were going to perform for the first time in the history of the world. They were young—so young that they had hardly passed the bounds of infancy; they had the force, the fire, the daring, the faith and the courage of youth; they were not only brave, they knew how to fight; for their internal struggles had, for a long time, accustomed them to the difficulties and dangers of war; if they cultivated neither the arts nor the sciences, if they did nothing but pillage or raise flocks, they were apt for everything; if they sometimes were guilty of acts of rapine and cruelty, they often showed themselves great, noble and generous. They had ardent imaginations; they loved poetry passionately; they spoke a magnificent language; in fine, they were as little attached to the earth as the burning sands in the midst of which they had wandered, the sport of chance, for so many centuries with their flocks. As the writer above quoted says, they had only to trace a path in the stormy waves which beset them, to make a river, broad and deep, capable of sweeping away, in its course, nations and empires. The pathway was traced, and the river rolled, at the command of Mahomet, the last of the prophets, as the Arabs call him. Who knows not that, at the voice of this man of genius, the Arabs, before so divided, rushed, as one man, and with irresistible fervor and enthusiasm, to the conquest of the entire world? Who is not aware that if Karl Martel had not arrested them at Poitiers, they would have realized the dream of their ambition, which was to supplant by violence, everywhere, Christianity by Mahometanism? Who has not remarked that, as soon as they had quitted their native land, they became civilized and civilizing, pouring forth a torrent of imagination and learning; that they cultivated, with marvellous success, arts, sciences and letters, while all the rest of Europe was plunged in profound barbarism; that their civilization perished with them, when they were driven from the countries they had conquered; and that, after Mahomet, Arabia, becoming what she was before him, relapsed into that stagnant, motionless condition in which we now behold her plunged?

The Arabs of to-day live as in the time of Abraham, in the same patriarchal simplicity, the same love of independence, the same disdain of civilization. The Arab only knows the teaching of his prophet. There is all his science; he admits no other. Thus the Koran is the Alpha and Omega, and the encyclopedia of the Arabs. The children learn to read in the Koran; the young people learn its verses by heart; the women wear them in amulet-bags in their bosoms; in a word, outside of the Koran, nothing exists, nothing is done. It is the civil and religious law of the Mussulman.

The Arab is in all points modelled on the type of his prophet Mahomet. Loving com-mercy, he is a shepherd, trader and traveller; on the other hand he detests manual labor and submits to it with regret. The Arab women do all the work in the tribes. They are at once millers, bakers, cooks, washerwomen, tailoresses, etc.; they serve as factotums to their lords and masters, demigods who despise work, who kill time by riding in fantasias, or enjoying their eternal far-niente in the sun.

The Arab has an instinctive repugnance to our civilization, with its glorification of labor, to our manners, to all our customs and our dress. When the Arabs of the desert celebrate their carnival, they dress a negro in our clothes, and parade him about through a town, playing the derbouka amidst the inextinguishable laughter of the crowd. It is the same with the tent which suits the nomadic and religious life of the Arab.

Like Anteus, he finds the secret of his strength, his power and heroic resignation in the touch of his native soil. The earth is at once the temple, the pavement, the footstool and the pillow of the child of Ishmael. Other reasons also induce him to prefer the tent to the European dwelling. In it he can receive his domestic animals: the horse, goat, sheep and dog are, to a certain extent, a part of the Arab family. The horse plays with his children, who clamber boldly over its legs; the dog devours the fragments left in the wooden bowl from which his master has just eaten; the goats and sheep sleep with him. In a word, the animal is a member of the corporation, a guest of the tribe, an inferior brother.

European writers have generally pronounced erroneous judgments on the Arabs. Although less civilized, the sons of Ishmael may boast themselves our masters in many things. They possess instincts more powerful and vigorous than ours. They are tormented neither by our complex wants nor by our multiple ideas. They know not our unbridled ambitions, our feverish anxieties, our mean self-love, our versatile passions, our feelings of envy, our insatiable desires, our discouragements and deceptions. God and the desert suffice for their aspirations. The ideal of the Arabs is to make the Mecca pilgrimage. While we expand our attention over a thousand books and millions of papers, they concentrate theirs on a single work—the Koran.

The Arabs oppose to our daily anxieties an unalterable quiet, a holy resignation to the inevitable evils of destiny, to our mental doubts, a divine love, to our meannesses an admirable loftiness; in a word, they possess the strength, the majesty and the virtues imparted by a constant communion with nature. We can teach them arts and sciences, but they can teach us the dignity of life.

The first thing that strikes a stranger on visiting an Arab settlement is the admirable serenity of its inhabitants. These men, enveloped in their woollen rags, walk with the pride of victors. You would think them demi-gods, whose constantly placid souls do not participate in the sufferings of humanity. You would think these beings, living on water, figs and barley bread, travelling through dust, and sleeping on the ground, exposed to the vicissitudes of the weather, wretched, but to them, joy and grief, everything, is comprised in two words—sun and rain.

The Arab, like other people, elsewhere, is only a reflection of his universe. He who has seen the sky of these regions, the immense sands of the desert, the tortured mountains of Tell representing the petrified waves of a furious sea; he who has felt his passions rise in contact with a tropical sun inflaming infinite space, or dreamed in fresh and limpid nights under the olives and palms of the oasis, knows, as well as if he had passed his life in a douar, the moral physiognomy of the Arab, severe and voluptuous, fiery in action, motionless in repose, hospitable and cruel, adventurous and resigned, intelligent, enthusiastic and ignorant.

Man and the earth have a co-relation too intimate not to resemble each other. African nature which proceeds by powerful manifestations, by bold jets, by grand and serene lines, explains the calm fanaticism, the poetical dignity of the Arab, and his poetical manner of accepting life.

For a European, there is no spectacle more curious and instructive than that of a market-place, for the Arabs having neither court-house, nor prison, nor exchange, nor board of commerce, nor newspapers, the legal and commercial transactions are conducted in the broad daylight on the public square. In Africa, the natives do not go to market only to buy and sell; relations and friends of different tribes meet there and testify the liveliest sympathy by numberless manifestations. They accost each, kissing the head as high as the temples, and touch the bornouse with an eager hand, which they afterward press to their lips. The old men (the sheiks) are the object of universal attention. It is a picture worthy of antiquity. Each one strives to be the first to meet them and press their garments to his lips. To these demonstrations the sheiks invariably reply, "May Allah bless thee! may Mahomet enlighten thy path!"

Conversation then commences. Leading each other by the hand, they go and sit where they can converse at ease, on the carpets of the Moorish coffee-houses, or listen to the songs of wandering troubadours, who, crouching like sphynxes, chant romances in a plaintive tone, accompanying themselves with the flute, the monochord and the bendair (tambourine).

What delicious hours of far niente glide away in listening to this strange music in the Moorish coffee-houses of Tlemecan! The readers of the Magazine may be gratified with the following literal translation of one of these Arab songs:

"O, thou who art white as the jessamine, with the step of a gazelle, I swear by thy bright eyes that I am the slave of their lustrous beams.

"The pomegranate glows upon thy cheeks. In the excess of my transport, I exclaimed, 'Ah, her beauty is a net that I cannot escape!'

"My trouble exceeds all troubles. Delicate houri, whose movements full of grace bear away the palm from the waving of green branches, when shall I be united to the object of my adoration, to end the torments which steal sleep from my eyelids?

"Come in the morning to my garden watered with the dews of heaven. Spring comes to bring us flowers; its path is sweet as that of the zephyr; the dew, like pearls at random scattered, exhales the odor of musk.

"My gazelle has said, 'Behold me! I have come to seek thee. The laurel-roses bow their heads to greet us; the odor we breathe from the balmy cheeks of the orange would animate the ashes of the dead.'"

At the markets also, quarrels are ended, lawsuits settled, and judicial courts held in the open air. The Arab tribunal is composed of a single aga, distinguished by his rich costume, his straw hat colored and adorned with ostrich plumes, and his bornouse of fine wool. Beside the aga, a secretary writes with a palm leaf pen the plaintiff's reasons, the observations of the accused, and the depositions of the witnesses. The aga, with perfect imperturbability, decrees a fine of ten boudjouds, orders fifty blows of the matrak (stick).

fixes his seal to the secretary's parchment, and all is said and done. In half an hour, the aga in this way despatches three or four cases.

It is not rare to see marabouts holding lions in leashes, like dogs, in the market-places. The Arabs, who are very credulous, attribute the surprising docility of the lion that formerly decimated their flocks, but is led about in the markets and settlements by a slender cord of the palm-tree fibre which a child could break, to the religious virtue and mystic power of the priest. "A few verses," they say, "was enough to ac-comply with this miraculous work." Thus many marabouts, who subsist entirely on Mussulman charity, see the dinans and boudjouds raining into the hoods of their bornouses. Still, the Arabs, credulous as they may be, watch the slightest movement of the lion, and prudently give his majesty a wide berth. But there is no instance of any accidents happening from this public exhibition of lions.

Nothing is more picturesque than the arrival of a caravan from Sahara in the midst of a market-place. Those "desert-ships," the camels, in coming into port, make the most horrible noises, springing from side to side, and dancing in the most grotesque manner, keeping their tubercular spines in constant motion, and stretching their yawning heads towards the camel driver, who, bending over their necks, can hardly make them lie down to discharge his cargo of

There was not in the whole crowd such an expression of wild haughtiness. The proud head of the lion alone offered an analogy to the manly physiognomy of the camel-driver.

"I could not weary of studying this sphynx of the desert. I analyzed his life; I incarnated myself in him; I could have wished to follow him into the immense solitudes which he must have traversed to bring his cargo of woollens. What fatigues he had undergone! what dangers he had incurred! but what a spectacle he had beheld! An atmosphere of warm vapors forms the mirage and veils the horizon. Mid fiery sands which undulate in space like a sea with golden waves, the caravan, indolent and confident in God, follows the furrow traced by the pilots of Sahara. A sweep from the wing of the terrible south wind, the simoom, telegraphic steps effaced by a whirlwind of sand, are enough to mislead or en-woollens and dates, which the Jews hasten to receive and carry off. Meanwhile, our camel-driver, seated on the crupper of one of his beasts, pulls a pipe filled with aromatic herbs out of his djebira, and sets himself quietly to smoking.

"I shall always remember," writes Gastineau, "the character of simplicity, nobility and religious tranquillity of an Arab of the desert whom I saw at Tlemecen. A full black eye, accustomed to contemplate the broad horizon of Sahara, to discover the passage of nomadic tribes upon the sand, lighted up an acute facial angle like a pharos, and an ascetic visage dried to parchment by the sun. Two pieces of goatskin tied by strings to his feet, an old woollen shirt (habaya) torn and loaded with dust, under which a dry and nervous body was distinguishable, a red cap covered by a haik, bound to his head by a camel's-hair rope, composed his whole costume.

gulph the caravan; but on the other hand, how glorious to strive with the desert and to conquer it! What unspeakable joy to behold yourself draw near the green oasis in the desert, where parched lips will be moistened, to find a sweet repose after fatigue, shade and bubbling springs after thirst, the smiling faces of women and children after solitude, love after the dangers of death! Could a European have accompanied that camel-driver on his three months' journey, and lived on a sip of water that would hardly quench the thirst of a bird, and a pinch of flour baked in the sun? And yet, under these wretched conditions, the nomad had lived perfectly happy, free from cares and importunate thoughts; he had bounded over the immeasurable distances of the Great Desert, with the carelessness and agility of the ostrich, the gazelle and the antelope. Each power has its destiny."

THE ARCHITECTURE OF BIRDS.

The study of the mechanism of animals is one of the most delightful features in natural history, and the architecture of birds is well calculated to excite our interest and admiration in a high degree. The skill and ingenuity displayed in endless variety, by mysterious instinct, we may trace with pleasure—but the motive-principle must remain an enigma to us, forever! For the entertainment of the reader the powers of our artists have been invoked to produce the accompanying sketches representing, in a truly natural manner, some specimens connected with this interesting subject. "A nest," says the French Academy, "is a sort of cradle, a species of dwelling-house, which birds construct wherein to lay their eggs and rear their young." The Academy might have added that it is a regular, solid, skillful and elegant structure, commenced, with tender solicitude and prudent forethought, under the impulse of (so called) blind instinctive necessity, and continued with zeal and perseverance—a work the skill of which is inexplicable, and a matter of astonishment. Each kind of bird has its own peculiar form and sort of nest, its own regulations and chosen spot. Birds of prey choose the summits of rocks and crags or high deserted towers, where they build their capacious dwellings with large twigs and sticks, to which purpose the great muscular power nature has bestowed on them is admirably fitted—and at much cost of time and trouble, for these buildings are destined for children and great grand-children, it rarely happening that the first or second offspring forsake the place of their birth. Accordingly we find that these nests are so substantially built that they withstand the assaults of time and weather for a lengthened period. Most birds build in trees amongst the branches of bushes or behind a clod of earth, making use of twigs, straws, of moss, down, cotton and a thousand little materials, gathered here and there with infinite industry, to be carried (often from no inconsiderable distance) with unerring exactitude, to the selected spot. Then, having only feet and bills to work with, all these various substances are arranged and fitted together, until a masterpiece of workmanship is completed. Some of the feathered tribes, with wonderful skill attach their nests to a supple bough, which is moved by every breath of wind, a perfect swing. Others collect clay and gravelly mud, which with leaves and water carried in their bills, they form into cement and build compact houses for themselves, impervious to rain, cold or dampness, against chimneys or on ledges of walls. These nests, outwardly a work of great art, appear within, a very masterpiece of skill and ingenuity. They are divided into separate chambers, allowing the parent bird a room to himself, when his services are not required, where he can repose at ease, or whence he can watch and look out on the world beyond. How many, many journeys must these indefatigable artisans perform, what an amount of ceaseless industry, what enduring patience does this instinct exhibit! Those which build upon the ground are less particular, and display less skill, but the desired end of warmth and protection is attained. Others are content with a hole in the sand. Here they lay their eggs, which they leave during the day-time to be hatched by the heat of the sun, returning homeward at night to sit upon them. The nest of the long-tailed titmouse, delineated in the sixth illustration of the present article, is a most remarkable construction. This bird, which is not bigger than a wren, takes innumerable means of precaution for the comfort, safety and concealment of its dwelling. It is made like a hollow hall, with a small opening on one side, as may be seen in the engraving. This orifice serves the double purpose of door and window, and is so well barricaded that neither cold nor rain can penetrate into the interior. This is effected by an admirably contrived screen, before the entrance to the little citadel, of downy feathers, which is very pliant, to admit of ingress and egress, and yet exclude the weather. Yet this is not all. From its very diminutive size, this bird is afraid of numerous enemies, and therefore has recourse to wise artifice to conceal its asylum. It fastens its nest to the trunk of a tree, and covers it carefully and skillfully with the twigs and leaves of the parasitical plants that cluster around the stem to which it adheres, and contrives to give to the inimitable structure the appearance of being a part of the bark. Having exhausted its skill in the deception, intended only to deceive enemies, the little creature enters its mansion and rears a family under protection of the pious fraud. Another kind, belonging to the same tribe—see the seventh engraving, which represents the nest and the bird—carries its precautionary measures even to a greater extent. Being a frequenter of the borders of water, it has everything to dread from the vermin that infest those places. What then is to be done as a safeguard from the insidious foe? It is at no loss, for choosing the bough of a tree that overhangs the water, it builds its bottle-shaped nest, the mouth of which is too small for even a rat to enter. Another variety unite a kind of chalice to form their nest, in which the old ones are accustomed to take rest from the cares of housekeeping. The nest of this bird, which is one of the smallest and weakest, is generally eight inches high by four broad, within—which may be considered enormous dimensions in comparison with the size and force of the little architects. The structure is commenced in the middle of winter, and is not completed, although diligently carried on, until spring, when the female is ready to begin laying her eggs. As they often lay and hatch to the amount of twenty, this occupies some time. The sedge-bird exhibits the instinct with which it is furnished in a different form. In order to protect its young from the element amongst which it is born, this bird adapts its nest to the twofold capacity of a land-house and a ship! The nest, which is formed of perfectly water-tight cement, is suspended to a willow branch, which is often reached by the water when it rises, when the nest, like a boat, floats securely and comfortably with its precious live freight, shortly again to swing in the air! The nests of others of this species are so artfully constructed, and so firmly interwoven and glued together, that the knot must be cut in order to see within. No less curious are the nests of the field-fare, yellow-hammer, finch—but most particularly so are those of the weaver-bird, or cherry-finch—which congregate in large masses of from five to six hundred, and live together in one harmonious community. An accurate engraving of one of these nests will be found on another page. Many hundreds of them club together and go to work to build an immense roof on a tree, or perhaps one over another. This they make of stalks, leaves, clay, etc., so thick and strong that it is absolutely impervious to the rain. When this work is accomplished by the united labor of the association, the under surface of the roof is divided amongst the members, and they commence building their nests to this covering. They are all of a size, and built the one touching the other. Each of these dwellings has its own entrance, but it sometimes happens that one door serves for three windows, for one apartment is on the right, another on the left, the third in the background. Some of the neighbors are on such friendly terms that they allow one doorway to serve for both families. Thus these buildings are erected at the least possible expense to the individual birds, as each one makes use of the side wall of his neighbor as a portion of his house—yet the additions are so contrived as never to leave the thin partition walls exposed to the weather. The nests, which are about three inches in diameter, are formed of finer leaves and grass than the roof, very closely woven, and the inside of them is lined with down. As the population increases, new nests are built over the old ones. Those which have been forsaken are turned into streets and avenues leading to the new structures. The learned Vaillant examined one of these roofed cities, and counted in it three hundred and twenty houses or nests. Each of these must have contained one pair, making a colony of six hundred and forty members. It would be interesting to watch the proceedings of such a community for the course of a year, especially to note the care and kindness bestowed on the rising generation. It is supposed that the barracks are deserted when the young ones are fledged and capable of flight, and remain empty until the next season. We know not how the association is first formed, when dissolved, or by what intelligence they again unite. This has not yet been discovered, so we are ignorant of that precisely which it would be most interesting to know.

In the first illustrative engraving of this article our artist has delineated the Fantail Warbler (Sylvia Cisticola), a peculiarly interesting species of the genus Sylvia, to which the wrens belong, and is found in Spain, Portugal, Italy, Sardinia and Sicily. The plumage of this bird is quite plain and sober; it is of a dead leaf color, or reddish yellow above, each feather being dashed in the middle with blackish brown, so as to present the appearance of multitude of longitudinal spots, except on the lower portion of the back, which is plain, as is also the whole of the under surface, which is of reddish white. The tail is short, graduated, and of a blackish brown, each feather having a deep black spot near the end. The total length of this species is scarcely four inches. The nest of this bird presents a most beautiful example of instinctive skill. It is placed in a tuft of tall grass, and elevated from the ground, as shown in the engraving. With singular neatness a number of the blades of grass are drawn together and interlaced, and sewed with a kind of cotton thread, which the bird manufactures for itself. The blades of grass thus secured, form an exterior case, and support a long, barrel-shaped nest, open at the top, consisting of a cotton-like material, and secured by threads to the blades and stalks which surround it so closely as to afford perfect concealment.—A cluster of nests of the Rock Swallow forms the subject of the next illustration.

Our third engraving represents the Tailor Bird (Sylvia Sutoria), and its most ingeniously constructed nest. This minute species of wren, measuring only three inches and a half long, is a native of Hindostan, Ceylon, and other parts of the East. Its general plumage is pale olive; the chin and throat yellow; the under parts dusky white; its weight only about ninety grains. Living in countries where snakes and monkeys are formidable enemies to the feathered tribe, this little bird selects a leaf at the extremity of a pendant twig for its cradle. If this leaf be large enough, it draws the edges together so as to form a pouch, the end of which is so arranged as to assist in supporting the nest within. But if the leaf be too small, the bird adds to it another growing by, and sometimes a dead one, sewing this to the other, that it may form a convenient receptacle for its nest. This is composed of down, intermingled with fibres and a few feathers. Thus the young are provided with a snug and secure abode, though it rocks to and fro in the breeze. Many have examined this curious product with lively interest, but few can say with Forbes, "Often have I watched the progress of an industrious pair of tailor birds, from their first choice of a plant, until the completion of the nest and the enlargement of the young." It appears, however, that the tailor bird is not the only one that fabricates this kind of nest. Latham states that in Lady Clive's fine collection of drawings, there is a somewhat similar bird called the "Me-rops Minimus," that adopts the same method. This bird, like the one with which it is naturally associated, is also small; and it is an interesting fact that such inconsiderable members of the feathered race should be gifted with so remarkable an instinct. Not only is the nest so curiously fabricated, all that the young require, but its position is so chosen, that they are secure from the enemies to which they are so peculiarly exposed. Yet, be it observed, this is only one example of the adaptation of the abode to the tenant, which may be observed throughout the region of animated nature. In no part of it do we discover a creature whose instinct leads to the preparation of an uncongenial or insecure abode. The law under which it acts is a perfect law. That which reason would do, were it possessed, is done; and the completeness of the product in every respect may well excite our wonder, and call forth our high admiration.

The last engraving delineates the Loxia Bengalensis, a bird of India, and its very curious nest. The bird constructs it of vegetable fibres, which it interlaces in such a manner as to form a sort of purse, of which our engraving gives an exact representation. It suspends its nest on the highest branches of trees overhanging rivers, and the entrance is observable at the lower end. The first year the nest is a simple purse; but in the following one the bird attaches a second to it, and proceeds annually with a similar addition to the singular and ingenious structure. Mr. Barrow, in his "Travels in Africa," notices clusters of suspended nests, attached to slender twigs, fabricated by a species of Loxia, which unfortunately he neither names nor describes. These nests usually overhang a river or pond of water, and are shaped like a chemist's retort, with a body and long neck, at the end of which is the aperture, close over the surface of the water; the neck leads to a snug chamber, in which the young are reared; the structure is composed of interwoven grass. Though not capable of identifying the species, we suspect it to be the Nelicourvi, Loxia (Ploceus) penisilis, of Sonnerat. We have seen nests of a similar form, constructed of wiry elastic grass, and attached to the leaves of palms, brought from Ceylon and the continent of India—perhaps the work of the Ploceus (Euplectes) Philippensis. Colonel Sykes observes that this weaver-bird "is very common in Dukhun, and there are few wells overhung by a tree where their nests are not seen pendent; they live in small communities, and are very noisy in their labors." Pringle describes the South African nest as woven of a kind of tough grass, the cylindrical passage being twelve or fifteen inches in length; and twenty or more often hang from a single tree.

The Lawet and the Linchi, of the Javanese, are the constructors of those singular nests which are prized as luxuries by the Chinese, and form so considerable an article of commerce. The Lawet is brown above, whitish beneath, and at the end of the tail, which is forked. The Linchi is rather smaller than the former, being about five inches long; its under parts are white, and its wings are longer in proportion. Much has been written about these birds and their nests, till, from clashing opinions, the subject has become involved in difficulty. According to Lamoignon, there are three species which make edible nests, the most valuable being those of the smallest species, which he states is distinguished by the feet not being covered with down; it is never found inland, but always on the sea-coast. The nest is clear and white, and composed, as he believes, of sea-plants of an order termed by him Gelidia, which by boiling or steeping in water may be almost wholly reduced to a jelly. Others consider the nest as a sort of fish-spawn; others as composed of inspissated sea-foam, or the juice of a tree; and others of molluscous animals. To give an idea of these nests, several of which, varying in clearness of composition, we have examined, we may describe them as resembling in form that of the chimney-swallow, being concave, shallow, and lined with feathers; but the crust or shell, instead of being made of clay, is something in appearance like fine manna as sold in the druggists' shops, approximating, however, to coarse isinglass. Sir G. Stannton says: "In the Cass, a small island of Sumatra, we found two caverns running horizontally into the side of the rock, and in these were a number of those birds' nests so much prized by the Chinese epicures. They seemed to be composed of fine filaments cemented together by a transparent viscous matter, not unlike what is left by the sea upon stones alternately covered by the tide, or those gelatinous animal substances found floating on every coast. The nests adhere to each other, and to the sides of the cavern, mostly in horizontal rows, without any break or interruption, and at different depths from fifty to five hundred feet. The same sort of nests are also said to be found in the deep caverns at the foot of the highest mountains in the middle of Java, at a distance from the sea. The value of these nests is chiefly ascertained by the uniform fineness and delicacy of their texture, those that are white and transparent being most esteemed, and fetching often in China their weight in silver."

Montbeillard, who, in 1741, visited the straits of Sunda near Java, and went ashore on an islet called the Little Toque, discovered a deep cavern in the rocks on the brink of the sea, the mouth of which was darkened by multitudes of swallows pouring out in swarms, and the roof of the cavern was covered with their nests. He describes them as softening in water, and as composed of fish-spawn, resembling half-melted glue, which floats on the sea, and adds, "sometimes threads of this viscous substance are seen hanging to the bills of these birds, and which have been supposed, without foundation, to be extracted from the stomach in the breeding season." It was perhaps this passage that induced Sir Home to examine the gastric glands of a species of swallow of very large size, and which he regarded as the edible swallow, brought from Java by Sir. T. S. Raffles. In this species he found the gastric glands projecting, and splitting into several portions like the petals of a flower, and argues that their development is to supply a secretion for the formation of the nests. Against the inference of Sir E. Home it is objected, and with force, that it does not appear that the swallow he examined (double the size of our swallow) was one of the edible species, and that we have not the shadow of proof from analogy to conclude that these gastric glands, for whatever reason they might be developed, secrete the materials of the nest. The most probable theory is, that whatever else may be used, the bird, as is the case with the swallow and swift, employs a viscid saliva as a cementing medium; as M. Reinwardt, a celebrated professor, who resided a considerable time in Java, and made some careful researches upon the subject, came to the conclusion that the bird consolidates, if it does not wholly form, its nest with a viscous and glutinous fluid, secreted by its very large parotid (salivary) glands. Mr. Crawford, British resident at the court of the Sultan of Java, and who superintended the collection of these nests (for they are claimed as royal property, and form a valuable branch of the revenue of the state) at Karang-Bolang for several years, has given us an interesting commercial history of them too long to be quoted. We may observe, however, that about twenty-seven thousand pounds, the chief part of the best quality, are annually exported from Java, but a still greater quantity from the Suluk Archipelago; that much is also exported from Ceylon and New Guinea; and that altogether about thirty thousand tons of Chinese shipping are engaged in the traffic. The danger attendant upon the collecting of the nests in the awful caverns is described as imminent in the extreme.

To the class of birds who build pensile (hanging) nests, belongs almost the whole genus of SOCIAL WEAVER-BIRD'S NEST.

Orioles (Icterus), says Wilson. "Few of them, however, equal the Baltimore in the construction of these receptacles for their young, and in giving them such convenience, warmth and security. For these purposes he generally fixes on the high bending extremities of the branches, fastening long strings of hemp or flax round two forked twigs, corresponding with the intended width of the nest; with the same materials, mixed with quantities of loose tow, he interweaves or fabricates a strong firm kind of cloth, not unlike the substance of a hat in its raw state, forming it into a pouch of six or seven inches in depth, lining it substantially with various soft substances, well interwoven with the outward netting, and lastly finishes with a layer of horse-hair, the whole being shaded from the sun and rain by a natural canopy of leaves." As much difference, adds Wilson, will be found in the style, neatness and finishing of the nests of the Baltimores, as there is in their voices. Audubon describes the nest of one of these birds found in the State of Louisiana, as composed of the long filaments of a kind of moss known there by the name of Spanish-beard, and destitute of the warm lining with which, had the individual built in Pennsylvania or New York, it would have been furnished; but in Louisiana the intense heat of the summer renders such a provision unnecessary. The position chosen by the Baltimore for its pensile nest is no doubt suggested by instinct as a means of security against the attacks of enemies, especially the black snake, which climbs trees with facility, and which destroys young broods by wholesale, though it is often compelled by the parent birds to retreat.

The splendid Satin-Bird, of New South Wales, is one of the bower-building birds, constructing a bower, or run, by means of two short parallel hedges composed of twigs interlaced together, so artfully arranged that the inner aspect of each artificial hedge is smooth, offering no impediment to the passage of the birds, while the outside is rough with the projecting ends and bifurcations of the twigs. The floor of this run, or short avenue, consists of sticks strewn with shells and bones, and the bower itself is ornamented with the brilliant feathers of various parakeets. Here the birds play, and sportively pursue each other, perpetually traversing the avenue. This, however, is not their nest, which is so artfully concealed that it has not been discovered even by the sharp-eyed natives.

The nest of the Magpie, a native of Europe, and common in England, is a substantial edifice, generally placed in the top of a tall tree, or amidst the dense branches of an elevated old hawthorn. It consists of an external basket-work of sticks, mostly thorns, well united together, those forming the foundation being mixed with turf and clay. The inside of this basket-work, which is in the form of a circular cup, is lined with a thick layer of well-wrought clay, over which is arranged an inner layer of pliable roots and fibres neatly interwoven. The whole is then covered with an elevated dome composed of intertwined sticks of the thorn or the blackthorn; this is evidently intended as a frame-work of defence—an aperture is left in the side for the ingress and egress of the bird. The whole mass is of large size, and on the open-topped elm or ash near the farm or cottage of the laborer the dark ball is a conspicuous object. The eggs are of a greenish white mottled with brown. In captivity the magpie is very amusing from its archness and cunning; it is fond of stealing slyly behind people and suddenly pecking their heels, and then rapidly hopping away. Glittering things attract its curiosity and excite its cupidity; and many a lost article is often recovered from the hiding-place to which it is in the habit of carrying its plunder, and which, by watching its movements, may be detected.

The nests of Humming-Birds are most beautiful compact structures, with exquisite finish and nicety of arrangement. We have seen one composed of the finest silky down, or cotton, of a delicate straw yellow, soft, light and compact, attached to the end of a twig, and concealed by leaves. In some cases the outside is formed of fine moss, lichens, etc., investing a compact bed of the down of plants, cotton, and even spiders' webs.

The nest of the common wren is an ingenious structure. The wren breeds early, and begins to prepare its nest in March; and various are the places chosen as a site, sometimes under the thatched covering of an outhouse, sometimes in the niche or cavity between the branches of a tree, often amidst the ivy covering aged trees or old walls, or the side of a hay-rick. It is a domed structure with a small lateral aperture; generally it consists externally of green moss, but it varies the material according to situation and the color of the objects around. On a stump or rock, for example, gray lichens and withered grass compose its outer coating; internally it is lined with hair, feathers, wool, and other soft materials. We have seen nests of this bird composed of fine dried grasses or hay, mixed with bits of leaves, moss and lichens.

The Wattled Tiegalla, or Brush Turkey, of New South Wales, is very curious in its habits. The most remarkable circumstance connected with the economy of this bird is its nidification, for it does not hatch its eggs by incubation. It collects together a great heap of decaying vegetables as the place of deposit of its eggs—thus making a hotbed, arising from the decomposition of the collected matter, by the heat of which the young are hatched. Mr. Gould describes this heap as the result of several weeks' collection by the birds previous to the period of laying, as varying in quantity from two to four cart-loads, and as of a perfectly pyramidal form. This mound, he states, is not the work of a single pair of birds, but is the result of the united labor of many. The same site appeared to Mr. Gould to be resorted to for several years in succession, from the great size and entire decomposition of the lower part, the bird adding a fresh supply of materials on each occasion previous to laying. "The mode," says Mr. Gould, in continuation, "in which the materials composing these mounds are accumulated is equally singular—the bird never using its bill, but always grasping a quantity in its foot, throwing it backwards to one common centre, and thus clearing the surface of the ground for a considerable distance so completely, that scarcely a leaf or a blade of grass is left. The heap being accumulated, and time allowed for a sufficient heat to be engendered, the eggs are deposited, not side by side, as is ordinarily the case, but planted at the distance of nine or twelve inches from each other, and buried at nearly an arm's depth, perfectly upright, with the large end upwards; they are covered up as they are laid, and allowed to remain until hatched. I have been credibly informed, both by natives and settlers living near their haunts, that it is not an unusual event to obtain nearly a bushel of eggs at one time from a single heap; and as they are delicious eating, they are eagerly sought after. Some of the natives state that the females are constantly in the neighborhood of the heap about the time the young are likely to be hatched, and frequently uncover and cover them up again, apparently for the purpose of assisting those that may have appeared; while others have informed me that the eggs are merely deposited, and the young allowed to force their way unassisted. In all probability, as nature has adopted this mode of reproduction, she has also furnished the tender birds with the power of sustaining themselves from the earliest period; and the great size of the egg would equally lead to this conclusion, since in so large a space it is reasonable to suppose that the bird would be much more developed than is usually found in eggs of smaller dimensions. In further confirmation of this point, I may add, that in searching for eggs in one of the mounds, I discovered the remains of a young bird, apparently just excluded from the shell, and which was clothed with feathers, not with down, as is usually the case. The upright position of the eggs tends to strengthen the opinion that they are never disturbed after being deposited, as it is well known that the eggs of birds which are placed horizontally are frequently turned during incubation."

The mound-making Jungle-Fowl, of Port Essington, Australia, has a remarkable nest. Mr. Gilbert saw one which was a mound of shells, with a slight mixture of black soil, the base resting on a sandy beach, only a few feet above high-water mark; it was enveloped in the large yellow-blossomed Hibiscus, was of a conical form, twenty feet in circumference at the base, and about five feet high. The holes ran down obliquely from the centre towards the outer slope of the hillock, so that although the eggs were six feet deep from the summit, they were only two or three feet from the side. "The birds are said to lay but a single egg in each hole, and after the egg is deposited, the earth is thrown down lightly till the hole is filled up; the upper part of the mound is then smoothed and rounded over. To reach the eggs requires no little perseverance. The natives dig them up with their hands, and only make room to admit their bodies, and to throw out the earth between their legs; by grubbing with their fingers they follow the direction of the hole with greater certainty, which sometimes, at a depth of several feet, turns off abruptly at right angles, its direct course being obstructed by a clump of wood, or some other impediment."

HOUSEKEEPER'S EXPERIENCE.

BY LENA LYLE.

I am a housekeeper, experienced and old;
(You must know I'm an elderly madam),
And I think that my errors would do to be told,
For you may be certain I've had 'em.

I once had a party invited to dine,
And as sure as I am a sinner,
I swear that it all should go off very fine,
And my guests should all say 'twas the dinner.

But after "the dinner" was put on the fire,
I went up, myself in fine clothes to attire;
I forgot myself, talking to Ned from the window,
And my chickens and beef got burnt to a cinder.

My dinner was ruined, as sure as a gun!
Potatoes and parsnips and all overdone;
And the pastry I'd lavished so much care upon,
Was hard as a brickbat, without making fun!

But the guests were arriving, and now 'twas too late
To try the experiment over,
So I had to resign my poor dinner to fate,
And wished the guests all were at Dover.

I thought my blancmange, and my jellies and cake,
Without the burnt pastry a dessert would make;
But gracious! my vinegar-crust got broken,
And jellies, and cake, and blancmange all lay soaking.

My husband got mad because dinner was late,
And came out to increase my confusion;
He gazed in despair at the dinner's fate,
And poured out fine oaths in profusion.

But I fixed up the dinner the best I was able,
And my ravenous guests sat down to the table;
It looked pretty well, they expected a treat,
But I not a bit of the dinner could eat.

I saw all their smiles, and each secret wink,
And I said to myself, I suppose they think
Their wives will do better, I hope they will,
So they'd better go home and eat their fill.

How glad I felt when they all had departed,
But I was tired and so sick-hearted,
I cried o'er the efforts I'd made in vain,
But I ne'er gave a dinner party again.

SAYING BITTER THINGS.

It is not a very agreeable memory of a man that he was all his lifetime saying bitter things. It is like a continually recurring remembrance of repeated doses of thoroughwort or catnip tea, which, though they may do us good, are not very desirable for a steady drink. For ourselves, we believe that a little sugar over a pill may make it more palatable and full as effective, and deem that if it is necessary to pick poor humanity to pieces, it should be done as old Isaac Walton impaled the frog on his hook, as if he loved it. Satire either hardens the heart, or provokes a laugh at the expense of the satirist. All should remember, as past history teaches, that he is regarded with most affection who loved the most — Dickens, before Douglas Jerrold. — Saturday Evening Gazette.

FANNY CREIGHTON.

BY MRS. MARY MAYNARD.

"O, FANNY, do, pray be serious," entreated her mother.

"Do you never mean to get any sense, you wild girl?" asked her father, with an admiring look which certainly did not increase the effect of his words.

"Fanny is completely spoiled," said her three old-maid aunts.

"Fanny is the most bewitching girl I ever knew," said her father's brother, and he ought to have been a judge, having known enough.

All the young gentlemen of Lenham (that was Fanny's home, reader,) were continually sounding her praises. All the young ladies of Lenham were as continually striving to find flaws in her disposition and character.

I do not know that it would enlighten you much, were I even to repeat all they said, for the one party were so hopelessly blinded, and the other so alarmingly quick-sighted, that between them both it would have been hard to judge what Fanny Creighton really was. I will try to show you an impartial picture of her in the following sketch of her life.

Fanny Creighton's father was a mild, gentlemanly clerk in a government office in one of the principal Canadian cities. Everybody liked Mr. Creighton, for he possessed all the qualities that ensure good will, without any of those which excite rivalry. An amiable disposition, and many and varied accomplishments, endeared him to the home circle, while his punctuality, despatch and correctness caused him to be very highly thought of by his superiors in office. He was no politician, no public speaker, no schemer, and yet he held an excellent situation, and had held it, through every change in principles and politics. He was beloved by numerous friends, he was idolized by his relations, and he was slowly and surely becoming a wealthy man. His wife was the youngest of a family of four sisters, without father or mother, and being the pet and the only one who had married, both she and her husband were looked on as beings exalted above the ordinary rank of humans by the less fortunate sisters, who as years passed on, and they still remained in single blessedness, poured out their superabundant affections on their sister and brother-in-law, and their little daughter. There never had been, and probably never would be again such a child as little Fanny, and the three aunts determined that she should be brought up in a manner to credit them and their teaching.

"Brother Robert was a superior man, in fact he was the best of men, but then what did he know about bringing up a girl?" asked Miss Mary, the eldest of her two sisters.

"And Frances herself, dear creature that she was, she had never had the care of a child, and what could she possibly know about children? Nothing—absolutely nothing!" This was Aunt Kitty's opinion.

Aunt Lizzie came next. "It was very plain that unless they took the care of her education, the little Fanny would be spoiled, completely spoiled; they must commence directly, and train her up in the way she should go."

Fanny's own father and mother had their doubts about their ability to do by the child as their good sense told them they ought to do, but they made resolutions, and—broke them.

"We must not spoil her, Frances," said the fond father, "we must be very careful not to spoil her."

"O, to be sure not; but isn't she a little cunning thing, so full of fun and little tricks, and such a will of her own?" And so the two commenced to carry out their plans by recounting all the evidences the "little cunning thing" gave of the "inborn evil." And as the system of training, by aunts and all, consisted of indulging her as much as possible, and blaming every one else for doing the same, it is not to be wondered at that Miss Fanny at fifteen was about as self-willed, fearless, unrestrained a young lady as one could wish to meet.

Spoiled she was not, for there were those beauties in her disposition which defied the effects of indulgence; but to those who could not read her heart, it was a matter of surprise how Mrs. Creighton and her husband could listen unmoved to such speeches as she would make, such wild flights of imagination, such saucy wit, such daring avowals of opinion as young girls rarely make before their parents. It was this very confidence in them, that made her parents feel so easy; they felt that in her perfect truth and openness was her safety, and they knew that time would cure her of her worst faults.

A younger brother of her father, who came to reside in the family when she was ten years old, had done much to make Fanny Creighton the wild girl she was at fifteen; he loved her, but he wished brother Robert's child had been a boy, and he strove to make her as fond of boyish pursuits as possible.

The father was rather pleased than otherwise at the blooming health of his beautiful daughter, and felt little disposed to quarrel with his brother for giving her a distaste for city life.

Her mother would have objected, had she not known the great love her brother-in-law felt for Fanny, and rested assured that he would lead her into no danger.

But what words can paint the agonies of the three aunts, whose anticipations for the future of their pattern niece were thus rudely crushed? How tell of their horror when they saw her throw away her knitting work, to practise with the foils—leave her music lesson to go on a fishing excursion—or discard her muslins and laces for a suit more fitted for the woods? And then the researches they made in her room during her absence; what grievous lamentations they made over the incongruous adornments of that pretty chamber.

Miss Molly, in diving into what she took for an album, got caught on one of Fanny's choicest hooks, while her screams were echoed by Aunt Lizzie, whose hand had just come in contact with the cold barrel of a beautiful little fowling piece.

Miss Kitty said nothing, but her look was awful. On the toilet table before her lay collars and ribbons, mixed up with strips of leather, bits of brass buttons and bullets; scent bottles and sweet oil; pin cushions and pistol cases—heavens, it was awful!

"You are crazy, Frances, positively mad, to allow that girl to go with her uncle all over the country; he is ruining her, positively ruining her," said Miss Molly to her sister, who could hardly smother her laughter at their consternation. Before Mrs. Creighton could speak, Miss Lizzie began:

"Making her so rude and wild, she will never be fond of quiet amusements, nor accomplishments, nor—"

"All the beauties of literature," chimed in Miss Kitty, who as she grew older, grew very sentimental.

"But think how she has improved during the last six months—I think it is six months since you saw her," said Mrs. Creighton. "The exercises she takes are making her the picture of health, and her uncle will take care that she does not get too wild."

"Well, Frances, it is your child, and you can do as you like. There never was a better man than Robert, but I can't say I like his brother, and I think he will be the means of making Fanny a rude hoyden, without one particle of delicacy, or refinement, or—"

"Sentiment," said Miss Kitty.

Aunt Molly put her handkerchief to her eyes, so overcome was she with the description she had drawn. Mrs. Creighton smiled, she knew that Arthur Creighton possessed more of the amiable qualities than any one but herself gave him credit for. She knew that the sight of a flower, the sound of sweet music, a beautiful sunset, or a calm moonlight night, gave him the most exquisite pleasure; that he was naturally inclined to view all things on the brightest side, to study the works of the Creator with awed interest, and that he had striven with good success, to make Fanny enjoy these things also; but Fanny's natural flow of spirits prevented her thinking as much as a more steady minded young lady would have done, so her father said:

"Let her health be the first consideration now; by-and-by she will become sedate. Pray let her laugh and sing, and dance to her heart's content; I love to hear her sweet voice ringing through the house."

And not a bird that sang in the old trees around her beautiful home, was more joyous and free from care than Fanny, lovely Fanny, with kind friends always near her, living in a very atmosphere of love, the joyful light of her home.

If tears dimmed Fanny's hazel eyes, they were merely caused by the history of another's sorrow, grief of her own she had none; if sadness clouded Fanny's beautiful face, it was solely the sadness of sympathy, cares she knew none. Her home was several miles distant from the city, near a small village, and most beautifully situated, near a lake, and in the midst of choicest woods. Mrs. Creighton had all her life been used to a country residence, and to gratify her, on their marriage, her husband had purchased the little paradise of a home, where they dwelt at the time I am writing about, where they are dwelling now.

The short journey to the city was performed each day by Mr. Creighton with the aid of a pair of ponies, and a very snug carriage, and after the confinement of office hours, he found it a delightful change to step into this carriage and drive to his home, frequently meeting his daughter half way. In winter it was not quite so pleasant, but even during all the long months in which the cold reigns there, our Canadian neighbors are at no loss for amusements, and the Creightons were particularly well off in this respect, books and music being their favorite recreations, while to these may be added embroidery for the ladies, and for the gentlemen, the glorious sports of those fine old forests.

"Fanny, pray do not sit so, it is not proper." Aunt Mary drew herself up, and sat in her chair as straight as one of her own knitting needles.

"But, aunty, I do love to sit on this cushion, it is so much more comfortable than a chair."

"But it is not ladylike, get up and sit on a chair, directly."

Fanny obeyed, with a sly glance under her dark eyelashes at Uncle Arthur, who was arranging the different parts of a fishing-rod of extraordinary length. His answering look was as mischievous as her own.

The whole family were at home, for it was a holiday in the public offices. Mr. Creighton was practising a piece of new music he had brought home the night before; his wife was sewing; Fanny's little fingers were employed on a smoking cap she was embroidering, to match a gorgeous dressing gown she had made for her uncle; Aunt Lizzie was studying a formidable-looking book of sermons; Aunt Kitty was deep in the mysteries of "Clementina: or, Love's last Sigh."

"I wonder you don't make Fanny read these sermons, brother Robert," said Miss Lizzie, as she looked up from her book for an instant. "It would do her a great deal of good, I don't know when I have read anything so improving."

"I think I must make her read them, she needs something to improve her," returned he, with the same fond smile with which he always spoke to her.

Fanny looked up almost in terror, and met his glance. "O, no, papa, pray don't say so, I could not read them."

"Well, you must promise then not to be so wild for the future, your aunts are actually shocked at your behaviour."

"Are they? well, I am sorry; but I don't think I am so very wild." Fanny's look of sorrow was so irresistibly comic that her father turned quickly to the piano again, while Uncle Arthur found something very puzzling the matter with the reel of his rod, and had to take it to the window. "I don't believe I am a bit wilder than you were at my age, Aunt Mary."

Aunt Mary drew herself up a little straighter if such a thing were possible. "I never was wild; I never forgot what a young lady's behaviour ought to be."

"I wish I didn't; but never mind, Aunt Mary, let me enjoy myself a little longer; by-and-by, when I get married, and settle down for life, you shall see what a pattern I will be."

Aunt Mary dropped her knitting. "Get married! A child like you talking of getting married! I should think your father and mother were neglecting their duty very much to allow you to speak on such subjects at all."

"Now, aunty, please don't scold; just let me come and sit down here at your feet, and I will tell you just what kind of a husband I intend to have some of these days. In the first place, then, he must have beautiful black curly hair, not just curly, but wavy, you know, aunty."

Aunty very sharply replied that she didn't know anything about it, while Uncle Arthur suggested black Sam's for instance, as a pattern.

"No, not black Sam's at all," Fanny said, with a little pouting of her rosy lip, "but just such a head as that gentleman had, who was talking with you in the shrubbery yesterday morning, Uncle Arthur." Now Fanny had a shrewd idea that Uncle Arthur had reasons of his own for not wishing her to see or know anything of the presence of the person she alluded to, and she said this to punish him for the remark about Sam. If she wished to annoy him she could not have taken a surer method; he started violently as she spoke, colored crimson, and then became quite pale; so evident was his emotion that all noticed it. Both Mr. Creighton and his wife felt sure that it was something unusual to so discompose their brother, but no comment was made, and Fanny went on. "My husband must be very tall, aunty—I like tall people—and I would little rather he should be a soldier than anything else." Arthur Creighton started again, but it was not noticed this time, Aunt Mary's little scream of terror causing all to look up in surprise. If there was one object in the world that the good old lady feared more than another, it was a soldier. Fanny laughed aloud. "Don't be frightened, aunty, he sha'n't wear a sword into the room where you are, I will take care; but if you interrupt in this way I shall never get through with my description. I am not particular what his profession is, so long as he is not a minister—a minister I could not marry."

It was now Aunt Lizzie's turn to exclaim: "O, Fanny, you're a dreadful wicked child, if you don't change soon I am sure I don't know what will become of you."

"Well, just think of marrying a minister, aunty; what a horrid life to lead, shut up forever in a gloomy old parsonage, with all the disagreeable people of a village for society; no music but a dilapidated old organ, and nothing to read but your husband's old sermons."

All smiled at Fanny's picture, even Mrs. Creighton could hardly control her face to the proper gravity to ask if that was the kind of life their pastor's wife led?

"O, no;" Fanny laughed too, now; "but then you know, mama, my minister would not be such a nice man as Mr. Ritchie is, and I am quite sure I should not be half as good as his wife is."

"And I am quite sure of that, too," returned her father.

"Well, I won't marry a minister, that's certain."

"I am afraid you won't," sighed Aunt Lizzie. "There might be some hope for you then."

Arthur Creighton's manner of living had made him acquainted with a great number, and of course a great variety of people. In the long hunting excursions he frequently made, his companions were the backwoodsmen and the Indians, which latter were frequently his partners in the chase. In the city where he was well known and beloved, he had more acquaintances, if not more sincere friends, and among the officers of the garrison, he was on terms of familiar intimacy. One of these latter he would willingly have shunned, for there was little community of soul between Albert Hepburn and himself, and yet, strangely enough, the young captain eagerly sought the society of the very man who despised him, and who, had he known all, would have spurned him from his presence with disgust and contempt.

As it was, rumor had whispered enough to Arthur to induce him to make every effort to prevent the young officer from beholding his niece, or Fanny from seeing him; and thus it was that at the risk of being called rude and inhospitable, he had allowed young Hepburn to carry out his plan of walking with him to the very precincts of Mr. Creighton's residence, and yet had withheld the invitation to enter, the other was so anxious to gain.

For Albert Hepburn had made himself acquainted with all the affairs of the Creighton family; he knew that Robert Creighton was a rich man, and growing richer daily; he knew that there was a beautiful young daughter, some day to inherit this increasing wealth; he knew that Arthur himself possessed a handsome private fortune, and that it was through him alone that he could gain an introduction to the family.

Arthur knew that Hepburn was a dissipated reckless gambler, he had heard that he was worse; what then could be the tie to keep up a friendship between such opposite characters? What was the magnetic influence so powerfully exercised over Arthur Creighton's mind as to induce him to keep up even the semblance of friendship with a man he almost abhorred? Need I say it was the all-powerful spell of a beautiful woman?

Albert Hepburn was a slave to the influence of sin, a drunken, licentious blasphemer; Albert Hepburn's sister was the realization of all that is good and lovely, and lovable in woman; a lonely, neglected orphan, whose days were passed in sadness, and whose nights were frequently spent in prayer for that cruel brother, whose inhuman conduct had made her little better than a beggar, and deprived her young life of all joy. To the deepest pity for Ella Hepburn's unhappy lot, had succeeded the warmest love in Arthur Creighton's heart.

For her sake, and for her alone, did he consent to meet the miserable brother she had freely forgiven, to use his influence to reform him, or at least to keep him from those shameful excesses which had already done a pitiful destruction to the mind and health of that heart-broken sister.

Arthur had never informed his brother of this new and dear acquaintance, and probably would not, had it not been for Fanny's speech on the occasion we before named. There was full confidence between the brothers, and Arthur felt that he ought to warn Robert in him, for should Captain Hepburn by any accident become acquainted with Fanny, a heavy blame might have been attached to him for not putting the parents on their guard.

Mrs. Creighton and his wife both entered deeply into their brother's feelings, and at once saw the propriety of keeping their child from so dangerous an influence, at the same time they wished Arthur to try to induce Miss Hepburn to come to them at once.

"The guardianship of such a brother is worse than absolute loneliness," said Mr. Creighton. "Can she not be persuaded to leave him forever?"

"I fear not," was Arthur's reply. "I have tried all persuasions to make her give him up, but while he lives she will remain single. It was her father's last dying request, and she keeps it religiously. Had it been otherwise she would have been my wife to-day. I would be glad to ask her here on your invitation, and she would be all too happy to come, were it not for Fanny's sake; but Ella knows, and I know, that where she goes he will go; and not for worlds would I have him meet that child. I love Fanny, as you well know, Robert, and yet this hour, I would see her in her coffin, sooner than know her the wife of Albert Hepburn. God knows it is only for his sister's sake that I have been the friend I have to him, but not even that consideration would make me risk dear Fanny's happiness."

And yet in spite of the care and anxiety of friends, in spite of Arthur's watchful guardianship, and her parents' increasing vigilance, Albert Hepburn saw and spake with Fanny Creighton. Her uncle was transported with rage at his audacity, and their folly in not warning her against the handsome stranger, whose praise she sounded in her own free girlish way, telling her mother that he was by far the most agreeable gentleman at their Sabbath school picnic (where they had allowed her to go without thought of danger.)

Arthur Creighton now lost no time in telling Fanny exactly what her new acquaintance was, as far as he knew, and that was more than sufficient to fill her mind with contempt for him, and pity for his unfortunate sister. The history was strictly true, and even less than might have been told, for Arthur would have scorned a lie even in such a cause, but the feelings of the speaker gave power to his words, and before he had finished, with a passionate burst of tears, Fanny threw herself into his arms and promised, never, never to speak to that wicked man again.

Of course the family felt much anxiety as to Hepburn's future course, as from inquiries Mr. Creighton made, he learned that he was still seeking an introduction to the family through sources more available; that he had taken a seat in Lenham church, and by various other artifices was ingratiating himself with the family of the clergyman.

Fanny was so carefully guarded now, that she rarely left the house alone, and never went beyond the boundaries of their garden and beautiful shrubbery. There was a feeling of anxiety and unrest in the whole family, carefully kept to themselves, however, lest their annoyance should be spoken of.

Arthur never went to the city now to see Miss Hepburn, except on Sundays—and this was by her own desire—she could meet him at the church she attended, but she could no longer with safety allow him to visit her at her lodgings, her brother having threatened direst vengeance on her if she persisted in encouraging his attentions.

Once or twice she wrote little notes to Arthur in reply to his long letters, and once to Mrs. Creighton, a thankful but firm refusal of a home, and over this Fanny shed many tears, and began to feel that the world was not quite the joyous place it had always appeared to her.

"My brother was our parents' idol, he was their last thought in this world, and his name the last word on their lips. On his deathbed my father made me swear that while Albert remained single, I would never marry, but live to do all in my power for him. He threatened me fearfully in case I broke my oath. I might have come a beggar to your house—for Albert has spent the last penny of my fortune—but Arthur will not blame me for refusing to call down on my devoted head the awful penalty of a parent's curse."

On the day this letter was received, Fanny had walked out to rid herself of the feelings of depression and sadness which overpowered her. Her uncle looked so anxious and careworn, her parents felt so uneasy, even Fanny herself was far from contented with the state of affairs; she leaned wearily on the railway of a little bridge which crossed a brook near their house, and vainly tried to think of some plan by which they might all be made happier. Suddenly there was a rustling in the branches which drooped over her head, a step at her side, and before she had time to scream, a hand was pressed lightly on her lips.

"O, Madeline, how you frightened me," exclaimed Fanny, as soon as she saw who her unexpected visitor was. "It is so long since you have been here, that I never thought of seeing you."

The person addressed, a slight and beautiful Indian girl, made no reply for some moments, but gazed earnestly on the features of the fair girl before her. Fanny at last grew somewhat alarmed at her strange looks, for the dark eyes seemed to burn with a living fire, a convulsive movement agitated her features, and the hand that clasped Fanny's little white fingers, pressed on them like a band of steel. The girl was evidently under some strong excitement.

She had known Madeline for many years, the tribe to which she belonged being on the most friendly terms with the white people, and Madeline and her family having always received and returned acts of kindness with the Creightons. A brother of Madeline, Louis by name, was Arthur Creighton's favorite companion in the chase, and it had been subject for much merriment in their family to see how well the fine-looking young savage imitated the dress, manners and appearance of the polished and accomplished Arthur. For several months however, Louis had been much changed in his behaviour, and Madeline had disappeared entirely, and the Creighton family had vainly conjectured how to account for the mystery.

It was long ere Fanny could induce her strange companion to speak, but when she did the story that she told was a cruel one. She had yielded to the persuasions of one of the officers of the garrison to become his wife by a private marriage, had lived with him for several months, had been the mother of a child which she had every reason to believe the father had caused the death of; had put up patiently with the cruelest treatment, had loved him through all, and now had been cast off by him and informed that their marriage was only a pretence, a clever trick played by another young officer as bad as himself. He had informed her that he was going to be married to a lady in a few weeks, that she could no longer live with him; he had taken away all the ornaments and presents he had given her, and told her to go back to the tribe. Of course Fanny Creighton's feelings were deeply interested in this poor girl, who told her story with all the simplicity of undisguised truth, but what was her indignation, when on closer questioning, she learned that the officer was none other than Albert Hepburn, and the lady of whom he had spoken, herself?

"You must come to the house with me at once, Madeline; my father and uncle must hear your story, and perhaps they can find means to have justice done for you."

"Madeline wants no justice, wants nothing but to die. Louis will kill him if Madeline goes back to the tribe. Madeline is glad the good young lady does not love him; she hopes she will be happy when she loves."

Fanny tried vainly to detain her; the strength of pride and passion had gone out, and nothing could have been more pitiable than her hopeless despair. Of course, on hearing Fanny's story, Arthur made every effort to find Louis, a strong impression remaining on Fanny's mind that poor Madeline would do some dreadful act, she hardly knew what; but every time she recollected the scene the roses left her cheek, and her heart beat wildly.

Three days after, Louis made his appearance voluntarily; their worst hopes were realized, for poor Madeline, the beautiful Indian girl, had destroyed herself. With firm and unmoved countenance, her brother told how they had found her in the lake near their encampment—dead, drowned—with her long black hair tangled amid the white lilies, and one cold hand firmly clasping a little paper picture, blotted and torn, but still enough to show that it was a small water-color likeness of her destroyer, probably done by himself, and given to the wretched girl in happier days.

Mrs. Creighton and Fanny were astonished at the calmness with which the brother told the story; but Arthur, who knew more of the Indian nature, almost trembled at what he read far down in Louis's dark eyes: hatred, revenge, all the passions which rise with so little restraint in the breast of the savage, were smouldering there to burst forth some day, the young man well knew, with awful and unexpected destruction on the head of the guilty one.

"Miss Fanny, marm, dare's a gentleman at de gate wants to see de missus right off; he's in a real taking, sure nuff, and she gone to de town. What I do, any way, Miss Fanny?"

"Ask him to walk right in here, Sam." And Fanny laid down her book, and prepared to meet the stranger, with some anxiety to know who it could be to put Sam in such a flutter, and so completely upset all his usual self-possession.

The stranger came in, and soon introduced himself—the pastor of the church Miss Hepburn belonged to; Miss Hepburn was ill, very ill, slightly delirious the gentleman thought, she talked continually about Mrs. Creighton and the family, and the physicians thought it best for them to know her state.

"O, yes, they would go at once to see dear Ella." And Fanny's tears fell fast.

The gentleman begged pardon; he had expected to find Mrs. Creighton much older—that is, not so young—not so—it would hardly be safe for Mrs. Creighton to go at present, as Miss Hepburn was very violent at times in her deliriums.

In spite of her grief, Fanny could not quite repress a smile at the gentleman's mistake. He evidently thought she was too girlish to be of much assistance in so sad a case; and he as evidently mistook her for her mother. Of course it was all explained, and Fanny's manner was so pleasant, her sympathy for the sick girl so sincere, and her whole appearance so fascinating, that Mr. Stuart, who had been very much displeased with some of his congregation for hinting that it was not proper for a minister to remain single, actually began to think they might have been right after all, and he was glad he had not spoken his mind about it as he had intended.

Within a week, Ella Hepburn was safely guarded within the pleasant home of the Creightons, with kind hearts beating anxiously for her recovery, loving hands tending her, and the sweetest words of hope and love whispered softly in her ear.

Fanny had always thought her Uncle Arthur the noblest of men; he was the handsomest young man in the neighborhood, not excepting the officers of the garrison, and everybody knew what fine fellows they were; then he was the best shot—and in such a community that was high praise—the best dancer, and last but not least, he was the most erudite scholar next to the minister, that their neighborhood could produce. In all these varied graces and accomplishments, Arthur had been Fanny's pride and delight; but she was to see him now in a new character, as the anxious, tender lover of the beautiful Ella.

She felt scarcely so well pleased as heretofore, admirably as he sustained his part, and a feeling, not exactly jealousy, yet a little more than loneliness, took possession of her. There were no more morning rides now, no practice at the mark, no excursions to the lakes. Fanny's spirited pony grew fat and lazy, her fowling piece lay rusting in its case, the long fishing rods hung idly on the wall. Arthur's mornings were spent in the garden with Ella, now convalescent, but still feeble, his afternoons were usually devoted to reading aloud to her and Mrs. Creighton, while they sewed; his evenings were always passed on the sofa, where in the shadow of the room his arm formed a welcome support for the fragile form exhausted by the fatigues of the day.

And Mr. Stuart, the young clergyman from the city, it was astonishing how frequently he found time to visit his invalid parishioner; at least he came to the house ostensibly for that purpose, and of course they believed him.

A month had passed since poor Madeline's death, and in that time they had seen nothing of Albert Hepburn. He had obtained leave of absence for a short time, and his commanding officer believed he had gone to the West Indies to visit his uncle. However, he had told so many different stories to his acquaintances that it was hard to find out where in reality he had gone; some even hinting that he had been seen not far from Lenham within the time, but no one believed that.

Arthur was very urgent that Ella should consent to become his wife at once, at the same time he could not but feel that she was right to respect the oath she had taken, cruel and unreasonable, and useless as it was, so he was not quite happy.

Ella herself suffered much from anxiety respecting her brother's fate, and the unhappiness she was forced to inflict on Arthur, to whom she was attached by every tie of love and gratitude, so of course she was far from happy.

Fanny wandered about aimlessly, missing her usual occupations, half provoked with her uncle for neglecting her to devote himself to Ella, and wholly indignant with Mr. Stuart for being agreeable and friendly with all the family except her own poor little self, treatment which she could in no way account for unless he had heard how childish and silly she had always been, and felt that it was beneath his dignity to treat her otherwise; a conclusion which filled poor Fanny's bright eyes with tears every time she thought of it, and that was quite often, for somehow the young minister possessed a wonderful power of attraction when in conversation, and the terms he was on with the family developed his good qualities wonderfully.

Mr. Stuart was a scholar and a gentleman in the best sense of the words, but he had been a student all his life, had no female relatives, and had rarely been in the society of ladies, and especially young ones. He had so great a sense of their grace and good qualities, that he became painfully conscious of his own deficiencies, and never showed to advantage until engaged in conversation, when losing all sense of his awkwardness, he could talk fluently and well; his pale countenance would become animated, his eyes flash with interest, while bright and beautiful thoughts, new and brilliant ideas poured forth in profusion, showed how rich and rare was the mind belonging to this not all extraordinary body.

Mr. Stewart's brow was noble, nothing could have been a more perfect or pleasing study for a phrenologist; but alas the locks which fell above it were very light. Fanny had said to herself on first seeing him, that it was a pity with that fair brow his hair should not have been darker; but somehow lately Fanny had apparently got over her prejudices against light hair. Then Mr. Stuart was not above the medium height, and quite slender in figure; but when some one remarked it, Fanny maintained that he looked as tall in the pulpit as Mr. Ritchie did, and that was tall enough to please any one, surely; so no more was said about that, and it was argued that he was just the right height for a minister.

Not a word could be said against his profession, his whole heart being in the good work to which he had dedicated himself, and as to his sermons, not even Fanny, homily hater that she was, could find a fault in them. Perhaps her objections were removed by finding out what very short notes these eloquent addresses were preached from.

It was a sunny August evening, and wearied of her books, her music and her indoor thoughts, Fanny Creighton threw a light scarf over her shoulders, and leaving the house, sought in change of scene to banish her unpleasant feelings.

"Don't stay long, dear, if you are going to walk," Mrs. Creighton said, from the open window. "The dew falls heavily now, and you have no bonnet on."

She turned back an instant and kissed her hand to her mother, and then took a path which led down into a beautiful miniature forest, and from thence to the edge of the lake, a favorite walk of hers. They all watched her cross the lawn and the "rough field," and then there were occasional glimpses of her white dress, and then she disappeared.

Ella Hepburn sighed, and turned from the window. "Fanny does not appear happy; I feel that my coming here has destroyed her pleasures and deprived her of your society, Arthur; she looks weary, and I often see the tears in her eyes, when no one is observing her."

"I, too, have observed a change," said Mrs. Creighton. "She rarely sings, or laughs, and there is evidently something on her mind. She misses Arthur's society, but there is something besides that to change her so."

Arthur made no reply, and Mr. Stuart, who had been deeply engaged at the writing-table, got up and went out into the garden to meet Mr. Creighton. The three in the sitting-room watched them slowly walking up and down the garden paths in the golden rays of the setting sun, and after a little while the sash was closed to keep the cool air from Ella; and they were forgotten for the moment. An hour passed, Mr. Creighton had given some directions to Sam for the next day's work, and passed his opinion on some improvements the gardener was making, and had just entered the room, when his wife exclaimed in a tone of alarm:

"Where can Fanny be? What can have happened to her? O, Robert, something must be the matter, she would never stay out so late of her own accord."

Mr. Creighton quieted her fears for a few moments. "Mr. Stuart has gone to meet her, my dear, there is no cause for alarm, he will guard her carefully."

"But it is so late, now, Robert, and there are so many paths down there, he may not find her. O, I wish she was here, I feel as if she was in some danger."

"My dear wife, these feelings are quite unusual with you, I beg of you not to yield to them; our dear girl is safe, and her future, I am happy to say, is promising as happy as ever I could wish." And the happy father told how true an affection their gentle daughter had inspired in the breast of their beloved young friend, concluding by saying that he had freely given his consent to his suit.

"I have long thought he was interested in her, but I fear sometimes that she thinks more of that miserable Hepburn than we could wish, certainly something is on her mind."

Their conversation was interrupted by Arthur's sudden entrance.

"Has Fanny got home? Where is she?" he hastily asked, looking round the room.

"No, why, what is the matter?" the mother almost screamed, as she sprang towards him; but he tore her hand from his arm, caught down his rifle from the wall where it hung, and with a half-choked cry to his brother to "come," dashed out of the house and across the lawn, ere they could recover from the first shock of surprise. Mr. Creighton left the trembling Ella to raise his wife from the floor where she had fallen, and rushed after Arthur in the direction of the wood.

We must now go back to Fanny, and what befell her during that hour, to explain why Arthur was so alarmed.

On reaching the banks of the lake, she enjoyed the beautiful sunset reflected on the clear waters, as much as usual, and was about turning to go home, when her eyes caught the figure of an Indian moving stealthily among the trees. A little startled at such an unusual apparition in that spot (for the Indians never came so near the settlement to hunt or fish), she hastened her steps, and at last began to run as fast as the low bushes which grew in the path would permit.

She had got about half way between the lake and the clearing, in the densest part of the woods, when her further progress was prevented by the sudden starting up of the dark figure of a man, and with a sickening shudder Fanny recognized by the dim light, the well remembered features of Albert Hepburn.

She would fain have passed him without a word, but such was not his intention, for coming close to her, he attempted to take her hand, at the same time expressing his joy at thus meeting her, in terms which plainly told that he had both watched and waited for the same.

"I cannot stop to talk with you now, Captain Hepburn, it is late, and I have already outstayed my time; they will be uneasy at the house."

Fanny spoke very fast, her heart beat quick, she trembled violently, and yet was unwilling that he should think that she was afraid.

"And do you think that I have waited all this time to see you, and now let you go so easily; not so, my dear girl; you and I have many things to talk of ere we part. I love you, Fanny Creighton, love you madly, passionately, as I never loved any woman before, and you must, you shall be mine, yes, in spite of all your friends, of that proud uncle of yours, or that canting hypocrite who takes his place at your side so often of late days."

He paused for a moment, and Fanny, with no more terrors, no more trembling, nothing but strong indignation sounding in each word, bade him, "stand aside and let her pass, how dare he speak such words to her?"

Enraged at her haughty air and words, he made an effort to catch her in his arms, but before he could put his hand upon her lips, a scream, loud, shrill and piercing echoed through the forest, and as if in answer to it, the report of a rifle rang out upon the still evening air, scaring the birds from their nests in the green trees, and sending reverberating echoes far down the cliffs which overhung the still lake. These were the sounds which reached Arthur Creighton's ears, had sent him with wildly beating heart and flying feet down the dark pathway to the lake, nor needed it old Sam's terrified exclamation to add more to his already excited fancy.

"O de Lordy, Massa Arthur, where Miss Fanny? I see that sojer ossifer dis day a peeking round back o' de ole field. O de Lordy, what have he done?"

When Arthur reached the spot where Hepburn had met Fanny, he thought for an instant that his worst fears were realized. Mr. Stuart was kneeling on the grass, supporting the object of their search in his arms, while her lifeless attitude, and the awful stains on her snowy dress, gave sufficient reason for the worst conclusions. Another glance, however, re-assured Arthur, and though unable to account for the seeming mystery, the dark body of Hepburn on the ground explained much, and without waiting to ask questions, he assisted the clergyman to bear Fanny homeward. Once only he spoke, asking, "is he dead?" in that tone which men use when every nerve is strung to the highest pitch of horror. There was no answer, and in silence the two bore their precious burden along the narrow pathway, until Mr. Creighton, with Sam and another man were met.

It was long before Fanny could explain how the tragedy had occurred, and even when she did the mystery was deep.

None knew who fired the fatal shot; whose unerring aim had so surely reached the heart of the libertine, sending him lifeless into the arms stretched out to repulse him, to die at the feet of the maiden whose destruction he was meditating. The only conclusion they could come at, was that Louis was the murderer, that he had done the deed, to fulfil his vengeance on the destroyer of his sister, and this belief was the more strengthened by Fanny's report of having seen an Indian on the banks of the lake at that unusual hour.

Six months after her brother's death, Arthur persuaded Ella Hepburn to become his wife, and bid adieu for a season to scenes so fraught with painful associations. Immediately after their marriage, they went to Ella's English home, where, as if to make amends for the sufferings of her girlish years, she found that she had unexpectedly become heir to quite a large estate, more than sufficient to double Arthur's already handsome income.

They only succeeded in arranging their affairs in time to get back to Canada to witness Fanny's marriage with Mr. Stuart, which took place immediately on his becoming rector of Lenham parish.

Of course Fanny is settled for life in the pretty parsonage so conveniently near to her mother's house; but Ella and Arthur have no home. In the pleasantest part of the year they reside with Mr. Creighton, calling his home theirs, and when winter comes with its frost, and snow, and cold winds, and long, weary months of icy bondage, they seek in milder climes the fruits, and flowers, and balmy breezes both love so well.

When taxed with his idleness, Arthur defends himself by saying that his principles forbid his laboring, "why should he occupy the place a poorer man might be glad to fill? But Arthur is not idle. He takes life easily, though his talents are not rusting. Of the thousands who last year read his spirited and most entertaining book, very few will set the author down a sluggard; the truth must force itself on all, that none but a bright, active, and energetic mind ever viewed life as Arthur Creighton views it. And our heroine is fulfilling her mission, faithfully, untiringly, even to the satisfaction of all.

Not Aunt Mary herself can find fault with Fanny now, for Fanny is the joy and delight of her husband, the idol of his people, the comfort of her parents, and it is whispered that so far from disliking her husband's "old sermons" she has on more than one occasion, assisted him in his labors in that line.

IRON MOUNTAIN.

Since the earliest ages the iron of Rio Elba, has been worked, without being in the slightest degree exhausted. It is a mountain about five hundred feet in height, composed of iron ore. In the vicinity are other almost equally rich veins; and among them the Calamita, which is a true magnetic mountain. The Etruscans were the first to carry off the mineral; they transferred it to Populonium, to whose territory the island belonged, and there the iron was smelted. The want of wood prevented the operation being performed in Elba, and even at the present day, the ore has to be carried to Naples, Genoa, Marseilles, or Bastia. The mines of Rio are richer than those of Prince Demidoff in Siberia, and probably their equal cannot be found in the world. At present they are worked by a Tuscan company and produce about 35,000 tons annually. Up to the present there has not been a shaft sunk, and thus, in all probability, the iron supply will be unfailing.—The Island of Elba.

DOING UP CONSIDERABLE SLEEP.

"Away out in Missouri" they live on the primitive system. People sleep as well as eat in companies, and in many of the hotels there are from three to a dozen beds in each chamber. On a cold winter's night, a weary and foot-worn traveller arrived at one of those caravansaries by the road-side. After stepping into the bar-room and taking the requisite number of "drinks," he invoked the attention of the accommodating landlady with this interrogatory:

"I say, ma'am, have you got a considerable number of beds in your house?"

"Yes," answered she, "I reckon we have."

"How many beds have you about this time that aint noways engaged?"

"Well, we've one room up stairs with eleven beds in it."

"That's just right," said the traveller. "I'll take that room and engage all the beds, if you please."

The landlady, not expecting any more company for the night, and thinking that her guest might wish to be alone, consented that he should occupy the room. But no sooner had the wayfarer retired, than a large party arrived and demanded lodgings for the night. The landlady told them she was very sorry, but all her rooms were engaged; true, there was one room with eleven beds in it, and only one gentleman.

"We must go there, then—we must have beds there." The party accordingly proceeded to the chamber with the beds and wrapped; no answer was returned. They essayed to open the door—it was locked. They shouted aloud, but received no reply. At last driven to desperation, they determined upon bursting open the door. They had no sooner done so, than they discovered every bedstead empty, and all of the beds piled one upon another in the centre of the room, with the traveller sound asleep on their top. They with some difficulty aroused him, and demanded what in the world he wanted with all those beds.

"Why look here, strangers," said he, "I aint had no sleep these eleven nights; so I just hired eleven beds, to get rested all at once and make up what I have lost. I calculate to do up a considerable mess of sleeping; I've hired all these beds and paid for 'em, and hang me if I don't have eleven nights sleep out on 'em before morning."—New Orleans Picayune.

ADAM'S WEDDING.

We like short courtships and in this Adam acted like a man; he fell asleep a bachelor, and awoke to find himself a married man. He appears to have "popped the question" immediately after meeting Ma'mselle Eve, and she, without flirtation or shyness, gave him a kiss and herself. Of that first kiss in this world we have had, however, our own thoughts, and sometimes in poetical mood we have wished we were the man that did it. But the deed is or was done; the chance was Adam's and he improved it. We like the notion of getting married in a garden, it is in good taste. We like a private wedding, and Adam's was strictly private. No envious beaux were there, no croaking old maids, no chattering aunts and grumbling grandmother. The birds of heaven were the minstrels, and the glad sky shed its lights upon the scene.

THE OLD MAN TO HIS FRIEND.

BY GEORGE H. COOMER.

O friend, dear friend, we are not old,
Not old in heart, my friend;
Our pathway 'neath the sunset-gold
Hath greenness to the end.

Though age has made o'er face and form
All mortal beauty sear,
The heart's own soil is flowery-warm,
No frost hath reached us here.

Though o'er our heads the gathering snows
Come gently, yet so fast,
We count by these not future woes,
But griefs of seasons past.

Toward dreary gloom we do not draw,
When hope must cease to soar;
We're nearer all man liveth for,
Than o'er we were before.

O should we faint while flee and fade
Life's few and evil days,
And could we see but fearful shade
Beyond their sunset rays—

Did not some glorious promise lend
Sweet comfort in our need—
We should, alas, be old, my friend,
We should be old, indeed!

ONE OF TWELVE.

BY EDWIN MILFORD.

SOME years ago, I was hastily passing along the crowded streets of my native city, on my way home, after a long absence from my family and friends. I was naturally in very much of a hurry, and was not greatly pleased to be confronted suddenly by a person who announced himself as Coroner Blankman, and who pressing invited me to form one of his jury. In vain I represented my great haste, and that probably I was anxiously expected at that moment by my wife and children. My friend Blankman would take no denial.

"My dear Mr. Jones," said he, (I belong to the firm of Jones, Smith, Jones & Co.,) "it is precisely good, sensible, business-men like you whom I want, and such men always are in a hurry."

Somewhat mollified by the compliment, I gave a reluctant consent to the invitation, especially as Coroner Blankman stated that it was a very simple and evident case of suicide, which would not detain us long.

"Who is it?" I inquired, as I turned with my new friend, to retrace my steps.

"Why, you will be surprised to hear that it is one of the Brothers Pitcairn of Ingot Street. You knew them, I suppose.

"Yes, in a business way; I certainly am very much surprised. Suicide, did you say?"

"Looks like it, but you must make up your mind for yourself. Here we are." And we turned into the store of the Brothers Pitcairn.

These men, their names were James and William, were middle-aged bachelors, who carried on a broker's business, and were reputed to be very wealthy. Certainly they were very parsimonious, living in two little rooms behind their office, having no servant but a charwoman, who came for an hour in the morning, and dressing in the coarsest and cheapest clothes.

Neighbors they had none, as Ingot Street, as everybody knows, is merely a business street, and uninhabited by night, save by watchmen and a few economists like the two brothers, who inhabit otherwise useless rooms, in their warehouses.

Great had been the consternation, therefore, of the occupants of the next store, on the morning of this 31st of September, to see old Peggy O'Flinn rush into their counting-room, and beseech them for the love of Heaven to come directly into the next house.

"For one gentleman is stark and stiff, kilt and kilt intirely, and the other is like to die of fright," said she.

Thus appealed to, masters and clerks rushed in, pell-mell, to the hitherto uninvaded and mysterious private apartments of their unsocial neighbors. On entering the principal room, used as sitting and dining-room, a truly awful sight met their view. On the floor lay the rigid and bleeding form of James Pitcairn, stone dead, and with his fingers clenched around the handle of a dagger, which still remained in the one deadly wound, apparently penetrating his heart.

On the floor sat the younger brother, his face covered with his hands, and all his senses so clouded with horror, that he could give no explanation of the dreadful scene, except to point to a slip of paper upon the table on which was written in pencil.

"I am about to commit suicide, for reasons sufficient to myself, but known to no other mortal."
JAMES PITCAIRN.

Leaving everything in the same state in which he had found it, Mr. Pitkins the proprietor of the establishment next door, despatched a messenger for Mr. Coroner Blankman, and another for a physician. The latter arrived at the scene of the awful tragedy, at the same moment that the coroner entered with myself, who completed the requisite number of the jury of inquest.

William Pitcairn, still sat almost motionless upon the floor, at the side of what had been his brother, his face covered, and his mind so engrossed by grief and terror, that he failed to comprehend the questions addressed to him by Mr. Blankman and others.

Peggy O'Flinn was still present, but so agitated that her testimony was very incoherent. It finally was condensed in the statement that on coming to her work as usual, she had found the back door fastened, and could not make any one hear her repeated knocks. That she had come round to the counting-room door, and waited till the boy arrived to take down the shutters, and open the door. She had then passed through into the sitting-room, and found the body, cold, even then. Screaming with terror, she had rushed into Mr. William's bed-room, which adjoined the sitting-room, and aroused him from a deep and tranquil sleep. He had hastily dressed himself, come out, read the slip of paper upon the table, and then sinking upon the floor, had taken the position which he still occupied.

All this was not given as testimony under oath, but told as a narrative to one and another who questioned her, while the physician was feeling the pulses, and examining the body, to see if any vestiges of life might still linger. At last, rising to his feet, Doctor Charnry shook his head.

"He has been dead for hours," said he. "There is nothing possible to be done except to undress and lay him out, I will send a person for that purpose—but stop—"

And the physician knelt again and examined the deep wound from which but little blood issued outwardly. Long and attentively did Doctor Charnry examine the position and direction of the stab, from which he had withdrawn the dagger, still tightly clutched in the dead man's fingers. Then, looking quickly up, the old doctor shot a keen, searching glance from beneath his shaggy eyebrows, first at the old charwoman, and then at the crouching man beside him.

"We will raise the body and place it on these two tables," said he, at length; "Mr. William Pitcairn, I must beg your assistance."

So saying, the doctor took the still impassive man by the arm, and forced him to rise to his feet. In so doing he disclosed his face for the first time since we entered, and truly, such a haggard, withered look, I should not have supposed it possible for a few hours to produce, upon that hitherto florid countenance.

The doctor still eyed him attentively, but did not insist upon his helping to raise the body. This was done by Coroner Blankman and himself. When it was carefully extended upon the two large tables, the coroner was about to remove the dagger from the cold fingers, still clenched about it, but Doctor Charnry, by a slight movement of the head, prevented him, at the same time whispering a few words in his ear.

The coroner turned to William Pitcairn, who still stood where the doctor had left him, his eyes cast down, and his face trembling convulsively.

"Mr. Pitcairn," said Blankman, solemnly, "it is proper that this dagger should be removed from your brother's hand. Will you be so good as to do it?"

At this request, the face which had before been of ashy whiteness, now turned lividly pale, and shaking his head vehemently, the mourner was about to leave the room, but was stopped by the coroner.

"I have no doubt, sir," said he, kindly, "that it is very trying to your feelings to be present at this investigation, but I must take your testimony presently, and in the meantime it is necessary that you should comply with my request. Surely you are not afraid to touch your brother's hand," added he, in a whisper, which I, alone, was near enough to hear.

At these words Pitcairn, shooting at his tormentor a look of fear and hate, turned from the door which he had reached, and going precipitately to his brother's side, began hastily to unclench the cold, stiff fingers from the handle of the bloody dagger. We all stood looking at him, and pitying his excessive agitation; but suddenly our attention was attracted to the corpse. As William unclosed the last finger, a convulsive motion crept over the rigid form before him, and suddenly the eyes, which had been tightly closed, flew open, and rolling vacantly for a moment, fixed themselves upon the face of horror which bent over the dead hand.

More and more, recollection and expression surged up in great waves into those horrible, glassy eyes. A fierce resolution seemed to combat with the departing faculty of speech. At last that iron will, stronger even than death, conquered, and half-raising himself, his gleaming eyes fastened themselves more and more intently upon his brother's face, the white lips unclosed, and he whom we had thought dead spoke.

"Murderer! Confess!"

All eyes turned with a start of horror to the man, summoned from the other world, as it were, by the spirit of his victim, to yield himself up to the earthly judgment which was but a type of that more solemn and irrevocable tribunal to which he was hastening.

I cannot tell which was the more fearful spectacle—that stern face struggling with death, or that hardly more animated one which could not turn away from its summons. We had thought him pale before; I know not what to call the color which usurped that pallor. His eyes had gleamed with fear and terror; it was as nothing to the look of agonized doom with which they fastened on the fast glazing eyes of his dead brother; each hair stood upright upon his head, and as his ashen lips opened, apparently without volition upon his own part, a voice thick, hoarse and broken, came forth like an echo of those sepulchral tones which still vibrated through the room.

“Yes, James, I know it, I am a murderer, and I will confess, that they may kill me as I have you—but after!”

He gasped for breath and presently went on, his eyes still fastened upon those of the dead man.

“You said that you would find poor Jessie, whom you ruined when we both were young, and that you would marry her, and make her boy your heir. I told you that it was robbing me of my inheritance, and I could never consent. Then, James, you spoke bitter, angry words, and bid me seek a remedy. I stole upon you, from behind, and then I drove my dagger to the hilt. I aimed at your heart, and you fell without a word; only your eyes, they turned their last look upon mine, and burned in their stern reproach upon my brain. I called the fiends to aid me, and pressed down the lids, tight and tighter over them. You had clutched at the dagger as you fell, I held your fingers there till they stiffened. I wrote the note and signed it with your name. Then I went and crawled into my bed, but your eyes followed me there, they gazed upon me from every corner to which I madly turned for refuge. I covered my head, but they gazed upon me from vacancy. I tried to pray, but the fiend snatched the words from my lips, and laughed aloud in my ear. The woman came and I feigned to sleep; no one suspected me till that old man bent over you—did you whisper the secret to him, or did I say it aloud, as I have said it in my heart without ceasing?”

“Now I have confessed. I have done your bidding. O, shut those fearful, searching eyes!” And with a wild peal of hysteric laughter, the unhappy man sank back in a strong fit.

He revived enough to dictate and sign a full confession some days after, but did not live until his day of trial. Before that came, murderer and murdered lay side by side in the city churchyard, and accuser and accused had met before a more solemn tribunal than any of earth.

THE EVE BEFORE THE BATTLE.

BY EDWIN L. LOTHROP.

“AND after all, we must be separated, Jules! Ah, my God! what has your poor Celeste done, that the only flower that ever opened upon her life should fade and droop away just as its bloom began to cheer and bless her? What do we care for the man who rides over the heads of our rightful born kings? Napoleon, forsooth! Bonaparte, the Corsican!”

“Hush, sweetest wife! Forget that you were ever a subject of any save the Emperor Napoleon. He rules France, and we pay allegiance where it belongs. And the lovely empress too—our good Josephine. Why, Celeste, next to your own dear self, there is not a woman in the world, no, nor a person, man or woman, that I would draw my sword so readily to defend, as Josephine, even were she not the empress. You should hear Jacques Hand tell what she did for his suffering family, when the fever deprived him of all power to labor. You must know that Jacques is a lapidary, and employed by some of our best jewellers, who make vast sums from his labors, while they pay him little or nothing for his work. Well, he works in a damp basement, and as might be expected, he caught cold and was laid up with a very severe fit of sickness. One thing after another went to the pawn-broker’s from his few household possessions, to pay the doctor and apothecary, until Jacques seriously proposed to his wife to carry out his tools and sell them for what she could get. She obeyed him very unwillingly, for she thought it would be impossible for him to replace them on his recovery; but like a good wife, as she is, she did not remonstrate a word.

“When she went to the drawer, however, where the delicate instruments were kept, she observed a quantity of stones lying there, which she remembered as some which a sailor had once given her husband. They were nearly valueless, as she had often heard him say, but he had nevertheless polished and re-polished them, till they were really very beautiful. Without saying anything to Jacques, she gathered these all up, and placing them carefully in the case of instruments, upon cotton, she proceeded to the jeweller’s shop, to which he had directed her to carry the tools, and offered them for sale, supposing they would bring only a trifle.

“In the shop was a lady whom she recognized as the empress, though in a plain dress, and with no carriage waiting. She knew her readily from the portraits which she had frequently seen of her. Madame Hand told her errand; and the jeweller, who is a man of feeling and honor, exclaimed, 'what a pity to take your husband's tools, for he will soon want them to use, I trust; and these stones, which are indeed so very pretty, are, I am sorry to say, worthless.'

"Josephine, approaching him, after hearing the wife's story, offered to buy them, on condition that the jeweller should set them in a plain, rich style, and keep perfectly secret as to their value. He agreed; and the empress paid the full worth of real stones; and Madame Hand returned with her stone-cutting instruments, and money enough to supply their needs until Jacques should be restored to health."

This conversation took place between a young soldier and his wife, on the eve of one of those battles which immortalized the name of Napoleon Bonaparte, but which various opinions have lauded and execrated, as the case might be. Jules Montespan was a youth of nobler blood than the Corsican could boast; but by a long series of family reverses, brought on by the downfall of the Bourbons, he was at length obliged to accept a lower rank in the army, than his birth and education would have entitled him to accept. His scientific knowledge was of a high order; although his modesty prevented him from displaying his attainments.

Once or twice, it was evident to him that Napoleon had made a false move; but he did not dare to express his opinion openly; and although he would have been an acquisition to the army as a superior officer, he still remained as a private in the regiment of dragoons, where he had been noted by his companions as a brave soldier and a faithful friend. One year before he had married the daughter of a musical composer, Pierre Benard; and her beauty, good sense and innocence were better to him than the greatest wealth or rank could have been. Their home was in a quiet, retired spot, far from the noise of the great world, and where Monsieur Benard could compose without disturbance, the operas which, just then, were charming the musical world with their sprightliness and grace.

Like a good and true daughter, Celeste Benard would not leave her old father alone; and although she had accompanied Jules to the scene from whence the army were to commence hostilities, she was intending to go back to her home on the following day.

Half an hour after her conversation with her husband, Napoleon was seated in his private tent, poring over the imperfect plan which he had arranged. Imperfect, because his usual sagacity was at fault in a single point which affected, or threatened to affect, the whole affair. For once, he was foiled, and the thought that he was so corrugated his brow and pervaded his whole appearance. Testy exclamations issued from his lips, and an involuntary drawing away of the muscles around his mouth showed that he was in a state of perturbation and disturbance unusual to him. He was awakened from a fruitless reverie, by a tap at the door of the tent. The guard entered at his call, and announced one of the dragoons of the —th regiment.

Napoleon, irritated at his want of success, sternly demanded his business. The visitor respectfully laid it before him. It was a plan for the next day's work, detailing at length the mode of attack and defence, describing the whole in a scientific and masterly manner, and covering the point of difficulty in the most ingenious and thorough way.

Napoleon saw the advantage he had gained at once, and was intensely vexed that he had not before discovered it himself. He contented himself, however, with asking his name only. No word of thanks or commendation escaped his lips; and when Jules Montespan (for he was the midnight visitor of Napoleon), warming into enthusiasm, pointed to this or that unprotected spot in the enemy's fortifications, and showed how easily they might be stormed, or how adroitly a secret attack could be made, he was coolly made to understand that he might leave the presence of one who could not bear a rival in the minutest point.

Equally cool became the soldier; and when he bowed himself out of the tent, it would have been difficult to say which of the two comforted himself with the greatest haut-cœur.

Returning to Celeste, he spent with her the few remaining hours which intervened between that time and the call to arms. Celeste was overcome with the dread of separation. She had a strange presentiment of coming evil, of which all her husband's efforts could not divest her. She was weeping when he entered, but hastily endeavored to conceal her tears from Jules. With the quick eye of affection, he saw that she was distressed, and tried to wile her from her apprehensions, by painting to her in glowing colors the paradise they would make of their little home in the country, when the war should be over.

The moment of separation came. Celeste had not closed her eyes for the night, and at day-break she heard the first beat of the drum that called her husband from her arms. In her excited state, it sounded like the death note. With its first deep, echoing roll, in the gray stillness of the morning, hope departed out of her heart, leaving it cold and lifeless with apprehension. To prolong this scene would be cruel. Jules pressed his lips again and again to her forehead, clasped her in his arms for the last time, and rushed from the house.

An hour after, Celeste was on her way home. Passing a lonely churchyard, dark and dense with shadows from the yews and cypresses which seemed more in accordance with her feelings, she begged the driver of the diligence to allow her to alight, while he ascended a steep hill, that she might have time to pluck some of the mournful buds that opened slowly and drearly under the heavy shadows of the trees.

When she entered the vehicle again, she felt as if she had been gathering these sad memorials to scatter over her husband's grave. Her home was, in many respects, the paradise that Jules had promised to make it the night before. It had been the summer dwelling of one of the aristocratic families of France, before the Revolution; and although the house itself was somewhat decayed, the surroundings were of the finest kind.

As she approached, the setting sun cast its brightest ray upon the figure of the old composer as he sat in the rustic porch, which was made of the branches of small trees intertwined, and covered with a profusion of honey-suckle.

His appearance brought a fresh burst of tears from the eyes of Celeste, and she sprang from the diligence, to be sheltered in his fatherly arms. He needed not to ask the cause of her grief.

"Be comforted, my daughter," he said gently. "His fate is with the God of battles."

The next day, Celeste tried to settle herself to her daily avocations. She even had the courage to employ herself upon some linen that she was making up for Jules; although her shaking fingers and the tears that trembled in her eyelids, showed that the pain was still at her heart.

Her father was moved by this silent grief, and when she told him of her presentiments he shook his head in silence. Afterwards, when he had evidently thought a great deal about what she had expressed, he said to her:

"I do not actually believe in presentiments, Celeste; but at the same time, I know many instances in which they have been realized in a most remarkable way. We will hope that your fears have been all in vain. When Jules comes home to us, bright with health and flushed with victory, you will laugh at these melancholy thoughts, or forget that you ever allowed them to have a feather's weight with you."

"When Jules comes home!" murmured she.

She repeated this so often, as if to prop up her sunken courage, that Mons. Benard really began to feel alarmed for her reason. She had taken scarcely any nourishment since she returned, and her excitement had already begun to make inroads upon her appearance. A hectic flush had stationed itself on the upper part of her cheek, leaving the rest of her face white and ghastly.

The old gardener whom they occasionally hired to assist—for their means would not allow them to keep a man servant constantly, had been a soldier in his youth. To him, Mons. Benard confided his anxieties respecting his daughter, and received the old man's cordial sympathy. Madame Montespan's little maid, too, Rose Vernet, was in the greatest distress and agitation imaginable on her mistress's account. She lay down beside her at night, held her hot and burning hands, and did not close her eyes to sleep, until she saw those poor weeping orbs sink to their unquiet slumber.

So passed two or three days—the length of which might have been years, if we measured time by agony. It was growing late in the afternoon and the red sun was fast sinking into the west. The quiet retirement of Belleisle gave back no echo from its hillside, and the twilight that was coming on was still and soundless.

Suddenly, Celeste sprang from the couch, her whole figure elate with expectation. "Do you hear that, father?" she asked, as her face brightened into a glow. It was the first word she had spoken since the morning, and she now stood as if waiting the return of a sound which no one else had heard.

Again she started like a fawn, and with a strength that must have been borrowed only from excitement, she ran up the hill with swift and hurried steps. They all followed her—the old gardener, Mons. Benard and little Rose. Celeste stood with her ear turned towards the distant city, in an attitude of expectation. "Again!" she uttered; and this time the sound was heard by all. It was the firing at Paris. The battle then was over. It was the sound of victory, for the roar of cannon came booming at regular intervals. Celeste seemed renewed in health and spirits. She slept calmly that night, and the next day was cheerfully smiling at her own fears.

Another night must necessarily elapse before her soldier could return; but the morning after that, she would most assuredly see him. She trusted now in his safety; for the news of victory was spread far and wide, by couriers who scarcely drew rein until their tired horses fell to the ground. And if there was victory, why, surely Jules must have helped to achieve it.

"Not this cloth, Rose, dear, but the very best,"

she said on the morning after the second day. "And lay the table in your best style. Cut the brightest flowers you can find in the garden, and I will go down the lane by myself and get the Provence roses for our vases. Ah, I wish the grapes were ripe, but futher, you can bring out the bottle of old Maraschino which we have preserved so long for some festive occasion. Our poor, weary soldier will need its refreshing virtues. And old Bernardin will bring in his early fruits, and we will make some of those nice pates that Jules likes so well."

To her father, this unwonted excitement was nearly as melancholy as her former state—but he indulged all her fancies, and brought her everything she asked for. He walked down the lane with her after the roses, and cut them for her himself, that the large garden scissors which they used in cutting the grape vines might not hurt her thin and tender hands. While they stood there, in the light of the early morning, Celeste again threw herself into an attitude of listening. It seemed as if her previously nervous state had preternaturally sharpened all her senses.

"Listen, father! I hear the tramping of many feet. What can that be? I should not wonder if Jules is coming, attended by all the young men from this and the adjoining hamlets. Listen! they are horses' feet. It is perhaps the whole company of dragoons to which Jules belongs."

She waited, clinging nervously to her father's arm until a turn in the road brought the whole procession to her sight. Then with a wild cry, which might almost have waked the dead, regardless of the horses' hoofs, she dashed into the midst of the dragoons, and lifted up the close curtain of a litter which was borne a short distance from the front of the procession. Jules lay there so pale and still, that at first she thought he was dead; but at sight of her, his eye gleamed with a sudden light. The dragoons stopped, and Celeste, throwing herself upon her knees by the side of the litter, scattered without knowing it, the roses which she had gathered, all over the form that lay within it.

The scent of the flowers came to him with a life-giving power. "Home! Home!" burst from the pale lips, and Celeste allowed them now to bear her poor wounded soldier to the couch where she had passed so many sleepless hours.

The gallant soldier had been in the thickest of the fight, and at no moment had spared himself. Near the close of the battle, almost at the very moment of victory, he was wounded by a sabre cut, which at first was not thought dangerous. His intense anxiety to get home induced those who were most intimate with him, to obtain leave for the escort; and by slow degrees, they had come from afar, to bring home their dying comrade.

For Jules Montespan was dying! Not even the love of Celeste, strong and passionate as it was, could detain him past that day. Love had sustained him in life till he could look on her once more, and breathe the air of his beloved home, and then he could bear to die. Celeste watched him through every moment of that day, ministering all those tender offices which she only could perform; and at the twilight hour, which deepened around her, just as it had done two nights before, when listening to the roar of the cannon, she held his cold hand in hers, and pressed upon his lips the last kiss she would ever give to him in life.

A week later there was a gala night at the imperial palace. Many of Napoleon's heroes were there, and a knot of his generals were gathered closely around him and Josephine. The recent battle was the theme of conversation.

"That was a most ingenious stroke of your majesty's, at the last," said one of the generals. "That won us the victory!"

"The conception was not mine, general," replied the emperor, with magnanimity. "I owe it to one of the dragoons of the —th regiment. I have forgotten that man too long. I saw him, too, fighting on the field, like a lion. I have his name somewhere, I think." And from the folds of some old tablets which Josephine had given him in the first days of the courtship between the first consul and herself, he drew forth an ivory leaf, on which was inscribed "Jules Montespan."

"Here is the young Count de Montalban, who served in the same regiment that you speak of, your majesty."

"Ah! then you can doubtless inform me where I may find your gallant comrade, count."

"He is dead, sire."

"Dead!"

"I helped to bear him home to his young and beautiful wife, wounded at the very close of the battle. He lived only through the day."

"His widow shall be pensioned immediately."

"Sire, his wife was buried with him. They were never separated. Her child, a few hours old, sleeps with them."

Long after this, an aged man, attended by another like himself, and a young and pretty woman whom they called Rose, might be seen every morning scattering flowers over a little mound at the foot of the hill above Belleisle. No tombstone tells who rests beneath—but a father's heart mourned deeply above that spot, until he, too, slept the slumber of the grave.

THE ORDEAL OF PRIDE.

BY MRS. FANNY E. BARBOUR.

"You are dressing yourself very elaborately to-night, Margarette," remarked Mrs. Clayton, as she entered her daughter's room.

"Yes, mother," returned Margarette, with heightened color.

"Are you expecting visitors this evening?" inquired Mrs. Clayton, after a moment's pause, during which her eyes with an anxious glance had followed the motions of her daughter's fingers.

"No, mother; I am going to Mrs. Walton's party."

"And I not informed of it!" said her mother, reproachfully. "With whom are you going?"

"Mr. Payson is to be my escort." There was a tremulous motion of the white fingers, as the young girl continued to arrange the flowing drapery, which told that her heart was not quite at ease.

"Margarette!" A world of love and sorrow was in the tone of the mother's voice, and her eyes were full of tears.

"Well, mother?"

"Why will you so grieve my heart, my child? Why will you bring sorrow upon yourself?"

"Is it then so terrible a crime for a young girl to attend an evening party?" said Margarette.

"My daughter, once more listen to me. Have I not again and again told you my reasons for wishing you to discontinue your intimacy with Frank Payson? Is it not your good and happiness alone which I ask?"

"Some people have curious ways of trying to accomplish their purposes," remarked the daughter, calmly, with a slight sneer curling her lips.

"Margarette, may it never be your lot to feel 'how sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child.' God knows I have tried to do my duty, and to make you a good and happy woman; and I will still try, though you do grieve me sorely, and sometimes make me faint and heart-sick."

"Go on, mother, this is very agreeable," said the young girl, as she sank into a chair; "but please be as brief as you can, consistently, for it is nearly time for me to go, and it would be a pity to lose any of the discourse."

For a moment Mrs. Clayton could not speak; but controlling her emotion, she said:

"Once more, I must beg of you to hold no further intercourse with that man, he is not in any respect a fitting associate for you."

"Allowing you to judge of his qualifications," sneered Margarette.

"My child, your mother has seen more than double your years, and she can judge better than you in this matter. I entreat you to consider it well, and pause now before it is too late."

"Spare your entreaties, mother, I have promised, and am going with Mr. Payson to-night; in fact I believe he is at the hall-door now." And rising she went to the door to listen for his steps.

"Then, Margarette, hear me; if neither entreaties nor tears, a mother's tears, will prevail to save you, I will use authority. I command you to remain in your room; I will see Mr. Payson, and make your excuses for to-night and the future."

She was passing out, when Margarette's voice detained her.

"Mother!" The tall form of the young girl was drawn up to its full height, and she seemed to look down upon her mother, as her splendid eyes shot forth rays of angry light. "Am I a child, to be commanded thus?" she said, in a low, hissing tone. "Henceforth I consult only my own inclinations, and if you dare to interfere, my mother though you are, you will regret it as long as you live. You are answered, and thus do I obey commands. Good-night, and pleasant dreams!" And with a low, mocking laugh, she passed out, and the next moment, with a calm, unruffled brow, she was replying to Mr. Payson's greeting.

Pre-eminent among the many forms of beauty and grace which made Mrs. Walton's crowded rooms so attractive, was the queenly figure of Margarette Clayton, as she passed slowly along, leaning on the arm of Mr. Payson, and none could have guessed, from her gentle and winning manner, that beneath that beautiful exterior there slumbered a haughty and unlovely spirit. But once let the proud will be thwarted, and the quick, sharp flashing of her eyes told that all her powers were roused for resistance, and it would be strange if she did not come off victorious in the contest.

At length, fatigued and heated, she seated herself beside an open window, and for a few moments gave herself up to a dreamy enjoyment of the brilliant living panorama which was passing before her. But her repose was not of long duration, for her own name, spoken in a low voice by some one on the balcony close beside the window arrested her attention, and when the answer came, she recognized the voices of two of her friends, who were discussing her appearance, and drawing inferences therefrom, never dreaming that their subdued tones could be overheard by a third person. At first, she was only amused, and her heart throbbed with an exultant consciousness of her power, as they spoke of the beautiful grace of her every motion, and of how naturally she attracted and received admiration, as if she were a very queen, accepting the homage of her loyal subjects.

"But," said Minnie Gray, "if I do not greatly mistake, there is one heart, which she cannot subdue."

"You mean Mr. Payson," returned Lucy Davis. "It is quite evident that he admires her, but if reports are true he has no heart to give, for he has already bestowed it upon so many that he cannot have any left. And I am told that in the town where he used to live, there is one poor girl who has lost her reason, in consequence of his baseness. I hope Margarette will not continue intimate with him, for I am quite sure that on two occasions I have seen him when his brain was confused with liquor."

"Why, Lucy, you astonish me!" replied Minnie. "I only meant that he sings so splendidly, and is so attractive generally, that there will be too many rivals in the field for Margarette's chance to be worth much, even should she desire to win him. I heard Mary Ellis and Katie Steele say, jokingly, that they were going to 'set their caps' for him, and you know they are both magnificent looking girls; many think them quite superior to Margarette, even in personal charms."

"Well," said Lucy, laughing, "I shall leave them to fight their own battles. But as you say, with such enemies in the field, I do not believe Margarette will win; but time will tell."

"Ay, time will tell!" muttered Margarette, between her closed teeth; but her brow was as serene and cloudless as ever, and her laugh rang out silvery and clear, as some of her young companions joined her, and commenced the recital of some amusing occurrence.

Margarette Clayton did not love Frank Payson, and had never loved him; but she greatly admired his musical talents, and was flattered by the marked attentions of the handsome stranger. She was not ignorant of the rumors which were floating about to his discredit, and in her heart she sometimes believed them; but she was too wilful and self-reliant to act upon offered advice, even though it came from her best friend, and so had continued against her own better judgment, to permit his constant visits and attentions.

But now, her pride was aroused, and she determined to show the world that she could win the contested prize, notwithstanding the brilliant charms which were arrayed against her. And she succeeded. Within one short month from the time of Mrs. Walton's party, there was a midnight elopement and a marriage, and the bride and groom were Margarette Clayton and Frank Payson.

A year had passed. It was night, dark and gloomy, and the heavy rain beat against the windows of a plainly furnished room, where sat a young woman, bending over some light work which she held carelessly, as if she was quite indifferent with regard to the progress which her fingers made in its accomplishment. She was not thinking of her work, it was evident, for occasionally an angry flush would pass over her face, and her great black eyes seemed to gather new and intenser brilliancy from the thoughts which were passing within. At length, as a slow, uncertain step sounded on the walk without, she threw down her work, and springing to the door, opened it wide, and passed out into the stormy night. For a moment, so intense was the darkness, she could see nothing, but becoming accustomed to the gloom, she groped her way slowly down the little walk to the gate, and there, half seated and half lying in the wet grass, she found, as she had expected, the figure of a man. Grasping his arms with her whole strength, she tried to raise him, and at length succeeded. Having partially roused him, she at length got him into the house; but not until her own garments, as well as his, were drenched through with the pouring rain. The door was no sooner closed upon them, than she relaxed her hold, and he fell heavily to the floor.

"Lie there, brute!" she said, spurning him with her foot, as if he were a loathsome reptile. "You enter no room of mine to-night." He was already in a deep sleep, and she passed into her room, closing and locking the door after her, leaving him to rest as best he might on his hard couch, in his wet clothing.

Ah! Margarette Payson, the discipline of sorrow is not yet completed! Still deeper of the bitter cup thy spirit must drink ere it becomes gentle and beautiful as woman's should ever be.

The next morning, when Frank Payson's drunken lethargy had passed away, there was bitter strife between him and his beautiful wife—and so there had been on similar occasions for months. He had married her because she was the reputed heiress of the rich Mr. Clayton; but Frank Payson's wife was no longer considered as Mr. Clayton's daughter, and when he found that the contested prize had eluded his grasp, he gave vent to his disappointment in coarse oaths and curses, and did not attempt to conceal his real disposition.

On her part, the stubborn pride of character which had led her into this misery, rose up in fierce rebellion and hatred toward him, and she made no effort to lead her husband into a better way. And with this dreary cloud of shame and misery resting upon them, they lived on, until poverty, deep and hopeless, seemed likely to crush out the wife's pride and life together.

Bending over a rough cradle, a pale and sorrow-stricken woman sat, watching with keenest anxiety the infant who lay within, lest the feeble spark of its brief life should go out without her knowledge; and fervently, as the hot tears fell, she prayed that God would spare her child. Discarded by her father, abused and left to starve by her husband, what had she in the wide world to bind her to life but this tiny being, who even now seemed about to pass from her sight? She could not die, and wildly she prayed that her child might live, that there might be one ray of light to cheer her darkened woe. Just then, her husband, with ragged and disordered attire, and his uncombed hair streaming over his bloated face, staggered into the room.

"I want some money!" he growled, savagely. She did not notice him, but bent yet closer to the sleeping child, from whose face she did not for an instant remove her agonized gaze. "Mag, I say, are you deaf? Give me that money you got yesterday." And he laid his hand heavily upon her shoulder.

"I've no money for you," she said, shaking him off. "Go and beg!" And again her eyes sought the calm, pure face of her child.

"You can't fool me! I saw Old Turner come in here yesterday, and I know you've been doing some sewing for him; so give me the money, or I'll know the reason." And with an oath, he seized her luxuriant hair, and sent the comb which confined it, flying in a dozen pieces.

Starting up, for an instant her eyes blazed with the old fire, which sorrow had partially subdued.

"Fool! beast!" she exclaimed, "you are not a man! I have given you the last cent you will get from my earnings, even if you die in a gutter for the want of more!"

"Then I'll see what I can do to raise the needful. Here, take your precious brat!" Seizing the child, ere she could spring to prevent it, he tossed it towards her, and taking the cradle, started for the door.

When the poor, distracted mother lifted the babe from the floor, where it lay motionless, her child was no longer a feeble, suffering mortal; but a freed, rejoicing spirit. Its head had struck the sharp rocker of the cradle, in passing, and thus, through murder's terrible gate, the immortal soul had passed upward.

It would be useless for me to try, for my weak pen could never picture the wild anguish of that mother, as she pressed the little cold form to her bosom. For a time, the over-tried brain trembled on the very verge of insanity; and fearful, blasphemous words escaped from her lips, as the black gulf of despair rolled its waves higher and higher between her and the light. But at length a merciful Father sent his ministering angels to her soul, and from the lowly grave of her child, Margarette Payson's spirit was born into a new and better life.

A strange, calm peace pervaded her being, and the sweet thought that one among the angels called her mother, gave her a holier joy than she had known while her child was with her in the flesh. At last, after many prayers and agonizing tears, the last remnant of the old perverse, wilful nature passed away, and with undoubting confidence, she said, like him of old, "I will arise and go to my father."

Gratefully and affectionately her parents received their penitent child; and it was like balm to her bruised spirit, to listen once more to gentle tones from those she loved. Aided by his wealth and love for his restored child, Mr. Clayton did not rest until she had procured a divorce from her husband.

But now she has aspirations and hopes of which once she had not dreamed, and she would not sit idly down, contented to pass a life of ease without one effort to do good to those around her; so for a year, she applied herself constantly to study, reviewing and perfecting herself in the various branches necessary for a thorough education; then, with the full consent and co-operation of her parents, who saw that it would greatly increase her happiness, she opened and fitted up a room in her father's spacious mansion, and collected about her a band of young girls, whom she is now guiding in the pleasant paths of knowledge.

And she does not forget the heart, while she is educating the brain; but, taught by her own bitter experience, and enforcing her lessons of goodness by her own gentle, blameless life, she is leading the willing feet of her pupils through flowery paths, to usefulness and happiness.

Margarette Clayton, lovelier now than in her earlier days of beauty, is "clothed with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit." Through suffering and tears, she has "worked out her own salvation," and from black and rayless night there has dawned on her soul the brightness of a new day.

CROWNED A KING.

A supposed Soliloquy of Louis XVI. on assuming the Royal Purple.

BY WILLIE E. PABER.

Crowned a king! but in the crowning
My young heart was dispossessed
Of the holy sense of quiet
I had nurtured in my breast;
And I lost the conscious presence
Of repose, of peace, and rest.

Crowned a king! the noisy rabble
Gathered round my royal throne,
Just as they before had gathered
Round the one whose life alone,
When they had withheld their homage,
For his crowning could atone

Crowned a king! but in the crowning
Staking life upon a throw;
Trusting to the fickle currents
That know not the way they go;
Setting sail for a far-haven
Over seas I do not know.

Crowned a king! And do you envy
All the greatness of the great?
Take the record of the nation—
See what woes on station wait;
And be thankful your position
Does not court the stroke of fate.

Crowned a king! and for my future
I the fearful scroll must ken
Of a past whose crimson record
Boasts the blood of kingly men;
And I see a page unsullied
Waiting for such blood again.

Crowned a king! And is it fancy
Or a stern, prophetic thought,
That reveals a bloody future,
Such as very few should court
If they love a quiet pillow,
Or the peace of conscience sought.

Crowned a king! is it a token
As of old the lamb was drest,
Of a robing for the scaffold?
Has my fever of unrest
Aught to do with such a crowning?
Aught to do with such behest?

FOOTPRINTS IN THE SNOW.

BY MYRA C. GREENLEAF.

I HAD that late at night reading; then tossed for a few hours restlessly upon my bed, with the sound of cold November winds in my ears, and fitful visions of life's labors in my brain, when the gray, timid dawn came creeping in at my window. Faint, and pinched, and starved, it was, as the little beggar boy I had seen in the street the previous night. Unnerved and feverish, I went out into the morning twilight. As I drew back the bolts, and opened the door, the gleam of pure, fresh fallen snow met my eye. "Now to feast my eyes with this purity," said I, with keen pleasure. How pure and white it lay upon the steps—or, awning each separate rail in the fence—wreathed in the corners—out upon the sidewalk, worn with its thousands of viewless tracks—out on the round, foul paving-stones, wallowing in filth, hiding their deformity, and giving to city dwellers, if they would but rise and look upon it, a glimpse, a hint, of what winter sights are in the country.

The wind came whirling down the street and shook me with its rough embrace. But mine was not the first footprint upon the snow, I was aware of a track going on in the way I had taken. I stooped in the dim light to examine it. O, misery! It was a child's, a barefooted child's! I still crouched and examined it. Delicate, slender, I thought emaciated, and here was a slight stain of blood. I turned and traced it back, to find, if possible, the home of misery, if not sin, from which one so young had been sent out on that cold, cold morning with unshod, bleeding feet.

I had not far to go. As is often seen in the more modern houses, the door leading to the kitchen and cellar is directly below the principal entrance, with a flight of winding steps leading down to it. On the third step down, where the last flake of snow rested, was the last or rather the first trembling foot-mark. There, then, while I was tossing restlessly in my bed, some shivering child had watched the night away, or perhaps had slept.

I turned and followed briskly on. The light increased. A market-man's cart rumbled in the distance. Here the little thing had rested on one foot, leaning against a railing, to warm the bleeding foot in its hands. Round the corner, faster and still faster, and there it skulked into a sheltered doorway and sits down upon a step. It is the beggar boy I saw last night, and who hurried past so quick that he could not accost me, stilling the upbraidings of conscience by the sophism, "It is of no use, there are so many of them."

The tattered remnants of a man's coat, and a pair of old knee-breeches, hung upon this shrivelled, almost dwarfed child of ten. Hands and feet were black with dirt, cracked and bleeding from the cold; coarse, stiff hair was matted above savage-looking eyes, but I thought it was fierceness induced by suffering only.

All this while the dirty hand was held up, and a whining voice repeated at short intervals, "a cent, to buy bread."

Through the long summer preceding that November morn I had strolled daily, as night approached, under the lofty old trees in Summer Street. An odd figure attracted my attention. It was that of a woman, approaching with a long, hurried stride. Her garments were of a fashion ten years gone by, her arms were rolled tightly in the corners of a mean, faded shawl folded across her breast. Ha! she is crazy. The gleaming eye tells the tale. Daily I met her, always hurrying, always looking anxiously at every child she saw.

As I looked about me, on that November morning, for some means of removing the boy to my home, which should preclude the necessity of his walking, the maniac approached with folded arms. She gazed a moment at him, then sitting down in the snow gathered his bleeding feet into her lap, saying:

"I have found him. The angel said he would not die, but I should see his bleeding feet and hands. How cold they are, and how stained with sin!"

"Is this your child?"

"Mine? no. I never had a child. I never was married. Men are false." And again she chafed the filthy feet in her delicate hands.

Despairing of a carriage, I proposed that we should take the boy to my house ourselves, and clean and clothe him.

"O, yes, we will wash off his sins. His sins are on the outside, men's sins are in their hearts."

"But what have you lost, my friend, my sister, that you have been searching for so long?"

With a quick, startled glance around, she whispered suddenly in my ear, "my lost innocence, and my sinless child." Then speaking aloud: "You are a woman; you are kind to children, and poor bereaved women like me!"

She would not speak again. Arrived at my house she was the kindest of assistants in the task of cleansing the child, but as silent as a mute.

Washed and fed, robed in a snowy night gown that my little girl in heaven had worn while she was with me here, I laid him in my bed, and saw him sink into a gentle slumber. Then the question arose in my mind, what shall I do with him? If I had known from whence he came, had known that no brutish parent would interfere with me, I should not have hesitated long, though the child's ill manners, coarse language and sickly look were anything but attractive. Finally, I decided to take care of him for the present, and not trouble myself about the future. Turning to my new companion, who sat rocking quickly in a large arm-chair by my side, I said:

"I shall keep the boy."

"You will never repent. How sweet he sleeps. Let me go to sleep with him. I am very tired." And suiting the action to the word she threw herself upon the bed by the side of the child, laying her hand caressingly upon his forehead.

I turned away and sewed on in silence for some time; then rising found the maniac's eyes closed. Once more gentle slumber had been won to those restless, sleepless lids.

Could there be any truth in her words? Was the child her own? And, if so, what was her story? I put the fancy from me; it was too foolish to be harbored; but in a few moments my mind was again dwelling upon it. I passed again to the bedside, to trace the resemblance that there must be, if they were mother and son, and there it was. Unnoticed, while both were awake, it could not but be observed while they slept. The same broad, rather low brow, the same clinging, trusting, almost weak expression of the lips, the same straight nose.

Days passed on. Maria, as she told me to call her, seemed to have forgotten that Jamie, or Jim as he called himself, lived. Hour after hour she sat in the same chair, gazing at the carpet, but becoming each day weaker.

I called a physician unknown to her. When he entered the room, she started from her chair and cowered behind it in an agony of fear. But after many avowals on my part that the gentleman was only Dr. Sanderson, a very dear friend, she consented to return to her former place. Dr. Sanderson looked at me and shook his head, at the same time pointing up, and saying, "There only will the weary rest."

A week passed and Maria lay dying. I scarcely left her, hoping that her clouded mind might once more be illuminated, that reason would resume her sway this side the grave; nor was I disappointed. She had slept, and now turned to me with wondering but sane looks. She took my hand:

"You have been very kind to the poor, friendless maniac. I know now that I have long been insane. None but God will ever know how keen the agony that made me thus."

I begged her not to agitate herself, but she must speak now, she said, and went on:

"Was there not a child, a poor boy, here one day?"

"There was, and Jamie is here now," I replied. A quick flush spread over her face as I spoke his name.

"O, let me see him, now, quick."

I brought the child. She gazed upon him for a moment, turned back the collar from his neck, pointed to a crimson spot, the size of a pea upon his shoulder, then clasped him wildly in her arms, imprinting hurried kisses on his brow and lips.

Jamie was somewhat frightened, nor did he fancy at all the unceremonious embrace, and in his rough way struggled to free himself.

"Alas! he does not know me, so well as I do him. Send him away. I want to speak while my strength lasts."

I complied with her wish, and she continued :

"You will easily guess what I am about to tell you. Jamie is my child.^a He was born in 18—, how long ago is that? I cannot tell."

I replied, and Maria resumed :

"It is the usual tale of man's falsehood and woman's weakness. I cannot say much more. I have stayed at No. 10. — Street. Every year my board has been paid in advance, and I believe money has been sent for the education of my child, but I never could find out certainly. Go to Mrs. Barchmann and tell her my end, and that I wish her to give you my box. You will find among other almost useless articles, a pamphlet, a manuscript; it will tell all, though perhaps wildly."

The last words were uttered in a scarcely audible whisper, and with nearly closed eyelids, and sleep once more fell sweetly upon the wreck before me. It was the last sleep. She passed so gently from life to death I knew it not, although I sat by her bedside, and gazed upon her face.

It is now time to narrate the conversations I had held with Jamie, respecting his home previous to his coming to me, and of his early recollections.

The day following his arrival, I said to him, "Jamie, where did you live before you came here yesterday?"

"Sha'n't tell ye."

"Why not?"

"You'll send me back, and I don't want to go."

"No, Jamie, I will not send you back; you may stay with me if you will be a good boy."

"Sure—wont you let Old Donnelly have me again?"

Jamie had seized my hand in his eagerness, and seemed as if his happiness or misery hung upon my next words.

"No, Mr. Donnelly shall never take you away from me."

"O, I will be so good, if you will tell me what it is to be good; nobody ever told me anything about it."

"You must not swear again, then, if you want to please me." For he had used several oaths during the conversation.

"Swear—what is swear? I don't know."

After explaining my meaning, I repeated my first question, to which he replied :

"I lived with Old Donnelly, in S——'s Alley; but he aint my father, and the old woman aint my mother. Old Donnelly whipped me once, when I was ever so little, for calling him father."

"Did you ever ask him who your parents were?"

"What did you say?"

"Did you ever ask him who your father and mother were?"

"O, yes; I asked him once, and he said I was an imp of sin, and that was enough for me to know."

"Did he ever drink rum?"

"Yes, sometimes, and then he whipped me dreadfully, and would turn me out of doors, and tell me go beg, for it was good enough for me; but then they kept me begging, and used to whip me if I did not bring home a lot, and I was so cold and hungry in the winter."

"What made you come and sleep under my steps that night?"

"Why he and the old woman both got drunk, and beat me, and I hoped I should die before morning if I staid out in the cold."

During another conversation I learned that Old Donnelly had a "big trunk," as Jamie called it, under the bed, where he thought there was money, because when Donnelly and his wife were in good humor he had heard them saying that it was most full of the "shiners," or "round ones," or "beauties."

I tried in vain to call up some recollections of his life previous to his stay with Old Donnelly; cold, hunger, beating and hard words were the only memories he seemed to have. Was it strange if the child was fierce and repulsive in his manners and looks? But he was softening under the influences of love and home comforts. I read stories to him, so as to induce him to learn to read, without, however, telling him my object. I was obliged on one occasion to lay aside the book as the interest of the story culminated; when I returned to the room, I found him turning the leaves of the book rather impatiently.

"What troubles you, Jamie?" said I.

"I cannot read."

"Would you like to learn?"

"Guess I should, but I can't."

"Why can't you learn, Jamie, as well as other boys?"

"Don't know, only I can't."

"If you wish, I will teach you, but it will be difficult for you, and take a long time to learn to read well."

"Let me begin now, and I will be good all day."

The boy's heart was in his work, and in the space of a few weeks he had made more progress than many another child of equal ability would in as many years.

I hesitated long whether to go to Donnelly's and Mrs. Barckmann's. It would be much pleasanter should they never know Jamie's fate, for then no one would ever interfere with me in educating him; on the other hand, I was sure they had dealt unjustly by Maria and her boy, and I wished that they might no longer receive money on their account; and again the hope would arise that from them something might be learned of Jamie's friends. Summoning Dr. Sanderson, I imparted Maria's story, so far as I knew it, and asked him to appoint an early day to accompany me to these places, for I disliked much going alone.

"I am at leisure this morning," he replied, "and the sooner this matter is searched out, the better."

We entered his carriage, which stood at the door.

"Where shall we drive first?"

"To Mrs. Barckmann's, I think. We may there learn something of Jamie, as well as his mother; and at Donnelly's we shall have but little chance of success, unless we are prepared to force him to terms."

A short drive brought us to the place indicated. It was a small, old wooden house, surrounded upon three sides by quite a large yard, the gable standing toward the street. As we opened the gate, which creaked loudly, a somewhat comely looking woman of about fifty drew aside one of the closely drawn curtains, to gaze at the intruders; but finding her gaze met by one equally curious, she abruptly retreated. Our knock summoned an old man, who might have been husband, father or servant to the person we had seen at the window. He was wrinkled and bent to the last degree, but with a still vigorous look in his deep-set, dark-blue eyes, while his garments and bearing were those of a servant. Determined to carry my intention out, I said without hesitation:

"We wish to see Mrs. Barckmann, for a few minutes."

"Your names, and I will ask if she can wait on you."

"Dr. Sanderson and Mrs. Grey."

The wrinkled face turned away, closed the door upon us, and we heard the sound of whispers, indicating that some person had been quite near during our short interview. After a little delay the door was again opened, and a servant girl bade us enter, and showed the way to the room whence the comely matron had looked forth. She stood near the centre of the room, which was large and low, and furnished primly with antique chairs and tables; no sofas, ottomans or lounges, no mantel ornaments, save two silver candlesticks in which were no candles, and a very diminutive pair of silver snuffers.

"Mrs. Barckmann, I suppose?" said I.

"The same; and you are Mrs. Grey?" I bowed. "What is your pleasure with me? I think we are strangers."

The comely face was getting less so every moment. The abundance of flesh was not sufficient to cover the hard outlines of chin and mouth, while the expression of the whole face was selfish and unscrupulous. The eyes were finely formed, of a good color; but looked as if warding off inquiry, as if the soul was conscious of concealments it feared to have known.

"Your thought is correct; I came at the request of Maria, a maniac, who has boarded with you for some years past."

There was a slight and momentary compression about the lips, a motion as if to turn the eyes from my gaze, but checked by a strong will ere it was done, and Mrs. Barckmann replied:

"It was a fiction of Maria's that she boarded with me, if by that she meant that she paid any board. I never have received a cent from her since she entered my house."

"How long since she came to you?"

"More than nine years."

"May I ask what motive induced you to care for a maniac so many years without any recompense?"

"I shall hardly be expected to answer such a question, put by a stranger. There are unfortunate ones in every family."

"Shall I conclude that the unfortunate Maria was of your family?"

"You can conclude what you like. I have not said that she is, or is not."

"Will you have the goodness to tell me where her child, Jamie she called him, is to be found?"

"Not till I know why you question me so closely concerning this woman, and how you came to know of her having a child."

"Perhaps then, you will tell me where Maria is at this moment, as you are not willing to speak of the child?"

"She often wanders away for many days; I presume she will soon return, though she has been gone longer than usual."

"What was her object in leaving you so often?"

"She always went in search of her Jamie, as she called him, for I may as well tell you that we put him to school as soon as he was old enough to learn anything, and have kept the place a secret, so that he might grow up with no knowledge of his weak, maniac mother."

All this seemed quite plausible, and in accordance with worldly usage, if not strictly kind, but I distrusted the cold, measured tones, the fixed, though unwilling gaze. I stepped toward the woman, and said :

"Maria is dead ; she died perfectly sane in my house ; Jamie was with her and is living with me now ; he has never been at school, unless you call Old Donnelly a teacher, and no doubt he was, of every mean and cruel vice."

The face near which I had approached my own, became livid, whether with fear or hate I could not tell, for ere I ceased speaking she turned and moved toward a door in the back side of the room, and without opening it, called, "Josiah!" A moment after the same bent figure that had opened the street door, entered, saying :

"Did you call, wife?"

Making no reply, she stood as if expecting to hear more. Dr. Sanderson came to my aid.

"Mrs. Grey nursed the poor wanderer in her last days, saw her buried in her own tomb, and now has the boy she has mentioned in her family."

"I suppose then you wish to be paid for the expense and trouble you have put upon yourself?"

"No, madam, I came merely to perform my promise given during the last moments of one who is now 'where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.'"

"May I ask what this promise was?"

"That I should come to you, inform you of her death, and receive her box with its contents, in token of her gratitude."

"If that is all, 'tis easily accomplished. If you expect to be much better off for the contents of the box, you are likely to be disappointed ; I could not afford to keep her very richly clothed."

Josiah left the room at a hint from his wife, and soon returned, bringing with him so small a mahogany box, that the idea of speaking of it as containing clothing, was absurd in the extreme ; but Mrs. Barckmann, with great gravity, remarked that there was the box, to which we were welcome, she wished none of its contents.

I tried the lid—it was fast ; but on applying the key which Maria handed me, it yielded, and I saw a few feminine trifles, but no manuscript. The only curious thing was a soiled kid glove, evidently a gentleman's. I re-locked the box, gave it to Dr. Sanderson, and having asked him by means of the alphabet used by the deaf, if we should speak of the manuscript, and being answered by his opening the door, I bowed and passed gladly into the open air again.

No more convincing proof of Mrs. Barckmann's guilt was needed, than we already had, in her silence when Donnelly was mentioned, when I repeated several times that Jamie was with me, and that she could and did refrain from asking any questions with regard to the death of one who had been an inmate of her family for years.

We were now on the way to S——'s Alley, and arriving there, I remained in the carriage, while Dr. Sanderson entered a house teeming with wretched inmates, and reeking with filth. After an almost endless stay, the good doctor emerged from the building, took his place beside me without speaking, and drove away. I looked back from the window, and saw three ragged boys clinging to the carriage for the sake of the ride. After a moment I looked again, and found we had but a solitary outrider. I then mentioned the fact to my companion, who glanced over his shoulder and said :

"Dogging, and rather bold, too ; but I will arrange that. The fellow followed me up stairs and down again, and I have no doubt he listened while I talked to Old Donnelly. Dick, Dick, I say stop a minute."

The horses stood still ; we were opposite a watch-house, and I realized how the doctor intended to arrange for our outrider. But no sooner had we stopped than the little rascal showed his head at the door, and begged to be taken in, for he had something to tell us. We might gain, we could not lose by taking him at his word, so he was soon established on the seat opposite us.

"Well, boy, what have you to tell me?" said Dr. Sanderson.

"Not much now, only the story he told about Jim's being sick, and costing him so much is all a lie ; and what you said about his beating Jim is all truth ; and he has got a mint of money about somewhere, and he bees counting it every night."

"So you listened at the door while I was in Mr. Donnelly's room?"

"Don't be calling him mister ; he's Old Donnelly, and I hate him cause he turned mother out when she was sick, and we had to go down to the Island a while. But I have bothered him for it, and I will. I've listened cause I know there is wickedness going on, and I want to get

'Geevus' hold of him, jest as you, mister, thought you would get him hold of me when the man pulled up. I'll have him, yet; I am old enough to take my oath in court. Perhaps you will help me, stranger, I thought you was mad with Old Donnelly when you was talking with him."

"Well, my boy, what is your name?"

"Dennis O'Flaherty."

"Can you tell me whether Donnelly has many visitors?"

"Not many, there's one old un comes pretty often."

"Bent and wrinkled, with sharp eyes?"

"He's the one."

"Well, you go back, and if he goes there, or any other one, listen as well as you have to-day, and I will pay you for your time."

The boy protested that he would sooner have help to pay Old Donnelly, than money, but the money would help his mother, and so he went off, Dr. Sanderson having given him his address.

Nothing could be made out of Donnelly, Dr. Sanderson said. He and his wife both vowed they were but poor people, beggars almost, and that it was hard to be accused of ill-treating a poor boy they had taken from the hospital when its parents died, and had brought up as they would their own, though it was but poorly. They would own to no knowledge of Mrs. Barckmann. They were willing that any one should take the child, they would be glad to be rid of the ungrateful imp.

I left the carriage at my door, and as the doctor drove away he promised to see me on the morrow, when perhaps we should have heard from our little spy, Dennis O'Flaherty. There seemed little hope of arriving at any satisfactory result. The manuscript upon which we had depended for information concerning Maria's friends had been purloined, if it had ever existed except in the fancy of a poor maniac. There was quite a probability that Mrs. Barckmann and Donnelly would share the yearly stipend paid for the support of Maria and Jamie, while the one was cold in her grave, and the other cared for in my house.

I had passed an anxious night, and was startled by an early call from Dr. Sanderson. He had seen Dennis, who told him that Donnelly had been out the moment we had gone, that he went to No 10 — Street, and staid there a long while, but nobody had been at Donnelly's house during the day. Dr. Sanderson had related the circumstances of the case to a friend, an eminent lawyer, hoping that the parties could be forced to make statements concerning the reception of money for the support of Maria and Jamie; but was told no legal proceedings would avail anything.

"What more can we do, Mrs. Grey?"

"It looks rather dark; but we must do something. I cannot bear the idea of such dishonesty going unpunished."

"We might advertise, and possibly stop the remittances, if we gain no trace of the connection."

"If we could do that I should be satisfied, for if we find friends they might wish to take Jamie from me, and I am getting really attached to him."

"What papers shall we insert it in?"

"Give it as wide a circulation as possible."

We parted, and two days after, my morning paper contained the following paragraph:

"TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—A maniac, named Maria, died at the house of a lady in this city, declaring that funds had been sent yearly by friends for her support, and that of her child Jamie, born in 18—, which funds have been appropriated to other uses, and said Maria and child have been left to the charity of strangers. Any person having sent money to this city for such purpose, will do well to communicate with Dr. Samuel J. Sanderson before making further remittances."

Papers were requested to copy, and a month having passed with no response, the paragraph was re-inserted. A few days only after the second insertion, Dr. Sanderson called late at night, and with some agitation of manner, told me that he had received a note, without any signature, wishing him to call at the Albion Hotel the next morning, concerning an advertisement that had lately appeared in his name.

"Will you accompany me, Mrs. Grey?"

"If it is necessary, I will; but would rather not go."

"I think you had better go; I do not know in what spirit I may meet the writer of the note, and then 'two heads are better than one—'"

"If one is a woman's," said I.

"Then you will go?"

"Yes; I will be ready at ten o'clock."

At half past ten, we sat in a small but comfortable private parlor of the Albion Hotel, waiting to see the occupant of Room 106, according to the directions given in the note. In a few moments there entered from a sleeping-room adjoining, a man of about thirty-five years of age, medium size, pale, with noble head, features and carriage, the entire person bearing the marks of sorrow. There was a quick, anxious glance at my companion, then one of almost disappointment as his eye rested upon myself. With perfect breeding, he bowed to each, and paused

Dr. Sanderson rose, handed him the note he had received, saying :

"I am come in answer to this note; do I address the writer?"

"You do, sir; but, pardon, madam, I hoped, sir, you would have come alone."

"I thought best not; in fact I could not, as I have only acted as the agent of this lady in the business of which we would speak."

"Is this then the lady whose charity moved her to take the forsaken, the outcast under her roof?"

"It is."

"Will you, sir, or you, madam, tell me what you know of these unfortunate ones?"

I recounted the story. The fixed eye of the stranger was upon me during the whole. At the mention of Mrs. Barckmann's name, he passed his hand across his brow as if he would recollect something standing indistinctly in his memory. His brow would gather in a frown or soften in pity as I went on. When speaking of the box, he wished a description of it; but it seemed to afford no satisfaction. I mentioned several articles which were contained in it, among them the gentleman's worn glove.

"What was the color; was it kid, and buttoned with a gold stud?"

"It was kid, a dark brown, and had evidently been fastened with a stud, though there was none in it when I saw it."

"Have you the glove?"

"Yes, here it is." And drawing from my reticule a small paper package, I handed it to him.

He seized it eagerly, unfolded it, saying, the moment his glance rested upon it, "The same!" Then to my surprise, he drew from a pocket in the inner side of his vest, a little morocco bag, and from it the mate to the glove, and spreading them out side by side on the table by which he sat, he seemed lost in thought.

We sat in silence some minutes, when the stranger spoke as follows:

"I do not know as you will give credence to the story of a stranger; but what I have to say is of such a nature that no one would be likely to doubt it. I will be as brief as possible; but even then, fear I shall trespass too long upon your time."

Being assured that our business was to attend to him, he proceeded.

"Maria, who died at your house, Mrs. Grey, was once my affianced bride. She was the daughter of a small trader, in Glasgow, Scotland. My family stood above hers in social position; my father having been a lawyer of some note, and having held for many years an honorable office under the crown. All were proud but myself. I was entirely democratic in principle and conduct when I returned from the university. I must also add that my principles were not firm, and my conduct not better than my principles. This never troubled my family; but my constant association with 'vulgar people,' as they termed all beneath them in the social scale, soon led to high words, and coolness succeeded, so that I scarcely was a member of the family during several years. I must say in justice to myself and my chosen friends, that I found more moral principle, greater worth and reliability of character among them than in the higher circle in which I had formerly moved. Among these friends was John Radkin, to whom I was much attracted by his earnest and strong love of liberty, his earnest endeavors to carry out his principles into life. At length I was invited to pass an evening at his house, for the purpose of discussing our favorite topics. We had sat more than an hour, when a young girl came in, and in a low tone gave a message to Radkin. She was not beautiful, as many reckon beauty, but there was in her face and figure an air of such freshness and purity, that my attention was riveted to her face. Once and once only her glance rested upon the stranger by her father's side. Again and again I passed an evening with my friend, and soon it came about that I was admitted to the family sitting-room, and conversation took a more general turn. Maria was as innocent, as pure and unsophisticated as she had seemed to me on that first evening. Her doting parents had spared no pains in educating her, so that with the exception of a few showy accomplishments, she was the equal of my sisters, or any of their associates. I loved her. I asked her hand in marriage. Her father would grant his consent on no other terms than that my father would sanction our union. He would not be the cause, nor have his daughter the cause of a rupture in any man's family. He knew I would not look down upon any of them; he would not have my family do it. My father forbade me ever to see 'the girl,' as he called her, again. He would disinherit me if I did. I wished no support; his consent to receive and treat Maria as a daughter, was all. I had a path marked out for myself, which would build up in time a name and fortune. He was immovable; and despairing, I returned to Radkin and Maria. I begged again for my bride; I would cut myself off from my family, never would see them more; but the stout will would not yield. Would that I might blot out the year succeeding that of which I speak. She is forgiven, and at rest; the time will come for me too. We were secretly betrothed, and though Radkin told me in a frank, manly way, that he should be glad to see me at his little counting-room, I must come to his house no more. We met a few times only, during the six months following. God forgive me that my love was impure and selfish—Maria would in a few months become a mother. I was quietly making preparations for marriage, when one day her father came to me in a just fury, and branded me by many a foul but well-deserved epithet, and finished by demanding that his daughter should be returned to his roof, dishonored though she was. I knew not but that she was there. How sharp the pang that pierced my heart I can scarcely now endure to recall. Mr. Radkin was at last convinced that my intentions were as I had stated, and together we sought the lost one; for Maria had been absent from home two days, and then for the first time Mrs. Radkin had disclosed her fears to her husband. We sought in vain; no trace of her could be found. Months rolled on; Mr. Radkin was a broken-hearted man, and soon the grave closed over him; nor was his wife left to mourn him long. My family seemed inclined to win me back to them, when they found that nothing more could be heard of Maria. Their efforts were useless. I lived much alone, having procured a situation as copying-clerk in a large counting-room. I will not fatigue you by rehearsing the mental changes that came over me; but remorse and sorrow have never departed from me from then till now. Five years of bitter waiting, searching, hoping and disappointment rolled on. I was suddenly summoned to the bedside of my dying father, who then told me that he, and he alone, had taken Maria from me; that from the time I had spoken of our marriage he had kept spies upon us; that when he saw marriage was determined upon, he had taken Maria and sent her to America, under pretence that the order was from me, and that I would join her on shipboard. Then he told me that soon after giving birth to a child that had proved to be idiotic, Maria had become insane, and would never be cured. He had sent yearly to Mr. Handley, two hundred dollars, and hoped I would continue to do the same. And so he died, admonishing me to marry, and forget that early passion. How my heart shuddered: Maria insane, our child an idiot. I never doubted my father's word; I do not now; a part of the story was true. This Mrs. Barckmann, or Mr. Handley, whoever it may be that has received this money, must have deceived him. I had at last determined to come to America, and at least be near my victims, for I could call them nothing else. In the first paper I glanced at after my arrival, your advertisement met my eye. Now, my kind friends, will you let me see my boy, before we take any other steps?"

During this recital, the stranger had walked up and down the room; now fast, now slow, with his eyes generally fixed intently upon the carpet. But a strong shudder now and then shook his attenuated form, and an occasional glance at his auditors, or upward, revealed much of the struggle which he had passed through. Dr. Sanderson replied:

"I do not doubt your story, sir. Your look and manner convince me you have told us the whole truth, not sparing yourself, not uselessly criminating others; but you will own, sir, that Mrs. Grey's wishes ought to have some weight with regard to this boy."

"Certainly, Dr. Sanderson, and I hardly feel competent to say what my own wishes are at present, only that I would see the child."

"Then, sir, if you will take a seat in my carriage, we will drive to Mrs. Grey's at once."

The distance was soon passed, and in silence. As we entered the drawing-room, Jamie started up from a book of prints he had amused himself with, and seeing a stranger, slunk back to escape observation.

"Jamie," said L.

The stranger started. "It is my own name. Call him Jamie Colgate."

I repeated the call. "Jamie, come to me; I wish you to speak with Mr. Colgate." I was obeyed, but reluctantly, for Jamie had not yet learned to meet strangers without fear. I placed his hand in his father's, saying, "This is your father, Jamie; he has come to see you."

"I don't want any father; I want to stay with you. Fathers aint so good as you."

"Jamie, I will be good to you, but I will not take you from Mrs. Grey, if she wishes to have you stay."

Since that day many years have passed. Jamie Colgate has become Mr. James Colgate, merchant; but he has not left Mrs. Grey, and now he is about to bring a bride under the family roof, that our circle may be complete, he says.

Now as I finish writing this little sketch, a gray head looks up from a book on the opposite side of the table, and remarks:

"How this November wind whistles; I think we shall have snow before morning."

It is Jamie's father; more content, he says, than he ever hoped to be; but the sad eye, fixed for hours upon the glowing coal of a winter's night, or upon the quiet stars in summer, tell of remorse and sorrow still.

Would any reader care to know the fate of Mrs. Barckmann, I do not know it. Mr. Colgate and Dr. Sanderson once visited her, when the former recognized her as a woman who had formerly served in his father's family. Filled with consternation at beholding Mr. Colgate, she confessed, that on the death of her former husband, Mr. Handley, she had married her servant, because he knew some things she would not have repeated, and that together they had laid and carried out the plan of passing off Maria's child for an idiot, and then of taking the money paid for their support, themselves, except a trifle which they paid Donnelly on Jamie's account. She came over, she said, with Maria, who gradually came to believe the story they told her of her lover's faithlessness, and that they would take care of her.

With the words, "Pray God that he forgive you, as I will that he may forgive us all," Mr. Colgate left her; nor would he listen to Dr. Sanderson's oft repeated wish to make her disgorge her ill-gotten gains. "Leave her to God and her conscience," was his constant reply.

THE WAY TO DO BUSINESS.

It is seldom in the busiest seasons and in the most prosperous times that our retail merchants are more crowded with customers. Those men who have taken pains to inform the public that they have goods to sell, and will sell them cheap for cash, are driving a brisk business. Many of this class of merchants are selling more goods than at the same time last year. If ever the fact was demonstrated beyond peradventure, that extensive advertising is a paying investment, it has been during the past few weeks in this city. The evidence is conclusive that thousands of dollars worth of goods have been sold for cash as the result of advertising; where without it, the sales would have been a few hundreds. We merely state this as a fact, which ought to be fully realized by every business man.—Hartford Courant.

RENEW THE FALLING FRUIT TREES.

Some have died of age, after long and fruitful lives, trees planted by your predecessors upon the farm. You have enjoyed the fruit of their labors, and it is meet that you should plant for others, even if you never see their fruit. Some trees of your own planting are already dead. It is not strange that every planting is not a success. All crops fail sometimes, and the fruit-grower must have his share of failures. Trees well planted are much more likely to live than to die. Plant pears and apples next spring from the best nursery near you, and let your children bless you.—Exchange.

WILD-PIGEON SHOOTING IN SUSSEX.

BY MARY W. JANVEIN.

"WHERE, now, 'Launce?' exclaimed Dick Tudor to a handsome, aristocratic-looking young gentleman who had presented himself—booted, cloaked, in short, en costume for a journey—at the door of the apartment where the speaker sat lounging over a fashionably late breakfast. "Not going to leave London, I hope?"

"Yes—deuce take me—I'm tired to death!" drawled Launcelot Templeton, Bart., snapping his riding-whip till his leader in the light brougham before the door reared and plunged. "Bored with this noisy, Babelish London! So I told Bob to pack my valise, and I'm off for Fairfax Manor and the Sussex woods, where the wild pigeons are as thick as bees in summer—so the old squire writes me. Better come down home and spent a fortnight with me, Dick, after the shooting season fairly sets in! Let alone the shooting, it's quiet and cool there; and with a volume of Shelley, and under the old trees, we can manage more comfortably than in this whirling city. I'm sick of it, Dick! No bother there, at the squire's quiet manor house, what with finding a dozen cards of invitation on your table on a morning to select from; nor running the risk of whisking your head off with bowing to My Lady So-and-so, and the Countess This-and-that, at their evening routs. Come, promise me you'll join me, Dick!"

"Bless you, my dear fellow, what would the charming Lady Flora Hyacinth do for lack of my most dutiful devoirs at Almaack's? I am her engaged escort du bal there to-night. So you see, Launce, the thing's quite impossible, at present." And elegant Dick Tudor dangled the tassel of his smoking-cap between his very white fingers. "Couldn't get off for a month, 'pon honor! Queer—what started you so sudden? Time enough, in midsummer, to bury yourself down there in the woods of Sussex. Besides, I fancied that doing execution with Cupid's missives was rather more congenial to your tastes than shooting wild pigeons, Launce. If the fair Lady Elizabeth Dutton inquires for your baronetship to-night, at Almaack's, what reply shall I make?"

"O, bother the women!" exclaimed the young gentleman at the door, in language certainly far removed from the classical; "that is, deuce take it!" And a red flush dyed his brow, while a sudden curve contracted his lip. "I do not think the Lady Elizabeth Dutton will spare a thought, or query, for me. If so, please make answer that I'm in Sussex, shooting wild pigeons —while she, I fancy, is seeking to ensnare higher game! But good-by—au revoir, Dick!” And with a sarcastic laugh, Launcelot departed.

“Hey, pet! That boy, Launcelot, will be here ere the evening chimes ring.” And old Squire Fairfax laid his hand on a white, plump shoulder covered with dainty India muslin.

A slight, petite figure moved nearer the old squire where they stood, on the broad oaken threshold of Fairfax Manor House, in the twilight; and a dark-eyed, crimson-cheeked face, framed in a cloud of short, gipsyish, raven curls, was upturned to the old gentleman’s ruddy one.

“You remember him—hey, pet?—the tall boy whom you used to play with through these rooms and this garden, years ago, in your childhood? Launce was a good boy, Lu!”

“I remember him for a very cross one!” pouted willful Lulu Lyle, flinging back her curls and pursing up her rose-bud lips. Yes, he was thy especial torment, Uncle John; always teasing my kitten, ridiculing my doll-babies, and frightening my poor ayah with his dreadful faces. I remember well that he did not like little girls, and I fancy he will not be better pleased with large ones!” And Lulu Lyle shrugged her fair shoulders and drew up her fairy-like figure with a comical assumption of dignity. “However, I shall just keep on in my own pursuits, and not trouble this young gentleman at all.”

“Hey, pet! all nonsense, every bit of it! If the boy don’t fall in love with a pair of black eyes before he’s been here a week, why I’ll—but ho, there! Robert! Thomas! William! all of you!” And the old squire’s stentorian shout brought a half-dozen serving men from the long panelled hall. “Here, don’t you see that cloud of white dust down the highway? Set wide the gate! ’Tis young Mr. Launcelot coming back to Fairfax Manor House! Give him a true English welcome, boys!”

And long before Launcelot Templeton’s fast span whirled the light brougham up the courtyard, while Lady Fairfax, in her best silk and cap, stood beside Lulu Lyle in the doorway, and a crowd of servants gathered about the broad steps, a loud and ringing shout of welcome, echoed back from the carriage where a velvet travelling cap was waved to and fro, rent the air.

Lulu Lyle first opened her dark eyes under Indian skies. Her mother was a daughter of that tropic land; and her father was the younger and only brother of Lady Fairfax, Cornet Ernest Lyle, early created an officer in the English army stationed in India. But the mother died early; and during a furlough home in the little Lulu’s fourth year, the father bore thither his motherless babe to place her under his sister’s fostering care. Here, at Fairfax Manor House, attended by her faithful ayah, the child forgot her separation from “papa;” and, till nearly her seventh year, she lisped broken English, played with her doll-babies, and had quarrels innumerable with the high-tempered Launcelot Templeton, her uncle’s ward, a boy of twelve, and heir to Templeton Grange in Lincolnshire and a baronetcy in prospective.

Fairfax Manor House would have been dull, without the children’s voices, for the squire was a hale, hearty, but quiet country gentleman “all of ye olden time,” content with his pipe, a game of chess or piquet with the curate, after dinner; and Lady Fairfax, though in her younger days a belle and beauty, had relapsed into a staid, portly, middle-aged matron, who regarded the squire as her “liege lord” in the fullest sense of the word, cherished a strong affection for “brother Ernest” and his motherless child, and was the almoner to all the poor in the precincts of Fairfax Manor.

Hence was it that the two children in their charge did much to enliven the solitary country mansion; and when in little Lulu’s seventh year, Cornet Lyle, again in England on a furlough, took a high-bred English wife, and came with an English governess to recall his daughter to his arms, it was very hard to give her up; and still further, when the young Launcelot had got quite beyond his village tutors and the country curate’s Latin grammar, and was pronounced ready to be entered at Oxford. Then the good old squire went about, the personification of despair, that both his “children” must be thus taken from him.

But so it was. Lulu went, in a great white-winged ship, over seas—and the song of the bulbul made sweet music to her childhood’s ears, despite her memories of the thrushes, linnets, and the stock-doves in her English home; and the boy Launcelot went to his university studies, expressing a vast deal of affection for Fairfax Manor, but still greater joy that he had got quite beyond the days when he conned Latin verbs under the eye of his tutor, held Lady Fairfax’s silk-winder, or stooped to “make faces” to frighten a poor Indian ayah and her young mistress. Besides, Dick Tudor, the son of a neighboring wealthy country gentleman, was ready to be entered at the university; and Dick and Launcelot had always been great friends, and it would be so pleasant to go together! So trunks were packed—in one corner the old squire laid a well-filled purse, Lady Fairfax placed a red-covered Bible, and the cook Margery brought a rich plum-cake, in a snowy napkin, that “young Mr. Launcelot” might not quite forget her—and the same month that saw Lulu Lyle on the blue waters nearing her East Indian home, also saw Launcelot Templeton entered at Oxford.

Ten years went by, during which, save at occasional vacations, Launcelot had not spent two consecutive months at Fairfax Manor. He had taken his degree, won university honors, and then, instead of further application to his studies, joined himself with Dick Tudor and dashed headlong into the gaieties of a London season. Lady Fairfax fretted immensely; but the old squire only “pho’d” the matter with:

“Nonsense, Eleanor! It won’t hurt the lad to see a little of life. He’s got too much of old Sir Hugh Templeton’s strong good sense, to turn out badly.”

Thus the winter passed; then followed a summer spent at Bath, Brighton, and all the fashionable watering-places; and another winter had become merged into spring, during which Launcelot Templeton, Bart., and the young lord Richard Tudor clubbed, smoked, supped, and drove their teams together, were seen nightly in the salons of the exclusive, dangle attendance to fair ladies, flirted, and were victimized in their turns by sundry pairs of blue English eyes. And now, while the volatile Dick is busy with his latest love-affair, behold Launcelot Templeton, wearied, disgusted, “bored to death” with London life, longing once more for the quiet of his boyhood home—tendering to his friend the excuse that “shooting wild pigeons” called him home to Sussex.

Meantime, Fairfax Manor House had received another occupant. The cessation of difficulties with India cancelled Cornet Lyle’s foreign appointment; the officer came back to England, yellow, jaundiced, and disabled, with the promise of an annual stipend from government. But the half pay of the disabled officer was of scarcely gutta-percha facility to find the wherewithal of “food and raiment” for the whole squadron of little Lyles that had quartered themselves upon him in India; hence, when they set foot upon English soil, the provident mama, with an eye to the comfort of her own darlings, very gently hinted to the cornet that her oldest “darling’s” paternal aunt was very wealthy and childless; and it was with no small sorrow that, when a letter came from good old Squire Fairfax—who, during the arrival of “Cornet Ernest Lyle and family” in the Times, sent off post-haste for the loan of “his little Lulu”—it was with no small sorrow that Lulu was sent off to Sussex, instead of the step-mother’s own daughter, in answer to the old gentleman’s request. But the squire himself had made the decision; they could not gainsay it. So the dusky-eyed, crimson-lipped Lulu parted from “papa” with a heart full of sorrow; and, with a great share of love for her girlish home, and a very vivid memory of her girlish tormentor, “that ugly, frightful Launce,” was installed in the hearts of her aunt and uncle, and all the retainers of Fairfax Manor House.

Reader mine, I doubt very much if a whole volume of “Peterson” would contain the half of the doings and sayings, whims and caprices, of lazy, idle, good-for-nothing Launcelot Templeton, those four long weeks he lounged at Fairfax Manor; consequently, this good pen will not be expected to record them.

What mattered it to him that, of early mornings, the larks wheeled and flashed past his window, and then soared away on their long joyous flight? Not the larks of all England, warbling their operas together, could have enticed him out of doors, and into the gardens where dark-eyed Lulu Lyle picked fair English violets, stooped over the pale crocus, culled the fragrant mignonne, or broke forth into trills and carols more musical than the birds.

Not even her mocking laugh of defiance, as she sprang lightly into her saddle and scoured the wide, breezy moorlands, could tempt him into a race. “Did Miss Lyle suppose he wanted to get his death cold, with riding those foggy, misty mornings, over the damp, open country?” “It was a novelty to her; but she would get wearied of it by-and-by. The English climate would begin to tell upon her; she had better stay within doors!” Most wise, sapient Launcelot!

And why, indeed, after his late breakfast—when he nibbled hot rolls and sipped a cup of coffee, while Lulu had eaten steak and ham and eggs with her uncle full three hours before—why, indeed, then, should he go out to practise shooting at a mark all the forenoon, if Lulu Lyle did banter him to it, and the crack, crack, of her little rifle was heard through Fairfax woods, in many directions, while he dozed over the volume of Shelley he had brought down with him? Why, indeed? No, he would not be bantered into bringing forth his pistols from the cases where they had lain undisturbed since he left London. He had come down to Fairfax Manor to rest; shooting was harder work than he had anticipated. Besides, he was somewhat out of practice, and he didn't care for a spectator in his shooting forays—though he didn't believe that Miss Lyle, despite her boasts and brags of being "a sure shot," could bring down a bird upon the wing.

Moreover, with the memory of the elegant statuesque London belle, the Lady Elizabeth Dutton—though, by the way, said Lady Elizabeth, despite her evident delight at the attentions of the young baronet, had coolly and unceremoniously "cut" him for an earl—with the memory of that elegant, high-bred lady still fresh in his mind, how could the fastidious young Sir Launcelot endure the madcap freaks of a little black-eyed girl whose waist he could span with his two hands, who was not five feet in height, and with whom he had regaled himself by the unique entertainment of "making faces to her," when she was a mere baby—how could he endure her boasts of leaping a five-barred fence, with Thomas the groom as confirmer of her words, and also swallow her bravado to "practise at a mark?"

"Bah! Save me from an Amazon, a Di Vernon, a feminine 'shot'"—so he wrote his friend Dick Tudor. "There's a regular East Indian panther (minus the claws) down here at Fairfax Manor, Dick; or a spotted leopard, perhaps I should say—bright, beautiful, and always ready to spring. If you were to hear of Lulu Lyle, 'an East Indian beauty,' Dick, you would fall at once to dreaming of ottar of roses—Cashmere roses, too!—bulbuls, nightingales, and moonlight; but, heaven forefend us! it is a little fury in disguise. Pity me, good Dick, that I live under the same roof with the formidable creature! As soon as I can get away silyly, I'll slip off to London; then you and I had best try the waters at Bath. I've had enough of quiet country life, with this little bright-eyed leopard springing in and out all corners of the old mansion house. How fares the Lady Flora? and 'how speeds the wooing?' Au revoir, till you shake by the hand

"Your quondam chum, LAUNCE."

So wrote Launcelot Templeton, Bart., and turned from sealing his letter, where he sat by the window overlooking the court, to behold Lulu's petite form bounding along the shrubbery in pursuit of some object, and then to hear her gay laugh ring out on the air.

"Come down here, boy! come down!" sang out the old squire, holding his sides with laughter. "The witch's chasing a little white pig that she mistakes for a rabbit!"

"A white pig! O, shocking!" And Launcelot Templeton, Bart., turned away in dignity.

But all that day there flitted before his mental vision a fairy-like, flying figure, with crimson cheeks and dancing curls; and a ringing laugh echoed through his brain. What a pity that Launcelot was the victim of his "dignity!"

And Dick Tudor tossed his friend's letter to the table with:

"Hang it, what a fool Launce is, to talk of coming back to this noisy, babbling, hollow-hearted London! Not know when to let well enough alone! Down there in the cool, splendid woods of Sussex—nothing to do but shoot, hunt, and make love to East Indian beauties! Deuce take me, if I stay here any longer to be a pendant to Lady Flora Hyacinth! in other words a dangler! I'm almost petrified now—frozen into an icicle, with her my-ladyish airs and frigidity. I'll pack up, next week, and go to join Launce in Sussex!"

"Hallo, there! Launce, come out here quickly—I saw a great flock of wild fowl sailing directly over Crow's Nest-Hill! Ho, Thomas! take care of Sultan; but first bring me my rifle! And hurry down here, Launce, with your pistols!"

And little Lulu Lyle threw herself from her horse, where she had galloped up to the manor house door on a bright summer morning, and, taking her rifle from the groom, gathering up the skirts of her riding-dress, ran lightly down the path leading from the court-yard, through the meadow, to a clump of rocks in the rear of the mansion.

And Launcelot Templeton, for once roused from his dreams over Shelley at the window, took down his brace of pistols, slung on a light hunting-cap, and, with two or three bounds that quite astonished Thomas, reached the foot of the broad oaken staircase and followed Lulu heartily.

"She is handsome, by Jove!" muttered Launcelot to himself, his eyes fastened upon her, as she hurried on before him, turning roguishly, every now and then, and pointing to the great flock of wild fowl darkening the air in the direction of the forest. "If she weren't such an Amazon, and didn't shoot, or laugh so loud, or call me 'Launce!'" he murmured. And straightway, keeping in the rear of his guide, Launcelot Templeton fell into a most inexplicable fit of musing.

"Come hasten, Sir Dawdler! Don't you see? there they are! I declare, I never did see such a lazy body as you are, Launce Templeton!" exclaimed Lulu, in a rapid undertone, as he gained her side at the edge of the wood under whose cover she might take aim when the birds came within range of her shot. "Here, Launce, give me one of your pistols! What! I declare, not capped! O, you're a brave marksman, Sir Launcelot! Look out! you're a dead man!" And a suppressed laugh rippled out on the air, as Launcelot started back when she aimed the weapon full at his breast. "Don't be afraid! Poor boy! he shouldn't be hurt. But hush! hist!" And stepping forth a little, bringing up her rifle to her eye, with a sure aim and a loud "crack, crack!" a brace of birds came fluttering down among the shrubbery. "Pick them up, Launce!" she whispered, re-loading rapidly and firing again ere the flock went screaming beyond her aim; then, turning to where Launcelot stood with the brace of wounded birds in his hands, she said, sarcastically: "O, don't touch 'em! I beg pardon, good Sir Launcelot! They bleed; they may stain your delicate white hands! Let me take them!" And she leaned her rifle against a tree and advanced towards him.

"Lulu Lyle!" And the brace of birds were flung far away into the green shrubbery, and a voice sterner, louder, than any that little wilful East Indian had heard on English soil, caused her heart to flutter strangely, and her eyes to droop beneath the two angry ones that flashed down into her own, as a trembling hand closed tightly about her arm. "Lulu Lyle, do you take me for a boy—a child—to humor all your whims and caprices?—to become the target for all your ridicule? Because I have shown no symptoms of restiveness under your sway up there in Fairfax House—because I have treated you very cavalierly, and idled away my time rather than join you in your madcap, unladylike freaks, until now you enticed me here, you now, in turn, laugh at, ridicule, taunt me! By—(but the wicked word which trembled on Launcelot Templeton's lips shaped itself into a heroic one)—by Jove! I will not be treated so by any woman, much less by you—a mere atom, a will-o'-the-wisp, a fire-fly! You shall not presume on your boasted bravery, your sex, or your beauty—for hang me, Lulu Lyle, you are beautiful as a houri, and I know it, and you know that I know it, too! Yet you shall not triumph over me so! I will not—but ah! what is it? what have I done? Pardon me, Miss Lyle! I was mad. You are weeping! O, I am a brute! I have been harsh, ungentlemanly—I know not what I said! But forgive me! look up, sweet Lulu Lyle—dear Lulu—and tell me if I am forgiven!"

Now, reader mine, I'm sure that I don't know what followed; and would it not be best for you and I to let our own imaginations decide whether sweet Lulu Lyle spoke the edict of banishment, or of forgiveness? Judging from sundry facts which afterwards duly transpired, it may be presumed that the little East Indian beauty pronounced the latter, for very certain it is, that no more rifle-shots were heard in the Sussex woods that day, and the brace of wild fowl lay where they fell among the bushes; and two hours after, Lulu Lyle went to her room with flushed cheeks and eyes sparkling brighter than any eastern gem; and Launcelot Templeton, Bart., came forth from a long closeting with old Squire Fairfax looking very manly and self-possessed, with the light of an earnest purpose in his eyes, and a mien quite unlike that of the lazy idler of the morning; and straightway a letter, bearing for seal a baronet's crest, was forwarded to "Cornet Ernest Lyle of Her Majesty's Royal Service," at Brighton, where the invalid officer had sought lodgings; and another to "Lord Richard Tudor," which caused that young gentleman to countermand his orders just as he was leaving London—and still further, caused another exclamation when, three months afterward, a white-ribboned card, whose envelope bore the Templeton crest, informed him that "at nine o'clock, Thursday evening, Sir Launcelot and Lady Lulu Templeton would receive guests at their house, Grosvenor Square."

"Hum, hum!" muttered Dick, laying out a faultless pair of white kids. "This comes of 'shooting wild pigeons in the woods of Sussex!'"

BRING YOUR PUMPKIN WITH YOU.

We find the following in the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser: A gentleman from one of the lower counties of this State recently visited middle Georgia, and in the company of a party of ladies and gentlemen, gave a description of a "surprise party" in his county. He told them that there were but few, if any palatial homes in his vicinity, but instead, rude huts with oftentimes, dirt floors. In the middle of the room a basket of gouber peas were emptied, and pumpkins being substituted for chairs, they gathered around and participated in the banquet with all the gusto imaginable! But the following is the invitation to the "gouber digging" in — county, Ga., which the gentleman has received since his return home:

"The pleasure of your company is respectfully solicited to attend a Pindar (or Gouber) Digging at Miss —, on the 9th of November. "P. S.—If convenient, bring your pumpkin with you."

LOVE.

Alas! the love of women! It is known
To be a lovely and a fearful thing;
For all of theirs upon that die is thrown:—
And if 'tis lost, life has no more to bring
To them but mockeries of the past alone.—BYRON.

THE INDIAN LOVER.

BY EDWARD S. ELAIS.

The night wind soft is sweeping by,
 As saddened visions fading;
 And like the tearful, mournful sigh,
 With perfumed incense laden,
 The zephyrs rise and slowly die;
 Yet waits he by the maiden.

He whispers not unto the maid,
 The stillness is unbroken;
 For love the soonest bath decayed,
 When words were but the token;
 The truest love that e'er was made,
 Was when no words were spoken.

THERESA DI MONTALDI.

BY EDGAR W. TURNBULL.

THE lofty cathedral of Santa Rosalia, in the fair city of Palermo, situated in the Val di Mazzara, was thronged with a crowd of devout worshippers celebrating the feast of St. Giuseppe. Apart from the crowd and alone, enveloped in a cloak, stood a man whose eyes seemed fixed on one object, and who among that throng seemed conscious of the presence of but one fair being. His countenance betrayed the emotions which filled his soul; and a close observer might have detected, in his calm, earnest gaze, the workings of a mind full of deep design and artifice. His figure was tall and commanding, and at a careless glance, one might have pronounced him handsome; but a closer one would have detected the deep, piercing expression of the eyes, and the smile which appeared subtle and insinuating as his manners. And yet this man, Sir Richard Harford, was called fascinating; and, indeed, there had been few women, whose hearts he had laid siege to, who had escaped his power—for his was the fascination of a serpent.

Blasé as he was, and satiated with the world, he had passed a month in Palermo without being able to find anything in which to indulge his thirst for novelty, until, in the church of Santa Rosalia, a face and a voice had roused his almost deadened senses. While he stood enraptured with the sight, the rich tones of the organ pealed forth, and then a voice of such sweetness, such purity, filled the cathedral, that every eye was turned on the fair chorister as she stood in her entrancing beauty and purity, unconscious, as it were, of aught save the presence of her Maker.

Theresa di Montaldi was acknowledged to be the most beautiful maiden in Palermo; or, indeed, one might have said in the whole fair island of Sicily. Hers was one of those faces which make us "sigh even to have seen such," and ah! many a noble-hearted Palermitan had sighed in vain for the fair Theresa—she, who in her retired and secluded life, lived for, loved but one alone. But the ceremonies are over, and the crowd are leaving the cathedral. Theresa, drawing her veil closely around her, and accompanied by a duenna, with a light step quickly descends the steps of the church, and, all unconscious as she was of the observance of any one, there was one who, as she hastened on in her beauty and innocence, thinking only of the loved face that would greet her on her return, had marked her for his victim.

Theresa had been married but two months to Enrico di Montaldi, a noble youth, who loved her with all the unchanging fervor and devotion of a true Italian. Since their marriage, nothing had happened to mar their mutual happiness. Constantly in each other's society, they wished for no other; and their days passed in such uninterrupted felicity, that Theresa sometimes trembled in the fear that it could not last, believing such happiness was seldom the lot of mortals, and fearing that sooner or later the cloud must break upon them. But Enrico smiled her fears away; and as he reclined at her feet in their garden, the air heavy with the perfume of orange-blossoms, they gazed with silent rapture on each other, and as they gazed, forgot that they were mortals. But alas the day that she had returned with a joyous face and happy heart to Enrico! Why does he not come forth to meet her, as usual? Why does he leave her to seek him, as he sits unmoved in her presence, and gazes through the lattice out upon the street? And worst of all, why, when she approaches him with an anxious, inquiring look, does he frown upon her? During the year of their betrothal, the months of their marriage, this was the first time he had frowned on her. What could it mean? She approached him, and throwing her arms about his neck, begged of him to tell her all. He spoke not, but looked at her—a look which, had deceit or treachery lurked in that heart, would have turned her eyes into her very soul; but she stood calmly before him.

"Theresa!" he exclaimed, at last, "look out upon the strada. Think you that I do not see that tall figure who, since your entrance, has three times passed and re-passed our house? Think you I did not see him follow you from church? And more than this, by heaven, it is not the first time!"

As he finished these words, his voice faltered, and the anguish he felt, the struggle with his feelings, was painfully evident. And the pangs of Theresa—who can describe them? As she stood there, in her beauty and angelic purity, what human being could have dared to distrust her? Alas, the dreaded cloud was gloomily dawning upon them which was to sever their dearest ties! Theresa looked out upon the strada, but betrayed no emotion; and, with a quivering lip and voice which told plainly the conflict she endured, she exclaimed:

"Santa Madre! has it come to this? O, that I should have lived to see this wretched day, when you, Enrico—you, who, orphan as I am, alone I cared for, lived for—believe me conscious of being followed daily from church by this man! No, Enrico, it shall not be! Know, then—I swear it—that I have just looked upon this man for the first time! But, since you have so soon lost your faith in me, it is better, far better, that we should part."

Enrico trembled. He was not prepared for this on the part of Theresa—deemed not that his gentle bride would resent his suspicions with such vehemence—and, in a moment, the sense of his injustice, the cruel wrong he had done her in suspecting her so quickly, for so light a cause for his suspicion, all rushed upon his mind, and, as she stood there, motionless in her queen-like beauty, he threw himself at her feet, and kissing her hand, begged her to forgive him. She bade him rise.

"No," he exclaimed, "here let me kneel at thy feet! Humiliated as I am, I feel too base to stand in thy presence."

She bent over him, imprinted a kiss upon his brow, and their sorrows were forgotten in a mutual embrace. The first cloud had darkened their happy home for a brief space, and sunshine had again dawned, only to give place to a still heavier one which was threatening them.

At the time our story commenced, the Revolution of 18— had just begun, when many a noble fellow was obliged to flee for safety to another country, or be put to death in his own. Enrico was at the head of a young band of republicans who had taken a prominent part in the rebellion, and now, to save himself, was obliged to fly from his home and Theresa, with scarcely a parting word or look. He sailed for England; and Theresa, half-bewildered with this sudden misfortune, was left in desolation, without hope of ever beholding him more. The sole chance of seeing him was by going to England herself, to seek him, and her whole soul was filled with this dream.

The scene now opens in London. Two years have passed, and Her Majesty's Theatre is filled with an audience eagerly awaiting the lifting of the curtain. All London seems astir to hear the famous cantatrice, who, after charming thousands on the continent of Europe, was to make her first appearance in England in the opera of La Juive. United to a voice of marvellous power and sweetness, she possessed a face beautiful as an angel's, and a character "unspotted from the world." Her debut to-night in London was honored by the presence of royalty, and a great triumph was to crown her efforts. The theatre was thronged to its utmost, and every eye was lighted up with expectation of her entrance. Bursts of applause and admiration greeted her coming; exclamations of wonder and delight at her bewildering beauty, were heard on every side; and, as she stepped forward after her acknowledgment of this admiration, the transports subsided, a solemn stillness pervaded the house, and, as she poured forth her thrilling notes, their melting pathos seemed to touch each soul. Ah, that crowd entranced by her beauty! little did they dream, while gazing at that face, beaming with smiles and happiness, of the wretchedness and desolation of her heart; little did they dream, when the curtain had fallen and hidden her from their eyes, which would fain have gazed longer, that tears took the place of smiles, and that her hours of solitude were passed in grief! For the fair prima donna was no other than the once happy Theresa di Montaldi; and in that dark, tall figure, who stands with the same earnest gaze as when he first beheld her in the church of Santa Rosalia, we recognize the features of Sir Richard Harford.

After her husband's departure, Sir Richard had eagerly watched his opportunity—had waited till the first shock of grief had given place to a dull calm, and, with the adroit and subtle management of which he was the master, despite of her retired life, he succeeded, through a friend of Enrico's, in obtaining access to her society; and by feigning a deep interest in the fate of her husband, and by constantly talking to her of him, she felt almost an enjoyment in his society. Cunningly, step by step, did he endeavor to insinuate himself in her favor; attentive to every want or desire, he called up every allurements in his power to gain her heart. Never before had he seen a woman for whom he had struggled so hard to win, or one who had so long withstood his fascinations. Each day her desire to visit England increased, but her fortune was small, and would barely suffice for her support in a place like London; and, not willing to accept Sir Richard's bounty, he proposed she should study to be a prima donna, and, with such a voice, she could soon render herself independent to visit any part of the globe where her husband might be. She recoiled at this proposal, though she felt it was her only hope; and, in time, Sir Richard had triumphed, and her consent was gained. With the aid of the best masters, for a year she studied for her profession, and became famous as we have seen her; but worn out with this false life, weary of admiration, of being flattered and fêted even by royalty, and despairing of ever beholding Enrico more, she wished to live again in retirement, which was better suited to her refined and delicate nature. Sir Richard had followed her to England, and, like the eagle bent on his prey, he was not yet weary of his pursuit.

After witnessing her success at the theatre, we will follow her to her home, where, after disrobing herself of her costly garments and her sparkling jewels, she assumed a plainer attire, sunk exhausted upon a chair, and burying her head in her hands, she wept. She is awakened from her reverie by a knock at the door, and ere she has risen to open it, Sir Richard is by her side, and breathing words of consolation in her ear; but his countenance looks troubled and dark, as if he were struggling with some evil emotion. He retires to a remote corner of the room, and sits with his eyes fixed on Theresa; then, suddenly rising and approaching her, he draws a paper from his pocket, and pointing to a marked paragraph, presents it to her; and then, resuming his former seat, calmly awaits the result. She looks inquiringly, bewilderingly at him, and then, carelessly glancing at the paper, her eyes are fixed on the marked paragraph.

"DIED—In New Orleans, on the 1st of June, 18—, Enrico di Montaldi, a native of Palermo, Sicily; obliged to flee his country during the late revolution, he had hardly arrived in a land of liberty, ere the fatal fever of the South had marked him for its victim."

The paper fell from her hands, and Theresa knew no more till she awoke and found herself lying upon a couch, and Sir Richard standing by her side.

"My God!" she exclaimed; "have I been dreaming?" as she started up and gazed wildly around her.

"Alas, it is no dream!" replied he; "your husband is indeed dead." And he turned aside with an exulting smile. "A friend of mine, just arrived from America, showed me this paper with regard to some affair of business, and I by accident discovered the fatal news."

From that day, Theresa quitted the stage. Of "all who courted, followed, sought or sued," not one had learned her sad history. But Sir Richard was not yet discouraged; now, his hopes were at their zenith—and, although he dared not speak of love, he knew that sickness and poverty must sooner or later make her yield, for her health was wasting with the agonies and trials she had suffered, and since her retirement from her profession, her money had been fast expended, and, in a place like London, even the sum she had acquired, would soon be gone. Sir Richard lavished upon her every attention, and it was all done in so artful a manner, so delicately, that she could not fail to feel grateful.

"Ah, Sir Richard," she exclaimed to him one day, "I can never repay you for all this kindness; it grieves me to think of it."

"Theresa!" and he looked at her with those deep, subtle eyes; "there is but one way in which I would have you repay me, but I dare not breathe it to you."

She looked at him apparently perfectly unconscious of the tenor of his words, so full of meaning.

"How—what mean you, Sir Richard? Tell me, I pray thee."

"And must I tell thee? Theresa, if in return for a love which has consumed me, which has burned within me with ever-increasing ardor from the first moment I beheld thee, with which each thought, each act of my life has been governed—in return for this devotion, this love, say you will be mine, and I am repaid!"

He paused, intensely awaiting her reply.

"Sir Richard," she began, and she rose from her seat, "leave me! I will not, must not, listen to you. How dare you insult me with these mocking words?" And she had left the room ere Sir Richard had time to speak.

Evening was casting its shadows over the city of London; gas was quickly taking place of a sun which had shone brightly all day, and the busy throng were hurrying to and fro, some returning home after the labors of the day—the tradesman from his counter, the mechanic from his tools, the clerk from his ledgers, the seamstress from her needle—till the dawn of another busy day. A few dim candles were vainly striving to illuminate the altar of the Catholic cathedral in — Street. A dark, damp gloominess pervaded the building, and not a single human being had assembled to witness the ceremony of marriage which was to be performed there. Soon the doors are opened, and the bride and bridegroom stand before the altar. They are Sir Richard Harford and Theresa di Montaldi! With a heart in the grave of another, she has, to save herself from poverty and want, consented to become the bride of Sir Richard. His deep designs of years are nearly consummated, and success has at last almost crowned his energies. Theresa, trembling with despair, stands before the altar; fain would she now, were it in her power, retract her promise and live a life of penury, could she never see Sir Richard more. But 'tis too late! his insidious snares have entrapped her, and she must meet her fate with an unflinching countenance.

But the priest has commenced the ceremony; his deep-toned and solemn voice makes Theresa tremble. She stands with her head cast down; but when the priest is about to join their hands, she looks up for the first time, and as her eyes meet his, she becomes deadly pale.

"Enrico!" she exclaims, and falls lifeless upon the marble pavement.

Sir Richard, the picture of guilt and despair, attempts to raise her.

"Villain, begone!" cries Enrico; "or I shall slay thee before the altar." And with his priestly robes thrown aside, he lifts her in his arms and bears her from the church to the carriage.

For two days she remains in a state of delirium, but gradually her consciousness is restored, and Enrico hears her sad history since he left her, learns the want and destitution which drove her to consent to wed Sir Richard, and beholds the paper containing his death, which was a base lie forged by Sir Richard's hand!

He had written to her again and again, but the letters had been intercepted, and he had believed her dead or that she had forgotten him. After wandering heart-broken in Scotland, he had but a few days before returned to London. There he learned from a friend the marriage which was to take place, and with his bosom swelling with rage and indignation, believing Theresa false and perfidious, he assumes the priest's robes and in this manner proves her heart.

Thus, after long years of separation and sorrow, they were united; and, happy as they had been during the few first months of their marriage, all the past was forgotten in the rapture of the present. But Montaldi's revenge must yet be satisfied; and the feeling that this man still lived, continually haunted him. He sent Sir Richard a challenge, and the next day was waited upon by a servant, who brought to him the news that Sir Richard was that morning found dead in his room. He had shot himself! and thus ended the fate of Sir Richard Harford.

The increase of wealth enlarges the desire of men to possess it. He who labors hard for his daily bread hath seldom such earnest desires for an addition to what he already has.

I LOVE THEE.

BY LENA LYLE.

A shell, all tinted with pearly pink,
Lay by a rivulet's swelling brink,
A lover saw it, and made it the link
To say to his dear one, I love thee.

A rosebud white, with its petals fair,
Threw out its fragrance upon the air,
A lover chanced to be wandering there,
Gazed in its cup, and read, I love thee.

A birdling young, cleft the ether blue,
With quivering wing it onward flew,
The lover watched the birdling too,
And it softly warbled, I love thee.

The lover smiled, and the lover sighed,
And then he sought the lady's side,
She blushing promised to be his bride,
And laughingly whispered, I love thee.

HEARTS TRANSFERRED.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

I HAVE but a simple story to tell you, gentle reader; but such as it is, you shall have it; and I think you will bear with me, because of my inexperience and awkwardness in writing stories.

It is of my eldest sister that I would tell you—my good, patient, loving Catherine—who took charge of us all when our dear mother died; and performed her part with more than a mother's devotion. She had done this for several years, when my father was lost in the terrible gale of December, 1839. Who does not remember that dreadful storm, when the whole coast was strewn with wrecks; when gallant ships that had out-ridden hurricane after hurricane, laid their precious burden of human life down deep in the sea, some to throw only a single mark upon the shore, and others to sink away into the boiling flood, without a vestige to tell of its loss?

Who does not remember that, in a single town, a mere village on the sea-coast, forty families were at once clothed in the mourning which charitable hands bought and made; while hundreds who were not thus reduced, were wearing the garb of woe for son, or brother, or husband, who lost their lives on that memorable night?

Of these last, was my father. We had indeed, the melancholy satisfaction denied to so many, of knowing that his remains were found and buried beside my mother; and then Catherine, and Alice, and I, sat down with our two young brothers, to consider what we should do without the guiding hand that had hitherto led us along with gentle care, and whose provident forethought had left us a home.

Yes, we had a home, a pleasant, comfortable home. Not in the heart of the great town, of which our little village was but a small part, nor yet among the poorest of the population, whose living depended solely upon the fisheries. My father had commanded large vessels, bound to rich ports, with valuable cargoes; and he had saved enough to build him a pleasant house on the slope of a hill which sheltered it completely from the rude north wind, and to lay out a fine garden which was open to the sunny south, and where our grapes ripened in the sun, and our flowers whispered to the breeze the alphabet of God's love, all day long, in the sweet summer.

Catherine was twenty years old, on the very day in which my father was lost—a sad and sorrowful birthday for her, poor child! Alice was eighteen, I—named after my mother, Mary—was fifteen, and the boys still younger. Of course, they had not yet completed their schooling; and could not be expected to add to the family store. We had our home, free and unincumbered, but we had little else, and after our mourning was purchased—without which, the simple villagers would have deemed us careless of our father's death—and the setting of a plain stone over his grave, we found ourselves with scarcely any resources.

In the spring Catherine thought we might find something to do, and she suggested several plans by which we might maintain ourselves, all of which we received from her as being perfectly infallible, and bound to succeed, choose which we would. But the present was Catherine's anxiety. Four or five months of cold or chilly weather—for even our springs on the sea-coast, are trying seasons—must be met, before our garden could be planted, or any of our schemes realized. It is so much easier planning for a long way ahead, than to meet present emergencies! We found it so, at least.

We had one treasure in our little brother Jack, the youngest of our group. He was just turned of ten—a bright, smart, sensible little fellow, with a most affectionate heart, and a mind altogether beyond his years, he was the beauty, too, of the family, next to Alice, who carried off the palm from all the rest; Catherine being simply good, without being handsome, and my own face being positively plain. Fred, who was next to me in age, with scarce a year between us, was so nearly like me in looks and stature, that we were always taken for twins.

We held important counsels, in which, although Catherine presided, each member of the family was allowed a voice; and when Jack suggested that the house was large enough for boarders, and that we had better begin by taking the school-master, we were all struck with the proposition, and thought Jack the wisest of the party.

He had heard Mr. Delano say that he could not find a boarding-place, and Catherine now despatched him to tell the master that he might call and see the house. So in the course of a day or two, he accompanied Jack home, just as we were sitting down to tea. We were not ashamed to ask him to sit down to our table, for everything on it was the very perfection of neatness, although there were no luxuries there, except a dish of our nice preserved strawberries, and the rich cream which our good Brindle yielded us; for the blessing of a good cow was amongst our best treasures. Our linen was bleached on the snow, and ironed to the last polish of which it was capable; and the beautiful porcelain tea set, which father had brought from beyond the sea, and the old-fashioned, but brightly kept silver, added even elegance to our table, and gave a better relish to the plain bread and butter and tea, which were all we had to offer our guest, except the luxuries aforesaid.

Catherine showed him a room which he could have. It overlooked the broad sea, and the pretty islands which dotted the beautiful bay. It was furnished thoroughly, and the white curtains and quilt seemed to take his fancy mightily. He offered a fair compensation, a little beyond what we had thought of charging him, and wanted to take possession at once. In a week, we had our three remaining chambers occupied by boarders, one of them a physician, Dr. Calder, and the others retired sea captains, Mason and Hentz; the two last having wives and children.

We were greatly pleased at this addition to our family circle, especially the two ladies, for Catherine felt the want of companions who had more experience in the world than herself; and Mrs. Mason and Mrs. Hentz were lovely women.

We three sisters worked like bees all winter; and as we found when spring approached that our boarders were only too anxious to remain, we gave up all thoughts of any other occupations, and were rejoiced that we could thus profitably keep together. We worked hard all day, as I said; but the evening was our resting time and festival. Our winter parlor, opening to the south, and warmed by a good hard wood fire, was at once our dining-hall and sitting-room. Here were gathered the many curious things which our father had brought from sea, and our nicely kept best furniture, and here we enjoyed the evening hours together; occasionally assembling our lodgers, when we felt like having company.

Altogether I feared sometimes, young as I was, that we were too cheerful for our situation, and that we ought not to feel so happy. It was not long, however, that this continued. Fred, who was nearer in age to me than the others, and who was my chosen confidant in all secret matters, was taken violently ill. Dr. Calder watched over him with an unwearied care and generous self-sacrifice, which we could not too strongly appreciate, and Mr. Delano, whose best scholar Fred had always proved himself, devoted night after night to the sick boy.

A gleam of hope for his life was followed by the announcement from Dr. Calder, that he could not live many hours. We lingered round his dying bed, and he knew and kissed us all, then, with a look of ineffable love and peace, he clasped his hands and breathed out his life.

It was May when Fred left us, and all summer we were haunted by his dying voice and smile. All summer we carried the flowers which he had loved best, and laid them on his grave on the hillside. But in the midst of all this sorrow, we had one pleasant thought. Alice was beloved by Dr. Calder, whose care for Fred had endeared him to us all. Her fresh young beauty had not more fully pleased his eye, than her bright, cheerful disposition had charmed his heart. Already we looked upon him as a brother.

I had been gathering flowers one morning, for the sacred use to which I had already devoted so many, and threw them on the large table which stood in the back parlor, in order to arrange them. There were bright roses and pale heliotropes, and pure white camellias, and fresh, glossy green leaves, all wet with the night dews that the sun had not yet kissed away.

So intent was I upon my flowers, that I did not perceive Catherine, who sat in the corner of the shaded room. When I at length saw her, I saw, also, that she had been weeping. Some now calamity I feared had come upon us—but what could it be? Where was little Jack? was the first question that occurred to me; for since Fred's death, I had attached myself wholly to Jack, and we were seldom separated except when he was at school. Jack was safe, Catherine, said, but she burst into a new fit of weeping which, for one so habitually calm and serene, surprised me beyond measure.

"You will think I am making a fool of myself, Mary," she said, when the paroxysm subsided. "Don't ask me what it is," she continued, hastily, as she looked at my anxious and inquiring face. "It concerns none of you, believe me; and as I seldom have a trouble which does not, pray let me keep this to myself."

"But you must not keep it, dear sister," I said, as I caressed her pretty, shining hair, and kissed the tears from her cheek. "Let us share it with you. Nay, what would you think if Alice or myself concealed anything from you?"

I could make no impression upon her; and, as my flowers were dying, I set off for the little consecrated spot on the hillside. Some one had preceded me in this delicate offering to the dead, for Fred's grave was literally covered with beautiful flowers. I laid one splendid white rose among them, and then decked my father's and mother's resting-place with the rest.

When I returned, Catherine was absent from the breakfast table, and Alice was just taking its head. She said that Catherine had the headache, and had lain down. You will think me selfish when I say that in an hour, I had forgotten her tears, and the mystery that had accompanied them, but in that brief hour, I gained a knowledge which had never come to me before, and which even then, seemed strange and incomprehensible. I learned in that hour that I was dear to the heart of Herman Delano.

He had asked Catherine's permission the night before, to tell me this, and she had given it fully. It was so new to me, that I could only falter out a few words, in token that I would consider his proposal.

All day I was in a dream. Do not think me altogether foolish, dear reader. I was only sixteen that very week, and love, except that which diffused itself towards family and friends, had never been among my experiences. I could only wonder at the new comer which was knocking at my heart for entrance. I went down to tea, thankful that Mr. Delano had been called away to his distant home on the event of a sister's marriage, and would not return for several days. Catherine looked pale, with evident traces of tears on her sweet face; which she attributed to the pain she had suffered.

All that week Catherine seemed struggling with a hidden grief. She had never named to me Mr. Delano's conversation, which I thought strange and unaccountable, but which I could not talk of to her. When Mr. Delano returned, he pressed for my answer, for which even yet I was not prepared. Why I could not decide was more than I could tell. How I missed Fred! Jack, however, divined my secret before many days, and the little fellow's eyes sparkled at the thought of his master becoming his brother.

"But I do not think I like him sufficiently, Jack," I said.

The boy's eyes opened wide at the idea of any one not liking Herman Delano.

"Then I hope you'll let Catherine have him, for I know she likes him if you don't."

Here was a new phase of the matter, sure enough! I suddenly felt as if all the light would die out of my existence, if I did not marry Herman Delano. I could not believe any other fate would content me; and I felt anxious to tell him so at once. I even sent Jack to call him to me, and when he came, I accepted him unreservedly. He thanked me warmly, told me he had feared otherwise, as I had seemed so indifferent to him. We parted that night as lovers, and to him I delegated the task of informing the family, for I felt I could never tell Catherine, after my little brother's hint.

There was no reason why we should not be married immediately; for Herman had chosen his profession for life, and his income was fully equal to our modest wishes for a home. But we delayed, on some slight ground or other, until the autumn woods were putting on their glory. I had begun to love Herman as dearly as he could wish, and our autumn rambles, long and frequent, brought us into more intimate companionship than ever.

My marriage and that of Alice were now fixed to take place in the last of October; and we were both too busy with the bridal paraphernalia, to allow any anxiety about Catherine to excite more than a passing thought.

"She will get strong and well, when four of us are well off her hands," said Alice, in reply to something I said about her drooping figure. "She has had too large a family to take care of, but she will have rest when we are gone."

Strange, that Alice nor myself had never once thought of Catherine's making the bridal tour with us; although we had petitioned her several times to have Jack go, to which she at last consented. Everything was arranged, and no one seemed to think that Catherine was to be left for the first time at home, ministering to strangers, and we all off on a journey of pleasure.

Our arrangements were again delayed—a bad omen, some would say—and this time it was Catherine's illness that had caused the cessation from our preparations. She was taken ill in the room where Alice and myself had collected our bridal finery. She was sitting with my satin dress in her hand, and suddenly she put her other hand to her heart, and fell forward. We laid her on her own bed, and summoned Dr. Calder from his room. Before night she was in a high fever. Such revelations as she unconsciously made in those dreary nights in which Alice and I watched her ravings!

"Come to me, Herman!" she would exclaim,

"Mary does not love you! You were mine, long before you loved her."

It was sad to see her who was usually so calm, and collected, and patient, now so restless and disturbed—sadder still that I had been the unconscious cause of her sufferings.

I learned, beyond a doubt, that Herman had really been attached to Catherine, that she had returned that attachment with the whole strength of her earnest soul. My course then lay clear and plain before me. I laid the knowledge which I had obtained before Mr. Delano, and formally resigned the engagement. He was grieved at my statement, but owned its truth.

"I did love her, Mary," he said, deprecatingly, "and should always have done so, had you not grown into such beauty before my eyes. When I came here last January, you were a plain, shy child. A few months developed you into such strange beauty, that I could not resist your attractions. Poor Catherine!"

"And this poor, suffering sister, has been wearing out her young life, because, forsooth, her little Mary had grown more decent-looking than her homely childhood promised! I am ashamed of you, Herman, and she your first love, too! How dared you ask me to stand in the place of my sister? And she so good, so worthy of all love—so far beyond me in everything! Herman Delano, I will never forgive you, never speak to you again if you do not make my sister happy once more."

"You are a noble girl, Mary," he began, but I stopped him at once.

"No, I am not noble. Had I possessed a spark of nobleness, I should have tried to know what little Jack's hint meant about Catherine's liking you. I hate myself for the part I have taken, though all unconsciously, against my sister's peace. And now she will die—and you, Herman, and I, will be the means of her death."

"No, Mary, Catherine shall not die, if repentance on my part can save her."

"Then why do you not go instantly and tell her so?" I exclaimed passionately.

"Hush, Mary, you are too violent. Let me go alone to her; possibly all may yet be well."

"Alone! no, I must hear your renunciation of me, and your renewal of love to her."

"Then it will not be made," he answered coldly. "Catherine, after all, understands me better than you do, Mary, and I now believe that you and I could never be happy together. You do not love me?"

"True as a book, Mr. Delano. I would not marry you if you were the only man in the world. But why do you stand here, talking about me, while she is, perhaps, dying? Go, I entreat you!"

He sighed heavily, but went to the door of Catherine's room. I called Alice out, and the two were alone for nearly half an hour. When Herman came down, he told me to go up to her. His countenance was very pale, but quite serene, like one who feels rightly within.

I went up to Catherine. She lay with clasped hands, like one at peace with all the world. The fever flush was yet on her cheek. A slight shadow came over her when she saw me; but I went up softly and kissed her, saying: "You have done me a great good, dear, by taking away this good-for-nothing man," for I saw that he had followed me up stairs, and I was determined to punish him.

"Complimentary!" he answered.

"Better than you deserve. I have a good mind to persuade Catherine to give you up now. It would be rendering poetic justice."

"You see, Catherine," he said, "that Mary makes no sacrifice, as you feared she would. She has never loved me."

"No—only for a little while at a time. I have had misgivings always, about you."

After all this, reader, it may astonish you to know that I am married, and still more perhaps, that my name is Delano. But do not think that I bought the name with my sister's happiness. I will tell you how it came about.

Herman and Catherine were married on the same night with Doctor Calder and Alice. Nothing was changed, except the bride—a rather important part of the ceremony, one would be apt to think. I officiated as bride's maid, without a sigh of regret. Catherine—pale, or flushed with fever, was present to my mind—and kept off effectually anything like that.

They wanted me to go on the bridal tour—but I preferred playing housekeeper, and Jack would not go without me. So I remained with the Masons and Hentzes, and we had a social time at home. The party returned, and both Doctor and Mr. Delano went to housekeeping. I visited Catherine freely, and called her husband "brother Herman." I do not believe he would have exchanged his wife for a dozen like myself. His preference of me had been a mere fancy, and had probably never touched his heart.

The following summer, his brother, Frank Delano, made him a visit. He was a man after my own heart, and from the first hour we met, a mutual feeling of love sprung up between us, which finally resulted in our marriage, and I am happy in possessing him whom I regard as the "flower of the family."

TO MY COUSIN.

BY THOMAS KING.

When day hath fled—mid darkness hid—
And all is hushed at rest,
When nature sleeps, and Sol has veiled
His light behind the west:

How sweet 'tis then to meditate
Upon our childhood's hours,
The days we used to consecrate
To happiness and flowers.

How oft we've wandered hand-in-hand,
Conversing with each other,
How then we seemed to understand
Feelings we could not smother.

And when the Sabbath day returned,
That day of rest and prayer,
To the little village church we turned,
And our praises offered there.

Those joyous days have passed away—
O would they still were here—
Life then was but one summer's day,
And we to each were dear.

The scene is now, alas, how changed!
Those happy days have fled—
The stern realities of life exchanged,
Since both of us are wed.

Yet let us not forget those days,
So fraught with every joy,
But unto God our voices raise—
United prayers employ.

BY MARTIN L. LANGDON.

LAURA MANSFIELD sat alone in her chamber. Life had been very weary to her for some time past, for the simple reason that she had had nothing to do. She was not very fond of reading, plain sewing was her aversion, and she had exhausted all the last new stitches in embroidery. Her wax flowers stood in large vases down in the best parlor; flowers that always looked just alike, and buds that never opened or shut. Ottomans and tabourets were there also, whose embroidered lions always remained couchant, and whose tigers were always rampant. Dogs and cats never moved from their position, and the everlasting basket of wax fruit, which she had poisoned her lungs in manufacturing, held always the same unsatisfying morsels—Dead Sea apples—fair to the eye, but very hollow within, and mocking the lips that longed for them.

A tap at the door, and the dress-maker brought her a new dress. She languidly tossed it out of the paper, in which it was folded, and scarcely looked at it at all. A new dress was too common an affair with Laura to attract more than momentary notice. But as she turned from the bed where she had thrown her dress, the newspaper was still in her hand, and her eye was caught by the words, "Wanted, a Wife." She sat down to read the odd advertisement, the first of the sort that she had seen; and read as follows:

"WANTED, A WIFE!—A gentleman of good position in society, and a professional man, would like to become acquainted with a young lady, with the view to forming a matrimonial connection. She must be of good family, well educated, graceful and accomplished. Fortune is of no consequence, but she must be good-looking, amiable, and not over twenty-five. Address 'MANFRED,' United States Hotel."

Laura looked at the date, it was the advertisement of that very day. She sat poring over the paper, and comparing the requisitions with herself. "Of good family." The Mansfields had always moved in first rate circles, and the family name was unblemished. "Well educated." Did not Laura "finish" with Madame Le Borde, and was not Signor Vittelli her last music teacher? "Graceful." If she was not, Papanti must be blamed, for she had taken lessons of him for three years. "Amiable." She had never scolded the servants, to her recollection, and no one had ever found fault with her temper. She thought it would do. "Not over twenty-five." Laura was twenty, and would pass for eighteen anywhere.

Her mind was made up. Here was a new sensation, and she could not deny herself the pleasure of experiencing it. She would address "Manfred" at once. And if his requisitions in a wife were any type of his own qualities, "Manfred" must be worth while as an acquaintance merely, if she would not like him in the capacity which he proposed.

With the greatest secrecy she wrote an answer, went out and deposited it in the post-office herself. That day and the next went off very comfortably; expectation supplying all the stimulus she had been lacking for the last two or three weeks. The third morning brought a letter. She hastened to her room, trembling lest any one should discover her secret, and full of its importance to herself and another.

It was written in a bold, handsome hand; expressing great pleasure in her own description of herself and requesting an interview, at any time or place she might name. She wrote again, and stated her preference to maintain a correspondence only, for the present, and defer the interview until they had learned more of each other by writing. She was in no haste to see him, but was willing to answer his letters.

His next letter consented, although unwillingly, to this arrangement. For several weeks, therefore, scarcely a day passed, in which Laura did not receive some missive, expressive of attachment from the unknown Manfred. She answered all, but was extremely guarded in her replies. Finally he insisted strongly on an interview; and she was obliged to think seriously of finding a suitable place to meet him.

Up to this time she had not felt that the matter was very serious. She had thought that she could withdraw from the correspondence at any time, but she had become really interested in her unseen friend, and did not like to resign it. To see him at home was impossible. Her parents had always been very strict in regard to her making acquaintances. To meet him at any public place, or in the street, could not be thought of for a moment; it was repulsive to her ideas of delicacy. She was in despair, and almost resolved to give it up. While thus musing, a friend came flying into her room, quite unceremoniously. It was Mrs. Leslie, a young married lady, who kept up the intimacy which she had held with Laura Mansfield from a child.

Laura's first impulse was to confide in her friend, and ask her advice. Mrs. Leslie shook her head with the importance of a woman who, having been married a year or two, must, of course, be very dignified, and exercise superior judgment; but as Laura proceeded with the letters and her own answers, of which she had kept copies, her love for frolic was aroused, and she promised to aid her as much as possible, and offered her own house to receive "Manfred" at the first interview. This could be more securely done, as she was to remove on the following week, and Laura could appoint the meeting if she pleased, on the day previous to the removal.

With a trembling hand, Laura wrote the letter, appointing No. 40 Phillips Street as the place, and the ensuing Monday as the time. It was immediately answered, and the greatest satisfaction expressed in the arrangements.

"I do not think, Miss Burton (although that is not, of course, your real name), that you can find any fault with my position in society. I have a lucrative profession, am abundantly able to support a wife in good style; and when you learn my true name, you will be convinced of the entire respectability of my family. I await with impatience the time when you have allowed me to hope for a sight of your face, which, if it correspond to the mind which is discoverable through your letters, will be all I ask."

Circumstances seemed adverse to the meeting. Mrs. Mansfield had set Monday to call on some friends, and wished Laura to accompany her; and it required all Laura's ingenuity to devise a plan to prevent her. At last, she got Mrs. Leslie to send for her to pass the day there, to assist her in some fancy work. Fancy work! it was fancy work enough, this transaction of Laura's! She excused herself to her mother, promised to go with her the next day to make calls, and set out for Fanny Leslie's house at eight in the morning, just as her friend was sitting down to breakfast.

"Delightful, Laura; just in season for this exquisite coffee. Nobody has such coffee as Nanny makes! See, she has hot milk, just like cream in it; and such toast! Come, love, take off your shawl, and sit right down here."

"I need it, Fannie, for I tremble like a leaf. I'm afraid I am doing wrong. Where's Charlie?"

"Gone out of town."

"I am glad of it. I could not have looked at him. I hope he suspects nothing."

"Nothing, dear; make yourself easy; it will be easy to get rid of the man if you don't like him."

"Yes, but I dread his meeting me afterwards, and recognizing me as 'Miss Burton.'"

"Nonsense. We will have the room so well shaded, that he shall not have a fair look at you. Besides, there is my plaid silk. Put that on, and as he will never see you in it again, that will be so much gained. You should not have worn that conspicuous-looking dress of yours to-day."

"I did not think. Just lend me a plain gingham. I should be loth to owe his liking to my gay dress. There is your pretty blue gingham, let me wear that."

"Well, perhaps it would be better. Go up stairs and I'll dress you. Ten is the hour, isn't it?"

They proceeded after breakfast to Fannie's room, where the blue gingham, with linen cuffs and collar, and the absence of all jewelry, added to the combing back of Laura's beautiful braids and curls, and confining all her hair in a knot behind, altered her completely. The nice fitting of the dress gave it an air of elegance even, and the simple arrangement of the hair proved, after all, more becoming than the other style.

They sat down in Fannie's little dressing-room, which was over the street door, and had also a bay window which commanded a view of all persons coming up or down the street.

Meantime, the gentleman who called himself "Manfred" was speeding along in the cars towards the town which contained the charming young lady, whose letters had given him so much pleasure. He was very thoughtful, but once in a while he smiled, as some thought seemed to flit over his mind. A friend, Walter Langdon, sat beside him, and to him he unburdened his full heart.

"I tremble like a girl, Walter. Really, I have enjoyed so much in Miss Burton's letters, that if I become disappointed in her when I meet her, it will affect me very seriously."

"I trust not, Horace, but pray tell me, as you promised, how you came to think of this wild scheme. Why, nothing under heaven would make me accept a wife who would answer an advertisement. And you, too, so singularly modest, and fastidious, too, in regard to a lady. I was surprised enough to find that Horace Gray would condescend to such a piece of absurdity."

"Talk on, Walter. I begin to think you are half right; but then I am determined to see the termination of this affair, which for weeks has completely filled my heart and brain."

"Foolish fellow! But go on, and reap the fruits of your silly scheme. I hope, however, that you will like her, if only to save you from committing a similar folly at another time."

"Well, Walter, I will tell you how this came about. You know that I returned from Europe with the reputation of being rich. This was not the case. I had nothing but my profession to trust to then; but the report brought around me all the managing mamas and eligible daughters in Clifton. When my poverty was really known, I was left alone. Not one of the butterflies remained. Now, that I have attained prosperity, I wish to share it with one who will like me for myself; and something in Miss Burton's letters tells me that she is above marrying for money."

"Well, here we are, at Burlington. Now, Horace, for No. 40 Phillips Street. Courage! mon enfant! I will await you at the hotel."

And they parted; Walter going towards the hotel, to enjoy his cigar and morning paper, and Horace, with a beating heart, to his destination.

"Hark, Laura, the cars are coming in! I hear them thundering over the bridge. Now don't look so like a frightened child! Stay, let me arrange this stray hair. You look well, believe me. You do indeed. There is a crowd coming up the street from the cars. Very likely he will come in them; for it is now five minutes of the time. There are two young men, and now they are parting. Look through the blind, Laura, one of them is coming this way. Yes, dear, the hour is come; and the man!"

The bell rang, and Laura heard Nanny ask him into the parlor. She summoned up all her courage, and went down to the room in which Nanny told her the stranger was waiting for her. It would be false to say the heart did not throb violently, under the blue gingham dress, as she entered the room, but she advanced gracefully towards the gentleman, who rose to meet her.

"Miss Burton," said he, "this is indeed kind, and I scarcely know how to thank you."

She raised her eyes to his face. It was not handsome nor very young; but the broad forehead showed intellect, and the lines round the mouth told of genuine good humor. He led her to a seat, and took one opposite. He entered fully into all the reasons which had induced him to advertise; and dwelt largely upon the pleasure which her letters had given him.

"I had several answers," he remarked, "but I have had no interview with any one but you."

They conversed for an hour; and then Laura called down her friend. Fanny was a physiognomist. She decided inwardly in his favor, and her manner towards him was so cordial, that Laura understood it as approving. They disclosed their real names to each other; and then Horace begged the privilege of introducing his friend; and he went out to find Walter Langdon. The appearance of the latter was also in his favor, and contributed to the ladies' approval of Mr. Gray. After dinner the gentlemen again called, and Horace desired Laura to name the day when she would see him again, which she did.

"Charlie, do you know the Grays of Clifton?" said Fanny to her husband that night.

"I used to know Albert and Horace Gray; and fine fellows they are too. They were sons of old Doctor Gray. I wish I knew where they were at this moment, but how came you to ask?"

Fanny replied that a gentleman of that name had called there to see Laura Mansfield, and would probably be in town again next week.

"I should be delighted to meet him. He is, I am told, at the top of his profession; but I have not seen him for two years."

"That will do," thought Fanny; "now one great anxiety will be over for Laura; for Mr. Gray can be introduced to her parents as Charlie's friend." And she ran up stairs to communicate the pleasant fact to her friend.

The following Monday came. Laura was again at Fanny Leslie's, and Charles had stayed from a journey to meet his old friend and have the pleasure of his company to dinner. Fanny sent for Mr. and Mrs. Mansfield to spend the afternoon; and unsuspecting of any under plot they came, were delighted with Mr. Leslie's friend, and saw with pleasure his attachment to their daughter, when Charles had told them whose son he was. Doctor Gray had been an old suitor of Mrs. Mansfield.

Now that Laura's apprehensions on these scores were allayed, she could meet Mr. Gray without the painful trepidation she had experienced. She only dreaded lest her parents might learn and disapprove the course she had taken. But that they had seen and liked Mr. Gray, was a circumstance that gratified her beyond measure; for the truth was, that she was becoming really and truly attached to him. On his part, too, nothing was wanting to complete his approbation of the lady, who had thus thrown herself in his way.

"Well, Walter," said he to his friend, who always accompanied him on these visits, "what do you think of 'advertising for a wife' now?"

"No better than ever, Horace. One successful enterprise or one lucky ticket does not establish a precedent. You have been fortunate, I concede; but it would not do for me to do such a thing. If in asking me that question, you were fishing for a compliment to your lady love, I am ready to pay it to the uttermost. I admire her much; and I believe that she will make you most happy."

"Thank you, although you imply an error in her judgment and mine."

The wedding came off very shortly; and the prospects of the happy pair seemed to be as promising as could be hoped for. They never repented the odd way in which their attachment commenced; and the mutual friends were quite as much pleased as though it had happened in the ordinary manner.

They frequently visited Burlington; and on one occasion were at Mr. Mansfield's to pass the night. Charles and Fanny were there in the evening; and one of the gentlemen drew a paper from his pocket, and gave it to Mrs. Mansfield, who withdrew to a side-table to enjoy it. Presently, she came to a paragraph, which seemed to excite her indignation very highly, and she began to exclaim, "Absurd, ridiculous!"

"What is it, mother?" asked Laura.

"It is one of those ridiculous advertisements for a wife, which are so common now, and which are so repulsive to all ideas of delicacy."

Charles and Fanny defended the custom, saying that they had known very estimable people whose marriage originated in it. Mrs. Mansfield called for proofs; and encouraged by a look from Horace, he gave them the first hint which Laura's parents had ever received of the manner in which her husband was introduced to her.

Mr. Mansfield laughed heartily. "Well, Laura," he said, "I will forgive it in you, but if I had any more daughters, I would not forgive you for setting such an example."

"And for my own part," said Horace, "I trust never again to be under the necessity of advertising for a wife."

THE GOVERNORS OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. Banks is the thirtieth person who has filled the gubernatorial chair of Massachusetts during the seventy-seven years since the adoption of the State Constitution. At sixty-five of the seventy-seven State elections, Boston has given a majority for the successful candidate for Governor, and on four of the exceptional years no Governor was elected by the people. Mr. Banks is the fifth Governor who did not receive a majority of the votes in Boston. The others were Democrats, viz., George S. Boutwell, Marcus Morton, Wm. Eustis, and James Sullivan. For seventy years from 1780 Christopher Gore was the only Governor who was not at some period re-elected to the office. Governors Clifford and Washburn served but one term.

Levi Lincoln was Governor nine consecutive years—the longest term of any Chief Magistrate of the State. Four of the Governors of Massachusetts have severally served for seven consecutive years, viz., John Hancock, from 1787 to 1794; Caleb Strong, from 1800 to 1807; John Brooks, from 1816 to 1823; George N. Briggs, from 1844 to 1851. Governor Hancock had served a previous term of five years, and Governor Strong served a second term of four years. Governors Hancock, Strong and Lincoln filled the office an aggregate of thirty two years. Marcus Morton, after being a defeated candidate fifteen times, succeeded at the sixteenth election by a majority of one vote out of 102,066 votes cast.

Up to the election of Levi Lincoln in 1825, the Governors of Massachusetts were men belonging to the Revolutionary era—Eustis, Brooks, Strong, Gerry, Adams and Hancock. All of them have long been numbered with the dead; and are only known as historical personages to the present generation. Governor Brooks retired from the office when he was 70 years old; he died at 72. Gov. Eustis died in office at the age of 71. These gentlemen died within a few weeks of each other, in 1825. Gov. Strong died in 1819, at the age of 74, and Gov. Gerry died in 1814 at the age of 70. Of the nine Governors since the death of Mr. Eustis, eight now survive, viz., Messrs Lincoln, Everett, Morton, Briggs, Boutwell, Clifford, Washburn and Gardner. Gov. Davis died April 19th, 1854. Four of the living Ex-Governors have been Members of Congress; four have been, or now are Judges of the State courts, and three of the number now occupy public stations in the service of the State.

The revolutionary patriot Samuel Adams was the oldest Governor of Massachusetts. He was elected for the first time in 1793, and was then at the advanced age of 72 years. He remained in the office three years, when his age and infirmities induced him to retire from public life. Mr. Adams was Lieutenant Governor under John Hancock from 1789 until his elevation to the executive chair in 1794. George S. Boutwell was the youngest Governor of Massachusetts, having been elected in his thirty-third year. Gov. Banks was born in Waltham, January 30, 1816.—Boston Transcript.

Falsehood strips the mind of its conscious dignity, keeps a man in perpetual fear, and puts invention continually on the rack to prevent the means of detection.

TAKE CARE OF SMALL THINGS.

No man ever made a fortune, or rose to greatness in any department, without being careful of small things. As the beach is made up of grains of sand, as the ocean is made up of drops of water, so the millionaire's fortune is the aggregation of the profits of single adventures, often inconsiderable in amount. Every eminent merchant, from Girard and Astor down, has been noted for his attention to details. Few distinguished lawyers have ever practised in the courts who have not been remarkable for a similar characteristic. It was one of the striking peculiarities of the first Napoleon's mind. The most petty details of his household expenses, the most trivial facts relating to his troops, were, in his opinion, as worthy of attention as the tactics of a battle, the plans of a campaign, or the revision of a code. Demosthenes, the world's unrivalled orator, was as anxious about his gestures or intonations, as about the texture of his argument or its garniture of words. Before such examples, and in the very highest walks of intellect, how contemptible the conduct of small minds who despise small things.—Dewey.

WIVES IN AFRICA.

My men were exceedingly delighted with the cordial reception we met with everywhere; but a source of annoyance was found where it was not expected. Many of their wives had married other men during our two years' absence. Mashauana's wife, who had borne him two children, was among the number. He wished to appear not to feel it much, saying, "Why, wives are as plentiful as grass, and I can get another; she may go." But he would add, "If I had that fellow, I would open his ears for him." As most of them had more wives than one, I tried to console them by saying that they had still more than I had, and that they had enough yet; but they felt the reflection to be galling, that while they were toiling, another had been devouring their corn. Some of their wives came with very young infants in their arms. This excited no discontent; and for some I had to speak to the chief to order the men who had married the only wives my companions ever had, to restore them.—Livingstone's Travels.

LAST WORDS.

"Talk to me now in Scripture language alone," said a dying Christian. "I can trust the words of God; but when they are the words of man, it costs me an effort to think whether I may trust to them." This was the testimony of one who died in the morning of life. "Charles, bring me the Bible," said a dying mother. The weak sufferer laid his thin, pale hand on the blessed book, and said, "I rest in Christ." How pleasant are the last hours of a Christian; and how often have they borne to the trembling the assurance that death has no sting, and the grave no victory! Who would not bear the cross on earth, to wear a crown in heaven?

"Who, if his God be there,
Would hesitate to tread death's narrow vale,
And die to live forever?"

MY CHILDHOOD'S HOME.

BY ALBERT AINSWORTH SAUNDERS.

My childhood's home! my childhood's home!
 My thoughts still turn to thee;
 No sculptured wall or palace dome
 Can be so dear to me.

I love in thought to linger there,
 Around that happy place,
 To gaze upon that Eden, where
 Life's path I 'gan to trace.

There still I view the time-worn cot,
 The same my boyhood knew;
 The garden and the flower-plot,
 Where early violets grew.

And there's the meadow fresh and green,
 And orchard old and gray;
 The brooklet, all the same as seen
 In early childhood's day.

And all that's beautiful and bright
 To me upon the earth,
 Beams forth, as doth the beacon-light,
 From the spot that gave me birth.

And should early scenes to memory
 Grow dim, as on I roam,
 The one that's last effaced shall be
 My happy childhood's home.

PARTED FOR A YEAR.

BY ALICE C. DENTON.

"AND did you dare to peril your happiness and that of another, on such a foundation? Strange! passing strange, and more mysterious than anything which mortals are permitted in God's providence to do, is this way in which they are left to torture each other and themselves by such unions."

"You speak very strongly, Elizabeth. Remember your nature is different from mine—more passionate, more powerful. I am more cold and indifferent, and care less for the love and affection of those with whom I live. Why, if you lived with John, you would alternately pet him and rage at him, every hour in the day. I leave him to himself—which is the worst company I could leave him in, if I wanted to be revenged on him; and when he scolds, I just coolly bid him good-night, and pass out of his presence as gaily as if I was very happy in his sulky humor."

"Georgiana! God forgive you—but you are frittering away your own happiness, in the vain love of power; and the day will come when you will rue it severely. And, mark me! the day is not far distant."

"Creak away, my strong-minded cousin; I do not fear it. John and I will get on very well, so long as he behaves well—but the moment he attempts to control me, I will leave him."

"Leave him? Good Heavens! Georgiana, you must be playing on my credulity, or else you have gone further in sin than I imagined—for sin it is, thus to trifle with your marriage vows."

"Cousin Elizabeth, you would certainly make a model wife. What a pity that your talents are not employed in the way in which you would shine so much."

"Rather thank Heaven that I am not placed in a situation so perilous, if I may judge by you. Better the lonely life to which I seem destined, than to live the life which some wives lead."

"Well, so it is, Elizabeth. I sometimes envy your freedom. I don't think I should agree with the woman who, when consoled with, on having a bad husband, answered that 'he was a great deal better than none.'"

"Don't try to make me smile, Georgiana. The subject is too grave and important for trifling. I shall think of you all night, and pray that you may awake to a sense of your peril. You seem to me like one standing on a precipice, where the first false step may plunge you into death."

"Good night, dear!" and the languid beauty buried her face in the pile of soft cushions which she had drawn around her on the couch. With her face hidden there, she looked only like a soft bundle of white muslin.

Elizabeth turned one look of pity and reproach mingled together, at the weak child who was thus trifling away her heart's happiness for a little wilful indulgence.

Elizabeth Dutton and Georgiana Marland were consins. The one, a grave, serious, high-minded girl—the other, light, frivolous and romantic. She had married John Bruman at sixteen, and for a brief time, she was full of the importance of being a married woman. Sooner than might have been expected, she began to weary of the bondage, as she called it; and John's incompatibility of temper with hers, was the constant theme of her conversation. She had been telling Elizabeth how little she had ever really cared for him, and that had drawn her cousin out, to warn her of the consequences of her folly and the danger to which she was exposed.

The difference between the consins was as marked in person, as in mind. Elizabeth was tall and rather large; having a fine, open, intellectual countenance, more massive than was really consistent with beauty. This massive countenance, however, was softened and toned down by paleness, and also by a slight touch of melancholy expression, not sufficient to call sad, but still and subdued.

Georgiana, on the contrary, was small, almost to dwarfishness, with an exceedingly pretty baby face, and an expression compounded of sentiment and sprightliness.

Her husband was a lawyer—a man of strong, keen perceptions, a temper which a woman of sense and judgment could have moulded into softness, but which was continually goaded and irritated by the little exacting ways of his wife.

One child, a little girl, formed now the only tie between them. But for this child, John Braman would, long ago, have separated from his wife, and seen her no more. Strong as he was, he felt himself unequal to the petty annoyances of his everyday life, and although fond of Georgiana, to a certain degree, he was continually the prey of unceasing mortification and disappointment at finding his idol so unworthy of the pedestal on which he had placed her. This mutual discontent could not do otherwise than bear evil fruits—and a few months after the last conversation with Elizabeth Dutton, Georgiana and her husband parted.

The child had hardly been thought of, in the sudden and passionate whirl of feeling which finally caused them to separate—but when the first remembrance of her came into the heart of both parents, each refused to give up the claim. It was agreed then, to leave it to the little Agnes herself, and she passionately refused to leave either of them.

One would have thought that this alone would have been sufficient to smooth the path to a reconciliation; but it did not so effect it; and the only compromise that could be made, was to give the care of Agnes generally to the mother, with a proviso that she should spend a few days, each alternate week, with her father.

One noble sentiment came to Georgiana, through Elizabeth Dutton's influence; and that was to refuse a maintenance for herself, from the man with whom she could not be happy to live.

Among Georgiana's almost forgotten accomplishments, the love of music had never forsaken her; and Elizabeth persuaded her to turn this talent to account, and to accept nothing but for her child. She returned to her father's home, where Elizabeth's influence was constantly over her and Agnes; and operated in some degree to check the reproach which the world was only too forward to charge upon the separated wife.

"It will be—it must be a salutary discipline for Georgiana," said Elizabeth, when John Braman remonstrated against her advising his wife to earn her own livelihood. "Depend on it, she needs the discipline of care and sorrow, and even hardship, to make her a true woman. Sometimes I am almost thankful that my uncle is so reduced in circumstances—for if Georgy were to come back to him and lead a life of luxury, I should have no hope of her whatever. But 'passing through the furnace' may bring her mind up to some growth, which she would never have attained with you."

"But Elizabeth, she is my wife still—and the stigma of allowing her to go out into the world will cling to me, and not to her."

"True, John; but as in this affair, you are not without your share of fault and blame, so you must be willing to accept your share of the punishment. Georgie is not altogether to be blamed. Hers are faults partly of education and partly organization; and if this wrenching of the ties between you does not make her a wiser and better woman, I shall give her up as heartless indeed. And I truly believe it will. I do not despair of her growing into such mental and spiritual life, as to be worthy of you, John, when you also shall have grown into a more perfect man.

"You are a blessed prophet, Elizabeth. I would gladly accept the words of your prophecy, but I fear that henceforth a gulf is fixed between us, which even your strong and steady hope can never span for us. My only hope is in my child, and even that would be faint, if she were trusted alone to Georgie's weak and vacillating guidance. I am truly thankful that so much of your influence will be about her. But O, Elizabeth, it is hard to bear, when I reflect what we might have been!"

"Too late, John, to think of that—but not too late to think of what may yet be. Absence and distance may soften the medium through which each of you has viewed the other's faults, and bring you to a more forgiving temper; but it will depend entirely on the manner in which each accepts the annoyance of the world's sneer, which you must both expect. So long as you lived together, the world had nothing to do with your private differences. Having separated, your affairs become public property, and will be thus considered."

"Elizabeth, I promise on my part, to look at this unhappy separation rightly, as you wish me to; and I need not ask you to influence my wife, for I know you will be untiring in doing so. Had she but possessed your spirit, I should not now go forth, disgraced and blamed as I feel myself to be."

"Hush, John Braman! Had you, who married my cousin when she was a mere child, performed your duty to her—had you strengthened her character, instead of petting her as a plaything until you wearied of it, and she presumed upon it, you would not now have been the desolate man that you are. You pampered Georgie, ministered to her childish folly, paid adoration to her pretty face (as if that were all that a woman needed!) and when you woke from your lover's dream, and found that you needed a companion, a spirit, a soul, then you were angry that she did not all at once, and without any attempt at culture on your part, spring up into an intellectual greatness, which it takes years to foster. And for want of this culture, she had not strength enough to bear the loss of your first homage to her beauty, and trifled with her happiness until you were both brought to this."

Georgie returned from her first attempt at labor in despair. It was all that Elizabeth could do, either by persuasion, or by the modest recital of her own life-long efforts at self-maintenance, to inspire her cousin with courage to make a second trial.

Mr. Marland, too, a man of weak mind, and passionately fond of his daughter, resisted Elizabeth's anxiety to strengthen and sustain her. He declared that she should not be forced into working for a living, and blamed Elizabeth for so advising her. Georgie, discouraged and miserable had gone to bed in tears, and Elizabeth sat in the darkened room, which was redolent of camphor and hartshorn, trying vainly to see to work.

Three days of this went by, and Georgie still cried and moaned. Agnes was with her father, wondering what it all meant, and reasoning as a child of six years might be supposed to reason, upon the strangeness of her parents not living in the same house.

"Do you intend to pass much more time in this way?" said Elizabeth, on the fourth morning, "or do you mean to become a reasonable being, and look the consequences of past folly directly in the face?"

"How harsh and unkind you are, Elizabeth! You think I ought not to have any feeling, but to be insensible, like yourself."

Elizabeth answered her by simply saying that a good surgeon would not shrink from applying the knife where it was needed.

Georgie covered her face, and murmured something about feelings.

"I have no sympathy for feelings that will not submit to necessity. Once for all, Georgie, and then I will trouble you with my advice or interference no more. You have erred miserably, and miserable will be your punishment. For a life of such small fruits as your own, the future must necessarily be ploughed deeply to ensure any harvest."

"I am no philosopher, Elizabeth."

"True, but you must accept the philosophy that falls in your way, and profit by it."

A moan was Georgie's answer; but Elizabeth's quick ear detected a variation of feeling, even in that; and she remained quiet, to see how it would work upon her patient.

"What shall I do, Elizabeth?" she asked, after two or three attempts to make her speak.

"Do you ask, with any resolution to abide by what I tell you?"

"Well—perhaps."

"Georgie, I am ashamed of you! A human being—a 'possible angel,'—a wife—a mother—to say nothing of your minor relations to the whole of humanity—to lie here, as you do this day, a mere infant in resolution, and weaker than an infant in action! God help you! for my exertions are in vain with such as you make yourself."

Georgie winced as if the iron had entered deep. She rose from the pillow, and gazed at Elizabeth, who had risen with the strength of her feelings and now stood before her.

"And I am of the same race—formed of the same clay as you are, Elizabeth; and you look as if you could make your own fate, while I—ah, answer me truly, Elizabeth! what shall I do?"

There was a faint show of earnestness in her tone, which Elizabeth was glad to accept as a token that, under the crust of Georgie's outward character, there was something that might be warmed into life and produce better things than it had yet shown.

Her first words had chilled it into inaction; but there was a hopeful, encouraging look in her face now that Georgie felt that she was not utterly forlorn.

"Rise, and be a woman!" was Elizabeth's answer now. "With your first effort, God will give you strength to go forward. It needs only your own will. Your friends can do nothing for you—not even to sustain you in your own resolutions of right. You have chosen your path, apart from him who should have protected you—who would have protected you, for believe me, Georgie, John Braman is more sinned against than sinning, and now you must walk in it alone, working out your life as you list."

While she spoke, Georgie was rising from her bed. She threw herself beside it on her knees, and prayed to God for help. An hour after, she was on the street with a roll of music in her hand. As she turned a corner, she encountered her husband. An expression of painful self-reproach, it might be, came over his face. It was, after all, his wife! and had it not been for the remembrance of Elizabeth's words, he would have asked her then, to go back to the home she had left. Georgie gathered new strength from that expression, for she saw and appreciated it; and she went on. For one year she did this; and Georgie was now twenty four years old. Recently, she had allowed Agnes to stay longer, and go more frequently; feeling that should her life or her resolution fail, the child would be better protected, the more he loved her, and the more she loved her father.

She had a large and interesting class of young ladies to instruct, and she did not visit in their homes without watching somewhat of the internal life of the parents; and she gathered and treasured up many a lesson of vast import to her own character.

She was returning home in the twilight from a long and hot day's labor, when she met a man on horseback, riding hastily towards her. She recognized him as her husband's clerk.

"Mr. Braman wishes to see you immediately, madam," said he, "the little girl is very ill." She was near the gate, and she only stopped to leave a message for Elizabeth, and then hastened onward. As she passed over the threshold of the home once her own, a dim fear assailed her, lest the child should be already dead. Mr. Braman came down himself, and led her without a word, to the chamber. Agnes lay on a couch in the middle of the room, in order to have the air circulate more freely about her. She was asleep, and Doctor Warwick who sat by her, had decided that this sleep would determine her chance for life.

Georgie was awed and hushed by this sight. Her husband had dreaded an outbreak which would startle the child, and her calmness astonished him. He had not seen her since he met her round the corner a year before, and he looked in her face for a moment, earnestly. That brief glance told him that the face had gained in character and expression, while it looked five years older. The mouth had grown firmer, the eyes more earnest, the brow not so white, but broader and fuller than before.

No one but the three were in the room; and they sat there, silent and grave, until long past midnight. Even Elizabeth came not. Her anxiety about the child was less than the idea that this night might prove one of reconciliation, and she would not interpose her presence. Wise and prudent was Elizabeth always, and never more so than now. She had told John Braman of Georgie's improvement long before this. At two o'clock, Agnes stirred. Georgie's heart beat so loud that the others could distinctly hear it; and when the doctor leaned over her and examined her, she watched him with lips apart, and eyes painfully earnest in their expression.

"She is safe?" said the doctor—and with the hearing of those three joyful words, Georgie, whose nerves had been wound up to the highest point, turned pale, and fell to the floor.

John Braman's arms received her as she fell, and it was he on whom she opened her eyes, when recovering from that long swoon. It was his lip which had rained kisses on her pale face, and his voice that whispered "no more parting until death!" And the look which she gave back, told all that his soul was longing to know.

Agnes was lying on the couch, pale and speechless, but with intelligence and returning reason in her eyes; and the good doctor was absolutely weeping. He knew all that had transpired between the two, and the reconciliation gave an inexpressible joy to his benevolent soul.

"Come to us, Elizabeth," wrote John Braman, that morning, "come and behold your work! But for you, Georgie and myself would still be apart. Come and see us re-united, as I trust, now and forever!"

Elizabeth needed no second bidding. She left the breakfast-table so hastily as to carry a part of its arrangements away with her dress, and took up the sugar-bowl, as she passed her uncle's chair emptying its contents into the cup which he held out to her.

"What on earth are you doing, Lizzie?" asked the old gentleman, who was getting somewhat oblivious of late; "and where is Georgiana this morning?"

"Where she ought to be, dear uncle!" joyfully answered Elizabeth, "in her own home! in the bosom of her family! in her husband's arms!"

"Are you practising upon my credulity, niece?" asked Mr. Marland.

"Not at all, sir," she answered. "Read this note from John."

"Thank God! and thank you, too, Lizzy; for under him, you have strengthened and encouraged my child to a new growth; while I, weak and short-sighted as I was, would only have made her weaker. Heaven bless you!"

Every person is proud. Pride is an element of our nature. We could not live without it; we should even be worthless. All the passions are good, without exception—it is excess that makes them evil, and the best of them are as bad as the worst.

THE SONG OF AURORA.

BY C. L. JENKINS.

From the regions of splendor where glories are gleaming,
Where elements joy at the morning's new birth,
From bright orient skies where the sunlight is streaming,
I come, young Aurora, to gladden the earth.

I have looked on the face of the wide rolling ocean,
And gilded with light every coralline reef;
Transparent and clear are the waves in their motion,
I've silvered with brightness the sea-weed's dark leaf.

Through the blue fields of ether, the high dome of heaven
My radiant beams are enlightening the spheres,
As by powers unseen on their courses they're driven,
There floats, O such music as man never hears.

Where in grandeur and freedom the proud Alps are soaring,
And glaciers look down on the green vales below,
I have stood on their summits, my treasures outpouring,
Bright rose tints are blending with pure lily snow.

Where Niagara's waters, tumultuously dashing,
Like hostile battalions, are mingling their roar;
Through the feathery spray there comes, brilliantly flashing,
The gleam of my robes as I stand on the shore.

I have seen where, low bending in wordless devotion,
At nature's thrice hallowed and innermost shrine,
Fair Iris adores, midst the cataract's commotion,
That Power supreme, all-pervading, divine.

At the dawn of my brightness all nature rejoices,
The pulse of creation beats joyously high;
And hark! there upriseth a myriad of voices,
The soul of all harmony floats through the sky.

From the clustering vines in Hispania waving,
Maturing in richness 'neath summer's glad smile;
From shores that the blue Adriatic is laving,
From each billow-girt rock, each bright verdant isle.

From the hills of France, now so goldenly gleaming,
From laurel-crowned mountains in Helias that rise,
To the glorious land which first caught the bright beaming,
When the Sun of all nations arose in the skies.

Those sweet voices, forever in unison blending,
Through the atmosphere float, as I move on my way,
And the lyre of praise its pure music is lending,
The anthem ascends to the Author of day.

THE RIVAL ITALIAN NOBLES.

BY FRANCIS W. BUTMANN.

ALL well-informed persons are of course aware of the origin of the contentions between the German, Italian and Polish provinces, and also of the minor one included among them, and which was more a matter of private than of political pique—we refer to the quarrel, which had had a century's existence, between the principality degli Valdambri and the marquisate di San Romolo. This enmity, far from wearing itself out, rather gathered strength with its years; and although on the death of his father, the young Marquis Falconi di San Romolo would willingly have ended it, his uncle, the Count Rimlan, who hated his nephew, while envying his superior rank, employed himself ceaselessly in privately frustrating such design, and the old Prince Valdambri used every means of fomenting the hostile feeling among his dependents towards those of his young rival. Thus a bitter feud was made to extend over thousands of acres; for, although both were of Italian origin, they were also large landgraves under Ladislaus V. of Poland, whose heir San Romolo might possibly become, and to complicate matters, their estates joined. Nevertheless, though maintaining outward appearances of hatred, the vassals of each had frequent friendly interviews and marriages, concerning which the young marquis did not care and the old prince did not know. At this time, rumors of conspiracy were afloat in the kingdom, and a system of vigilant police was known to be in operation; thus, gay as the free city of Rentz (which was contiguous to the dominions of the enemies and a frequent rendezvous for the riots of the opposing factions) might be during market days, each one felt as if he walked on the edge of a volcano.

It was on one of these gala days, that our story opens. The town was full of market folks and their wares; the bowmen of Valdambri were scattered here and there throughout the streets and squares, and those of the young marquis showed, by their eager eyes and quick retorts, that they needed only a word to kindle as hot a tumult as had ever colored the pavement of Rentz. Still others in opposing livery walked amicably arm-in-arm, ready at a moment to separate for deadly combat, and then, if neither should be killed, to meet together again and make merry the night in one long carousal. The marquis himself, dashing, handsome and brilliant, with a half-dozen associates, walked gaily along, exchanging jests and smiles with all he met. Every cap, whether of the enemy's colors or of his own or of the town's people, was doffed as he passed.

"By my faith, sir," said his friend, Lippo d'Istria, "they might as well be all green as half scarlet! for I think they wear your colors at heart. What think you? It would not be so difficult to rob this old surmudgeon of his principality!"

"Nor so pleasant," returned Falconi; "when the old fellow has neither youth nor Christianity, pray leave him his acres!"

"Ah ha! You would be sorry to rob the pretty young princess of her patrimony—is that it?"

"By the rood, I did not know there was so fair a lady!"

"Not know of Sara degli Valdambri? Where are thy eyes, man? Tush! I forgot she has been at school in Florence; there I met her—"

"Speaking of ladies," interrupted another, "what say you of her in yon window?"

Turning to look, the marquis beheld a slight, tall girl, but of exquisite development, leaning from a balcony lattice high above the street—the face oval and delicately fair, though a bright carmine dyed either cheek, every feature regular as a statue, the full red lips just suffering a smile to die in their corners, the black hair looped, in heavy, separate masses, with a small diamond crown at the back of the head, and the black, soft eyes, large and beautiful, shining clearly on his own—which, to tell the truth, save that they possessed a dash more fire, were not less beautiful. What is that inexplicable first glance which, from the moment it is interchanged, compels each gazer to see the world forever only through the other's eyes? The marquis felt as if an arrow of subtly mingled joy and pain had pierced him—that he had met his fate. He paused a moment before making the bow required by courtesy.

"Eh?" said D'Istria. "What say you of her?"

"She is more fair than words can tell," was the fervent reply.

"She is your excellency's enemy, the beautiful Princess Sara degli Valdambri!"

He had felt that to be the case, even while gazing so entrancedly; but though his thoughts were full of nothing else, he pursued his way, recounting a laughable anecdote of the old prince's dignity, and never mentioning the beauty's name. He wondered, while walking, if she had recognized him; but that was impossible. Then he wondered had she been taught to hate him; of course—of course she had. And then he vowed that he would make her love him before she knew his identity, despite Rimnal, Valdambri and even herself.

As they proceeded, the cheers that greeted them grew less and less, and immediately they saw the prince and his suite advancing slowly and bowing blandly to one and another of his own men and the citizens. The San Romolos had orders from their lord to doff their caps to the prince, and unwillingly obeyed; he, however, took no notice of this tender of peace from his foe, passing every man in green with erect chin. And the town's people, having uncovered to the marquis whom they esteemed, kept on their surly caps before the prince. As he passed the marquis, the Chevalier Falconi di San Romolo plucked off his long-plumed cap and saluted his highness with a courteous and respectful bow. Valdambri stared an instant, then laughed a taunting, offensive cachinnation, and heaven alone knows what act of insolence would have followed, if at that moment a frightened animal, breaking from its stall, had not dashed down the market-place, with foaming mouth and glaring eyes, directly into the prince's path. There was neither time for the flight of so infirm a person, nor room to spring aside into; and assuredly the old man would have been struck beneath the hooves of the enraged beast, had not San Romolo, swiftly seizing, swung him to a place of safety with one arm, while felling the animal by his sword with the other.

"Where were ye all, ye poltroons," cried the prince, "that ye suffered this fiend of a San Romolo"—and he fairly hissed the name—"to save your lord's life?"

And this was all the thanks he got. It was all that was needed. Lipponi d'Istria, hearing the words, threw them back with an addition of his own; and like fire along dry grass, an insult was in the mouths of all the scarlets round, and a scoff and a laugh resounding from all the greens. In an instant all was uproar, and the old battle-cries of the factions were shrieked along the air. Vain were the impetuous endeavors of San Romolo to quiet the multitudes, for the rejoiced old prince heaped fuel on the fire. After all, the latter was hardly so much in the wrong as might appear. The Chevalier Falconi had not spent all his years at home, and had finally taken his title and property, regarding the feud as a very trivial and merry thing. Not so Valdambri; it had been his life—and all the marquis's attempts at friendship had been misrepresented to him as ironic impertinences, while Rimlan's hostility, open in action but hidden in source, was all ascribed to his nephew.

When the first shouts resounded, the Princess Sara turned from her window, fearfully asking the cause. Her polite hostess strove to reassure her.

"But where is my father?" asked the younger lady.

"He went out an hour or two since," the other was obliged to admit.

"Then he must be found; I must go to him! My father will be wounded!" cried the princess.

"Nay, he has friends, many friends with him!"

"He has not me! I must go to him."

"Dear lady, are you raving? he will not want you! You have neither weapon nor strength! A woman in the mob! a princess—"

"Quick! my capote, Maria!" interrupted the other. "Lady Lorraine, pardon me. I have a weapon, this little dagger I bought for the masquerade! Lady Leonore, will you, too, come on an adventure?"

And before the imploring Lady Lorraine could utter another articulate sentence, the Princess Sara and her southern friend Leonore, wrapping their hooded cloaks about them, had issued into the street, and, without fairly knowing their situation, found themselves swallowed into the driving, fighting, noisy mass. Still they struggled on, for the quarrel was not against women, and no one touched them, dodging missiles, and diving under the uplifted arms of brawny wrestlers.

"It is more than I thought," cried the princess; "but still who does not desire to have seen one such thing in one's life? We can understand the old battles in the monk's chronicles now!"

As she spoke, they saw the marquis, with his friends, making way through the crowd, sword in hand, and constantly repressing his own men.

"God for the Leopards of Valdambrini!" shouted one she knew as a knight of her father's, the Leopards being their arms. "And down with—"

His cry was however drowned by a myriad of voices replying:

"Down with the Leopards! and Heaven make the Olives of San Romolo to burgeon!" While to her surprise, the marquis suddenly ceased his endeavors at peace and plunged into the strife, as perhaps he had been longing to do, with all his heart.

She had indeed seen him earlier in the day, but at that moment had never noticed his colors. True, he wore green—green and silver—but he might be an Italian, a guest, she thought; he was not like these Poles—he could not possibly belong to that detestable gang of the villain San Romolo! So reasoning, and quite forgetting that she had come out intending to employ her immense strength for the rescue of her father, she caught a limb of the statue of some worthy erected on the square in which they now were, and held fast to its shelter, watching the fray with intense interest. She beheld the marquis making a path before him like Achilles, and laying heroic blows about him; but at that instant he, in turn, caught a glimpse of her face as she stood bending eagerly forward, so that her cloak, half awry, displayed the rich attire beneath, as well as the beautiful flushing countenance. And that glance nearly wrought his ruin, for it came just as the shout of certain victory was on his lips; his opponents seized the moment of advantage, and closing round, prostrated and disarmed him. A moment, and there would have been no longer any Chevalier Falconi and the County Rimlan would have reigned in his stead, had not Sara stepped from the pedestal, insinuated herself like a flash between the masses, and slid into his hand her little dagger. Before she could retreat, he was up again; but his partisans had rushed to the rescue, and were trampling over the unprotected girl. As swiftly as he had freed himself by her means, he saw her almost under their feet, snatched her up as they would have trodden her into the stones, and thrilling all through at thought of what he carried, opened the crowd of greens for his passage to where the old prince, from the doorway of St. Ambrose's Church, urged on the scarlets. He had not spoken to the girl, while bearing her on with her sweet breath fanning her cheek; now, with all that grace which was innate with him, he surrendered her to her father.

"Your daughter, prince!" said he, laconically, and vanished.

"Both of us!" cried that astounded gentleman. "In one morning risked his own life twice! Is he drunk—or can a San Romolo do a noble trick? We'll not be behind. Call in the Valdambrini!"

After this, nothing else could be done; but it was rather useless, for the Valdambrini had already very much the worst, and were glad of any pretext for retreat. Of course the princess received a very stately reprimand for her imprudence, and in her confusion and pleasure, and the discovery of Leonore, who had been conducted by D'Istria to her side, she quite forgot to inquire the name of her preserver. Thus soon, quiet being restored, the retainers wound off to dine at their separate hostelries, and the nobles of the princely faction at Lady Lorraine's, who gave a masked entertainment somewhat later.

At the time when the marquis first saw the princess, the County Rimlan at no great distance was drinking in the same glances, not for the first or second time only, for he had met the lady often before, and what had at first worn in him a semblance of passion, had soon changed to a bad and revengeful impulse, that since she had chosen to assume haughty airs towards himself, he would yet become her master. Night drew on, and the facade of the Lorraine Palace was a blaze of illumination; colored lamps hung everywhere in the gardens; horses, chairs, coaches, guests, servants, filled the court-yard; while the link-boys, running here and there, shed strange flashes over the whole.

Two tall figures, in armor and closed-steel helmets, entered the hall later than most others, and making their bow to the hostess, moved on. If any one had taken pains to observe, all the throng, whatever were their character, had a scarlet mantle, dress, flower or ribbon about them; but these two wore no color save the gray of their armor and a cloak, hanging from one shoulder, of sombre green; round either helmet was wound a spray of olive leaves. The tallest carried a small dagger, very richly jewelled, and quite inappropriate to his dress—the only atom of the prescribed color being the rubies on the hilt, while the other, more independent, had not even that. A beautiful figure, in the perfection of an Odalisque's array, floated down from a dais, through the apartments, as they entered. Her robes were all of some flashing white gauze, threaded with gold; a crimson cashmere was the loose girdle; the tiny feet were encased in upturned, dazzling slippers; a scarf of lace, fastened with bunches of emeralds and pearls, was half wound through the drooping streams of glossy black hair, allowing its long ends to float as she moved; the jacket, rather open at the throat and bosom, displayed a resplendently white skin, contrasting well with its necklace of emeralds and pearls as large as filberts; and the only thing wanting to complete this delicious costume, was the invariable dagger of the Turkish lady—for though she carried the little sheath, it was empty.

As she passed the two, another figure, similarly attired, slipped her arm into D'Istria's and led him off. They were, it seemed, old acquaintances; while the first figure, coquettishly half lifting her mask, threw a sidelong glance at the one remaining, thus revealing the bewitching eyes of the Princess Sara, and floated on. He, it may be believed, did not hesitate in following, and very soon found himself sitting beside the fair Turk in the very balcony from which she had first seen him.

"I knew you, signor," said the princess, "by the dagger in your belt."

"It saved my life," he replied; "life of small consequence two hours before, but then and now of infinite value!"

"And what has so suddenly increased its worth?" asked the innocent lady.

"Ah, lady," was the rejoinder, "I had seen you! The dagger which has hung at your belt would therefore be inestimable, had we not an Italian proverb—"

"You are then of Italy?" she inquired.

"My ancestors were Romans; I am proud in being a Pole!"

"And your proverb?"

"That such things cut love."

"We have that in Poland, too!"

"Then it remains with you to prevent such sanguinary proceedings—whether you command me to retain the dagger, a gift from you to fulfil the proverb with, or whether you take again your own!" And he presented it to her.

She half hesitated, and then took and placed it in its sheath.

"You would be loath to have it perform its work?" questioned he.

"Ah, you know we ladies are averse to bloodshed," she answered, laughing. "But tell me, do I not speak to an enemy?"

He had lifted his helmet ere this.

"God forbid!" said he. "To an adorer, rather!"

"But you wear the colors we detest!"

"And why do you detest them?"

"Are they not San Romolo's?"

"Pardon, lady! and in what has San Romolo injured you?"

"Have we not hated for a century?"

"It is time, then, surely, to try if love be as delicious as hate!"

"Signor!"

"Seriously, I believe your enemy, as you will have it, is weary of brawls."

"The tumult of this morning has that appearance!"

"Believe me, it was against every wish of the marquis."

"But I have heard of his exploits on the same occasion. He would hardly have fought so valiantly, had he not relished it."

"That was after he found it in vain to try peaceable means, and when a man's blood is up, do you suppose he pauses to look at the consequences?"

"True. The Marquis of San Romolo I have heard pauses at nothing. Yet he saved my father's life this morning, and you, my friend, saved mine!"

"That you cancelled at once, lady."

"And yet I can do nothing but dislike the sound of his name."

"When, intrinsically, you can accuse him of nothing but virtue!"

The princess began to own that she was actuated by prejudice and precept.

"Is it not then absurd," continued her companion, "to suffer a quarrel of people—no doubt hot-headed and obstinate, and both in the wrong and both dead a hundred years ago—to entail woe and misery upon us? Ah, madame, our vassals have fought for us always before! Surely we have no need to take their work from them and quarrel ourselves?"

She started suddenly, wavered a minute, and then bending forward, said earnestly:

"Signor, who are you?"

He laughed before answering. Said he:

"Let me, too, ask a question. You who saw me this morning, who watched me in the disturbance, who have conversed an hour, at least, with me—confess, have you formed a favorable opinion of me?"

"Yes. Certainly."

"Although I wear green?"

"You may be misled by the wiles of the marquis, or you may be a chance guest and wear it through ceremony."

"Ah, you think so?" returned he, laughing still. "But if you discovered me to be one considered by you equal to the arch fiend, your opinion would not be so favorable?"

"By no means."

Judge, then, if you acknowledge yourself, dear lady, to be thus biased by prejudice, if I were wise in telling you my identity, or for what reason I make my cloak green."

"But I wish to know," she continued, after a pause. "It is not right that I should even speak to one who bears hatred towards my father!"

"Believe me, princess, I bear nothing but good will to the Valdambri. Least of all would it be possible to entertain such a sentiment as you express, towards your father. Once he loved my mother. She was a Florentine; and we of this hot, Italian blood, curse quicker and love quicker than any other race on earth. As for the feud with its causes, I regard it as absurd, and abstain from it! As for the love, Princess Sara, since I saw you this morning, it has sprung full-grown into a world that was ready for it! Before heaven, it tingles in all my veins at this instant!"

As he spoke, he stood erect with uncovered head. It might have been some wonderful magnetism, or indeed it might have been a corresponding passion, that caused her to rise beside him, to cling in his embrace, and suffer his burning lips to fasten themselves on hers in one long, answering passionate kiss!

When the two in helmets and armor had entered the salon, another, arranged in a parade of scarlet, had followed them, pressing through the throngs of dancers, and keeping them in his eye. Having at last beheld the Princess Sara seated in the balcony with one beside her, he straightway sought the prince, and thus it came to pass that Leonore at this instant stood before them.

"Fly, signor—fly!" she said. "The prince knows of your presence—he is coming! D'Istria awaits you below!"

"Let him come," returned he, carelessly, his arm still round the princess. "Fly? Not I!"

"You will be killed!" ejaculated Leonore.

"I, too, wear a sword!"

"And would you use it on my father? There is no shame in flying; you are one, they are a thousand."

"I cannot fly," he answered hoarsely, for Leonore had sped back, "till you tell me with words also that you return this love of mine!"

"Fly, then, by your love for me, mine for you! Fly because I love you with my whole soul, and swear it forever!"

"Once more, blessed words! once more!"

But she only flung her arms around his neck an instant, and suddenly dropping on her seat, motioned him imperatively away.

Taking the balustrade in one hand, he sprang across it and dropped himself into the court-yard below; D'Istria stood there, and without a word, they sped away. Hardly was the feat accomplished, before the old prince, livid with rage at being thus bearded, entered the balcony.

"Where is he gone?" he cried, passionately.

"Who?"

"Your companion!"

"He bade me good-night a short time since."

"And departed?"

"I believe so."

"By the heavens above us, child!" exclaimed her father, moved by such carelessness. "Do you know who it is who has thus sat by your side, with whom you have interchanged words and even breath?"

"No," she replied, half alarmed at his vehemence, "I do not know. Who?"

"It is mine enemy!" he thundered. "The Marquis Falconi di San Romolo!"

Perhaps had the marquis been able to delay a moment, he would himself have confessed to her his identity, ere it should be thus rudely thrust on her. The princess sprang to his side and caught her father's arm. O heavens! did she then love, and had she then vowed to love forever, not only an ally of San Romolo, but their very enemy, the chevalier himself? And before her father could prevent, she fell at his feet in a passion of tears and repentance, albeit she never spoke a word.

"Poor child! poor little one!" said Valdambri, lifting her soothingly. "How she hates him—the scoundrel! See, gentlemen, how generation to generation perpetuates this hate, thank God!"

There might have been a few present who hardly thought it hate; and Rimlan, who had whispered the announcement in his ears and spread through the throng the audacious act of the chevalier, now quietly slipped away.

Two days had passed, and in the city of Rentz, after most others had departed, the County Rimlan might have been seen walking, one dark night, with his hat slouched over his face, and anxiously awaiting some one—might have been seen, we say, because from behind every adjacent cranny fifty pairs of eyes were watching each movement. At last a step broke the silence, and D'Istria joined him.

"Have you the papers?" asked Rimlan.

"Ay; and I flatter myself no soul could detect that they are not San Romolo's own script. I drafted them myself."

"How many are there?"

"Three. One calling on the subjects of King Ladislaus to rebel and aid the marquis in obtaining the crown for him, and certain immunities from taxes for themselves; one purporting to be a letter to some friend revealing a plot for the murder of the Prince Valdambrini, and marriage with his daughter; and the other, a roll of the conspirators against the king, embracing San Romolo and the names of such other of your enemies as you wished to destroy."

"Either of which will, I suppose, be sufficient to doom him to death?"

"Without doubt. And now, County Rimlan, why do you do this?"

"For one thing, in order to divert attention from my own conspiracy for the throne; for another thing, that I may gratify my hatred of this boy; for another thing, that I may obtain the Princess Sara. And seeing you had become disaffected, I judged well that you must be willing to share the dangers and profits of these attempts with me; therefore I sounded your inclinations, and finding them favorable, have extended certain proposals to you, which you have accepted. And you have moreover done your part well? I will, however, take the papers, if you please."

"Yes, directly," said D'Istria, taking out a blank parchment and an ink-horn. "I would like your written promise to these obligations first."

"Bah! I like not black and white. It is dangerous," said Rimlan.

"It cannot be in this case, since for my own sake, I shall preserve it religiously. Moreover, should anything happen to you, your adherents will respect it."

Rimlan took the pen.

"What shall I write?" said he.

D'Istria proceeded to dictate the terms, and after long hesitation and much questioning, they were penned by the light of a dark lantern, and D'Istria had folded the parchment away.

"You see, signor, how strict are the terms which I have put upon myself," said the latter.

"Ay," assented Rimlan, dubiously.

"And I now surrender the other papers to you."

At this, the County Rimlan took courage.

"They will finish him, I trust!" said he.

"And you too!" muttered D'Istria.

"And I shall take care to have them dropped in the king's way by to-morrow, and then we can very safely leave San Romolo's destruction to him. Good night, Signor Lippo!"

As Rimlan turned away, D'Istria, always on his guard, saw the flash of his stiletto quite ready to put so important a witness of his treason out of the world; and as it made a dexterous and back-handed lunge, he threw himself aside and saw it penetrate a wooden post. Rimlan drew it out with an oath, swearing that that stiletto was the plague of his life, and strode away.

"Ah, you villain!" said D'Istria; "do you suppose the whole kingdom could bribe me to betray San Romolo into your clutches, and for your advancement? Crown such a rascal, forsooth!" And then with the fifty gentlemen, who now issued from their retirement, he left the spot.

But when Rimlan reached home, a brother conspirator, who hated D'Istria, was already there; and after the two had perused the documents, Rimlan locked them up and retired. Later at night, the other stole down, and procuring them a moment, inserted in the roll, in a fine text and somewhat similar chirography, close under the name of San Romolo, that of Lippo d'Istria—so that when the Chevalier Falconi may find himself in a prison, he may be sure that his friend Lippo is not far off—and having done this, and replaced them as before, the wretch crept to bed again. The next day, these three papers were in the hands of the king.

Meanwhile, the gay-hearted chevalier was bent on following up his adventure with the princess; and though wondering what could so suddenly have become of D'Istria, he unsuspectingly donned a palmer's broad hat and cloak, and betook himself, across the forest that joined their country seats, to the residence of the Valdambrini. Leaving his horse in a thicket, he faced onward on foot. The prince was in the capital, he knew, his daughter at home, and so he craved permission of the porters at the lodge to go up to the palace and recount his travels to their young mistress. The holy dress that he wore being always a passport, this was readily granted, and soon he once more found himself in the presence of his enchantress. By chance, the princess sat alone; and as he entered, she rose with a sweet gravity to ask the customary pilgrim's blessing. But at the sight of him as he threw off the screen of hat and cloak, she recoiled.

"Your highness flies from me to-day," said he.

"I am at a loss to know why the Valdambrini Palace is honored by a call from Falconi di San Romolo!" she replied, with flashing eyes.

"Indeed, lady, you would not have been at such loss on Monday night!"

"Why do you recall that disgraceful scene?"

"Pardon. You can forget it, as you have already forgotten the oath you swore when I left you," said he, bitterly.

"I made the oath, in a dreadful moment, to one whom I esteemed an honest man. I might have kept it, perhaps—though that I doubt—even to an enemy, as I so soon discovered you to be. But to a traitor, the proofs of whose treason are even now in the king's hands, as my father has told me, and for whom a band of the loyalist gentlemen of the country, in royal uniform, are scouring hill and dale, to him I proudly break all oaths, and pray to lose the abhorred memory of having made them!"

Perhaps this was the only way in which to notify him of his danger; perhaps she really thought herself in earnest.

"A traitor!" cried the chevalier, raising himself to his loftiest height. "I? You mistake, lady! It were impossible. You hardly know how insulting is the language you use—though you use it!"

"I sir, insulting? It is your presence that insults me. This roof has never till this moment sheltered any but faithful subjects."

"Let me ask you to explain yourself. Do you mean that any one suspects me of disloyalty?"

"As you say, and much more."

"It is my enemies who will not be my friends!" he said. "There is not a more liege vassal in the kingdom than I! I defy every Valdambrini to do their best, and prove me with a drop of the blood of the San Romolos to have mixed reason with it!"

He saw the changing expression on her face, the tears in her eyes, the color wavering on her cheek, and looking firmly at her, he added:

"Do you doubt me?"

"The chevalier has an uncle!" she responded, the thin, pink nostrils dilating and quivering with wrath at mention of his name. "San Romolo's blood perhaps does not run in his veins!"

"And it is to him that I owe this favor?"

"He gave the proofs—"

"Proofs? What proofs?"

"I do not know—into the king's hands, and he told my father that on this night week you intended to steal me away."

"The wretch may have divined my desires, but I certainly never told them!" laughed the marquis. "And if my uncle be at the heart of this mystery, I have no fear of him!"

"The Signor d'Istria is also there."

The marquis started. "D'Istria? I would trust him with my heart's blood!" he said.

"You have already trusted him too much."

"He? he may counterfeit enmity to me. He is deep enough to foil a thousand Rimplans."

"Your uncle said that the pain it cost him to do his duty here, it was impossible to believe."

"Too small to be seen, I suppose. But since your highness says these things, I must hasten to the king. Nor shall I, while this blot threatens our escutcheon, ask again if you return the love of a suspected traitor."

The palace Valdambrini stood on the summit of an eminence, and this room commanded a wide view, so that now while they spoke, they saw approaching, from three opposite directions, three separate bands of horsemen, in royal uniform, who from their confident demeanor seemed to have tracked the marquis to this spot.

"You should hardly have been so bold, chevalier, as to have sought the lair of the leopards," said the princess, after watching them a moment; "there is no path by which you may fly."

"I do not wish to fly. Of course I surrender and demand investigation, but not to these!"

"Then you must be concealed."

"Never!"

"What then?" she demanded.

"Die first!" he answered, quickly.

"For my sake," she said, pleadingly.

"For your sake? What do you care?"

"Do I not care?" she cried; "do I not care? O heavens, San Romolo! Can I forget? Is not your honor mine also?"

"And you keep that oath then?"

"Forever!" And putting her arms round his neck, she laid her head on his bosom, clinging to him more tenderly than in this hour he might feel what comfort she could bring.

Already they heard the quick-galloping hoofs loudly resounding.

"There are countless vaults and coping-stones which might screen you if you will!" she said, lifting her head with a sudden smile.

"No, dearest, I will go out by them all as I am. Meet me, love, once more this evening, in yonder wood, and then I seek Ladislaus."

A moment of passionate farewell, and then, as the riders dashed up the lawn, he went down, and the whole troop passed him at a gallop; and so common was the sight of a palmer, that they did not even think of asking a benedicite.

That night, the moon lighting the shades of the old beech forest into a pale greenery, the lovers sat long hours together, alone and free. Midnight separated them, and dawn found San Romolo at the palace gates, where he surrendered himself; but ere the king could be made aware of the circumstance, Rimlan appeared, and ferociously ordered him to the lonely dungeon of the prisoner of state, and at noon, the king, without thinking it worth mentioning to Rimlan, arrested and confined D'Istria whose name he had also found upon the list. As soon as this intelligence became public, the loudest murmurs of anger and disbelief filled the people, and the Princess Sara, with Lady Leonore, came up at once to join her father.

A week passed, and the trial of the marquis was holding. The three papers, with the false oaths taken by Rimlan on the occasion, were sufficient testimony for treason, although the first haughty denials and then indignant silence of the marquis could not but move all hearts. The council rooms were crowded with the first nobility of the realm, for the San Romolos were cousins to the reigning house of Poland. Palest and most beautiful of all, beside the queen in the foremost rank of the confronting benches, sat the Princess Sara, and looking demurely sad below her, sat the villainous County Rimlan.

It was at this juncture that the lord keeper of the prisons entered and addressed Ladislaus in a low tone. The king rose and with him left the place for a short time, when he returned, he pronounced it necessary to delay passing sentence on the prisoner, who was, he said, without doubt guilty, and that further proceedings would be held on the morrow in the royal Church of the Cross. Those most accustomed to observe the royal countenance, did not on this occasion fail to notice that whereas all the previous part of the trial he had worn a most perplexed and sorrowful air, now he with difficulty repressed smiles. When all were gone but the Prince Valdambrini, he turned to him saying, "I have long desired to do your highness a favor, but never found anything sufficiently worthy before, now, I rejoice that it is in my power to bestow a husband upon your daughter. A man who has placed me under endless obligations, and who is destined to even higher rank than he now holds, for since his nephew dies to-morrow, he is already virtually Marquis di San Romolo!"

The old man turned white and red by turns, and it was some moments before he could master himself enough to speak. "Your majesty," he then said, "cannot mean to do me such dishonor!"

"Dishonor?"

"Is not his family name even now stained with treachery?"

"Remember, Valdambrini, that unless my new queen brings me heirs, which is unlikely, he will be after to-morrow the nearest relative I have. My heir. Shall you have no pride in seeing your daughter on this throne?"

"I shall not live to see it, and cannot desire to, if shared with my ancestors' enemy!"

"But let your king implore you to waive this quarrel, that the nation may see how we reward the faithful, and those who discover treason!" still urged the king.

It was dusk ere they parted, and then with a heavy heart the old man had assented to the proposition, and had gone to lay his commands upon his daughter. But her he found immovable and indignant; she spurned the request, and made a hundred rash vows to support her refusal; her father was nearly in despair, when falling on her knees and holding his hands in her own, she confessed that she loved the nephew, the traitor, and that he knew it. The old prince staggered, overcome by this last blow. That to please the king, and for various compulsory and necessary reasons, his daughter should wed the other one, had been enough; he could have sympathized with her, they would have been wretched together; but to have her love him, was out of the question; and now to find that she indeed loved one positively worse, and worse hated than he, and a condemned criminal moreover, was too much for his princely pride. What words he might have uttered were stayed by the entrance of the king, who begged him to leave them that he might exercise his royal powers of persuasion.

Kings, as well as their subjects, are sometimes fond of practical jokes, and neither of these unhappy people noticed the mischievous twinkle in his majesty's eye, as the prince went out. Standing before the princess, he said:

"The County Rimlan has to-day requested the honor of your highness's hand. I can deny so trusty a noble nothing, and have granted it. I have also to-day given the Signor D'Istria an interview, and thus learned your love for the Chevalier Falconi. It is idle; dismiss it! You will wed Rimlan to-morrow."

"No, sire. I will not!"

"No?" he resumed, assuming a sterner air. "Listen. If you become the Countess Rimlan, the Marquis di San Romolo shall live. I will only banish him, and bestow his estates, titles and heirdom on your husband; I will spare his life. But if you refuse, by the holy cross, I will cut off his head so surely as I stand here, and as in that case you will be his murderer. It is in your power to save your lover's life! I give you fifteen minutes to decide!" And he left her.

When he returned, she was lying cold and senseless in a swoon upon the floor. It was a long time before, with every combined assistance the unfortunate girl could be recalled to life, and then so weak and wandering was she, that it was impossible to arrive at her decision, so the king departed, saying, "To-morrow morning, when you go with the court to the Royal Church of the Cross, you will go either prepared in wedding array, or in black, headsman's garb, as a type of the fate of him whose widow and executioner you will surely be, for remember by your appearance will the chevalier's sentence be decided."

Day came, and the church filled with the nobles, each silently taking their accustomed places. Lastly came the Prince Valdambri, the County Rimlan, and the king. Immediately afterwards the marquis entered alone, and with the same haughty stride as of old, and stood below the high altar to receive sentence. Then stole a loud rustle and murmur through the galleries, and from the chapel the queen and her train of ladies, with the Lady Leonore and the princess, entered. The latter moved stiff and white as a corpse, in a dress of sweeping, snowy brocade, the bodice covered with diamonds, and a full veil of gauze, set on beneath a crown, shrouded her completely. The king smiled, as she entered and took her seat in a chair not far distant from the altar. When all was quiet, the doors of the main entrance swung open once more, and the Signor Lippo D'Istria with some fifty gentlemen behind him, looking smiling and defiant, also appeared. Leaving them in the nave he advanced alone to his majesty and gave him the parchment once bestowed on himself by Rimlan.

"Sire," said he, in a loud tone, "I surrender to you a document whose value you can best ascertain."

Rimlan made a motion as if to snatch it, but the dreadful eye of the king palsied him.

"It is not a month ago," continued D'Istria, at a nod from the king, "that I, who am a friend of San Romolo, overheard a plot of the County Rimlan's to destroy his nephew. That I might learn more concerning it and so frustrate it, for to the marquis I owe more than life, I exhibited signs of hatred towards the chevalier, and was of course eagerly seized by the county. I appeared to enter in his plans, that I might obtain them, and shortly afterwards, he disclosed a more enormous one aimed at the crown. My lords and gentlemen, the three papers on which you yesterday convicted the marquis, I myself forged, as you will see by looking in the upper corner of the under side where in very minute letters I have written 'Philippus D'Istrius hoc fecit,' and the king will read to you the document which I received in payment."

Much more followed, and then the fifty gentlemen, all of whom we have before met with, each came forward and swore to the truth of D'Istria's statements, and revealed the treachery of the shrinking man before them. Lastly the king unfolded his parchment, first saying:

"Yesterday, the Signor D'Istria told me many things, but did not suffer me to read this. I allowed him to depart under escort, in search of his witnesses, and the course I have pursued since then, is partly derived from his suggestions!" And then in a loud voice he read:

"I hereby promise to Lippo D'Istria, the marquisate of San Romolo, the principality of Valdambri, and in addition a yearly revenue of six thousand florins from the royal exchequer, in lieu of assistance already afforded me in my struggles for the crown, and provided that on the sixteenth of June he meets me in the palace and there aids in putting Ladislaus V. to death. By this contract he binds himself to ask nothing more, and I also acknowledge the receipt of three papers forged by him and containing false evidence of San Romolo's treason.

Signed, RIMLAN GALGANO DA GARGANI."

"County," said Ladislaus, "it is the sixteenth of June to-day."

There was an awkward movement of Rimlan's arm in the king's direction, intercepted by D'Istria.

"That stiletto is the plague of your life, is it not?" whispered the latter.

Meanwhile the princess, half risen from her chair, leaning heavily on one hand and thrusting aside her veil with the other, gazed bewildered at the scene, for the king had said, "People of Poland! is the Marquis di San Romolo guilty or not guilty?" And the answering cry of the nobles had rent the dome with a reverberated "Not guilty!"

"And the County Rimlan?" questioned the king, but such a dead silence suddenly reigned that a falling feather might have been heard. "I then must speak," continued his majesty, "and that no death-sorrow may dim so fine a day, we pardon him ; but let him never, under our heaviest penalty, enter the boundaries of Poland again !”

Four guards who were to see the royal will executed, accompanied the pardoned man from the place.

“What says your highnesses ?” resumed the king, turning to Valdambrini, “shall we have no wedding to-day ? ’Twere a pity so fair a bride should have no groom !”

The old prince paused a moment, then went forward and took the marquis’s hand.

“Chevalier,” he said, “I have been in the wrong. I should have known better than I believed regarding your mother’s son. Behold, if your generous nature can overlook the past, let us seal our amity by an irrefragable bond. Take my daughter, sir, and God bless you !”

And proud of his child’s beauty, for the cheeks were all rosy beneath their filmy covering, the eyes liquid and glowing, and of his own magnanimity, for it had taken severe effort to subdue the habit of years, he led her on and placed her hand in his, as the bishops advanced to meet them. When the chevalier and his wife arose, two others silently took their place for a similar ceremony. The bishops looked a moment at the smiling king, and then solemnly gave the same nuptial blessing over D’Istria, the gay Duke of Modena, and the Lady Leonore. Thus was ended the bitterest feud in the annals of any history, and often afterwards, did the chevalier, still the chevalier, though he wore a crown, remind his queen of her improper and undignified demeanor on the very first night of their acquaintance. And she, copying her former behaviour, demands, “And you, love, what did you do ?” Upon which he repeats his first offence.

A DOVE STORY.

A gentleman of this city who has a dove cot at his residence at the West End, relates the following incident as having occurred last week. In the cot were a male and female dove and two squabs. The male squab having died, the elderly dove drove from his nest his female mate, and promoted to his bed and board the young female squab, pecking at and driving from his cot the female dove. Finally, upon one occasion, when the female appeared at the door of the cot, the male sallied out, pecked at her and drove her away. The persecuted mother flew down to a perch below, where with her head under her wing, she remained for a short time, and then fell suddenly to the ground. The inmates of the house, who had witnessed the proceedings, immediately went out and ascertained that the dove was dead, but no wound was found sufficient to cause death. Possibly she died of a broken heart from the brutal treatment of her false and sickle mate.—Traveller.

THE AZTEC'S REVENGE.

BY MARY W. JANVEIN.

NIGHT, gorgeous night, bent down on Lima. Afar off, the blue Andes loomed distinctly against the serene sky ; peak and precipice, crag and cliff, covered with tangled shrubbery and giant trees upon whose hoary trunks matted vines had for ages been slowly creeping. Below lay beautiful valleys dotted with the huts of the peaceful Indians, gardens filled with purple laurel and orange blossoms ; and far away to the east stretched immense pampas, their vast monotony occasionally broken up by groups of stately palmettos, and the shady plantain with its glossy, dark-green leaves.

And this was Peru, beautiful Peru ; the clime that had once been free as the pure air above its blue Andes—whose Incas had held regal sway in its ancient Cuzco—whose sons, true Aztecs, had never writhed beneath the yoke of foreign bondage.

But now, alas ! how changed. True, the Andes rear their heads still proudly, lakes lay gleaming like mountain mirrors in their frames of dark evergreen, and the Peruvian maiden still sought their margins to dip her flowing tresses, and lave her polished limbs—orange groves and lime trees still bloomed luxuriantly, and tropic gardens flung out their wealth of fragrance on the soft, sensuous air ; but the hearts of Peru’s children were sadly changed—their free, and once tameless spirit had been ruthlessly quenched—trampled upon by the race who had come thither over the eastern waters, and whom they in their childlike wonder and guileless confidence named “Children of the Sun.”

The races of the Spaniards and Peruvians, since that age, have mingled, even as the sea receives the tributary river into its bosom ; and now many ages will not be shaken from the tireless wing of Time ere tales of ancient Peruvian glory and splendor will live only in the wild legend of the serf, or the ballad of the hardy mountaineer, who, leaping chamois-like from peak to peak of his native Andes, inspires himself alike with the free mountain air and the olden love of liberty which dwelt in the bosom of every Peruvian. But to our story.

A massive palace reared its walls in the heart of the city. Its proud turrets and lofty pillars ; its velvet draperies and heaped-up cushions ; above all, the banner that flaunted from its stone gateway, proclaimed that here the Spaniard dwelt amid the enslaved people on whose neck his foot had trodden.

The twilight hour was deepening, and still the Alcade Gonzalez de Leon lay upon his cushion of velvet, listlessly noting the long smoke-wreaths that went curling upward from his fragrant cigar to the arched roof of his apartment.

Another hour passed by; his senses overpowered by the soporific perfume floating in the palace gardens through the open casement and lulled by the monotonous sound of dropping water from a small marble fountain, the noble fell asleep; and the weary slaves, seeing their master's slumber, also lapsed away into a deep slumber.

Thus neither noble nor serf heard the sound of muffled oars from the water beneath the balcony; nor saw they a lithe form spring like a gazelle up the stone balustrades, neither the dark shadow that fell across the marble floor, when, from behind the velvet hangings of the casements, he stole cautiously to the side of the slumbering Alcade.

Steadily the young hunter—for such the closely fitting hunting-sack, and the weapons about his belt, bespoke him to be—steadily he gazed on the sleeping noble, a look of concentrated hate gleaming from his dark eyes.

"Tis well," he muttered. "At length the hour is here when another accursed Spaniard shall fall beneath an Aztec's avenging hand; when one less of my sire's murderers shall hold triumphant rule over his son. And now, good steel, strike home—death to the Spaniard!"

A dagger gleamed bright in the moonlight on its way to the heart of the sleeper, when from the shade of a heavily-draped window looking out into the palace gardens, a white-robed form dashed wildly, and a piercing cry rang upon the still air, "O, do not kill my father!"

The hunter lowered his steel; for before him knelt as beautiful a flower as ever bloomed in Peru's balmy air, or was transplanted thither from distant sunny Spain; for this was the Alcade's daughter, Inez de Leon, whose dark locks made an ebon veil for her matchless form as she clung imploringly to his knees and turned a face of startling beauty upon the astonished hunter.

The awakened Alcade now sprang to his feet, for a moment dimly comprehending the danger of his situation, then hastily grasping his carbine, sprang forward with the shout:

"Ha, thou here! Die, base Indian dog! Ho, guards, to the rescue! Cut him down, slaves!" Then, seeing their hesitation, exclaimed contemptuously, "What, do ye fear one Indian?" And he dashed toward the hunter.

The Aztec quickly parried his thrust; yet finding himself unable to cope single-handed with the guard whose tread resounded through the marble gallery, he delayed but to whisper fearfully distinct to his adversary:

"We meet again, proud Alcade, but not single-handed. 'Twill be where the fight rages fiercest, where Aztecs will deal death to many Spaniards. Revenge! The Aztec hath sworn it, beware!" And before the astonished soldiers could define his purpose, with his dagger's point he severed one dark lock from the Donna Inez's floating hair, then sprang from the balcony into his canoe, and shot out like an arrow into the night.

Torches gleamed brightly in the palace gardens; the shouting of the Spanish soldiery hurrying to and fro in search of the hunter raised scores of Lima's citizens from their slumbers; but the Aztec saw not, heard not, for his canoe cut the dark waters, till, miles from the city, his footsteps gained the wooded shore.

On, on, dashed the brave hunter, through tangled forests, over deep streams and yawning chasms. The tropic sun rose and cast scorching beams down upon his head; but what cared the young Peruvian, since a fiercer fire preyed on his heart? Ay, the fires of revenge, and cold or heat it mattered not which, so he slaked that inward fire in the red blood of the haughty conqueror.

Onward still the hunter urged his good steed, pausing not till after coursing over the wide pampas, again he plunged into the depths of the wood; and then, springing from his fleet mountain courser, he entered a low cabin half hidden by festoons of rich moss that had been suffered to creep undisturbed over its entrance.

An aged Indian, one who ere the weight of many years had unnerved his arm had been chief of a mighty tribe, sat upon the hearthstone in moody silence; and scarcely seemed aware of the presence of his visitor, save that he raised his eyes from the earth at his entrance.

"Father, I have come to claim thy long promised aid, and that of thy people, for the hour has come!" exclaimed the hunter.

The old man sprang to his feet. "Ha, what sayest thou?" he gasped hoarsely, his faded eye kindling. "Is vengeance ready to be meted out to the Spaniard?"

"Even so," rejoined the young hunter. "We delay no longer. Every moment is an age of doom. Even now the Alcade's guards are scouring the mountain for me. This night blood shall flow like water through Lima's streets. And now, canst bid thy people aid me?"

"Dost doubt it, Gabriel?" was the reply. "Has not Caraco sworn death to the perfidious Spaniard! The Indian chief is bowed down with many years; the lightning has stricken the mighty forest tree, and it cannot lift its head proudly over all as was its wont, but new saplings shall spring up from the old roots. His arm is weak in the fray; but his voice is not buried under the earth, and he can yet call about him brave Aztecs, sons of kings, who shall break the tyrant's rule and drive him far beyond the eastern waves. My son, the Indian hath spoken!" And he relapsed into his former moody silence.

"It is enough!" said the hunter. "Caraco was never known to fail in the hour of flight. Gather thy people with the wind's speed, and bid them seek me at the moon's rising within the forest near the city's western walls."

And away, to gather his band and impatiently await the coming of night, sped the hunter as upon the wings of the wind.

Years before our tale commences, ere Pizarro's foot had pressed the golden strand of Peru, up the mountain sides, and scattered throughout the valleys, dwelt a peaceful people who had built there their humble cabins and subsisted on the products of the chase.

These hunters were a quiet race, and alike distinguished for their bravery and fidelity toward their chiefs. But the Spaniards came from afar, took prisoner their Inca, desecrated their fair homes, and by their grasping avarice and unholty ambition made bitter enemies of these tribes, and also of those weaker ones who dwelt on the wide-spreading pampas, and who now called on their mountain brethren for assistance.

Ever foremost in the chase was Pedro; and when the call came from his brethren on the plains, he gathered about him his band, and sped to their aid. Bravely those Peruvians fought against foreign aggression, but the Spaniards triumphed; and after a fearful slaughter on the well-contested battle plain, carried prisoners to the city some of the leading chiefs, among whom was numbered Pedro. They yielded their lives, those brave mountaineers, and the roll of the Spanish drum drowned their death struggles. So ended the life of Pedro, the father of young Gabriel the hunter.

And is it strange that he who had been reared from early boyhood by his widowed mother with the one idea of hatred to the Spaniard, who had been taught that revenge was a virtue, should have sought the Alcade's life? Is it strange that a stern satisfaction filled his mind, as he mentally pondered over the approaching conflict, or that ever and anon, young and impressible as was his tropic heart to the sight of rare female loveliness, there rose up before him a vision of the Alcade's beautiful, high-born daughter—a tress of whose raven hair his dagger point had severed to wear next his heart—as she knelt before him that night and turned his hand aside from its righteous revenge?

But not love of woman, her beauty, or tears, might stay the purpose of a rough son of the forest who had been educated in the stern creed of an Aztec's faith. So Gabriel the hunter gathered his braves about him, and gave the battle cry, "Death to the treacherous Spaniards!" and dashed away toward the city.

'Tis night again in Lima, but how different from the last. Then the spirit of peace and of beauty hovered over this fair tropic land, kissing the orange blossoms and folding the lily's snowy chalice; but to-night all the elements of strife hold high festival. The elements are in fearful commotion, thunder peals hoarsely, vivid lightnings glare incessantly, for a storm has broken in all its fury above the city.

The Alcade sits alone in his apartment, thoughtful and stern. Deep furrows mark his massive brow; time has silvered his once dark locks, yet never can he wrest from that princely form its haughty bearing, or dim the lustre of the eye that speaks conscious pride; for was he not an old Castilian grandee, and was not the tide of blood circling through his veins caught from a race of kings?

From his earliest years the Spanish noble had known no law save his own imperious will; and when sent from his own government to Peru, he had gone thither but illy prepared to hold sway over a people whom he had been taught were but a race of subtle, indolent Indians; and he had yet to learn the lesson that oppression often goads to revenge, and that many a brave Aztec heart still beat beneath the rude garb of the mountaineer.

This haughty bearing had already roused the hate of Lima's citizens; many had sworn vengeance on the Spaniard, who had pronounced the death decree of the chiefs brought captive within the city; and many the futile attempt to assassinate him in his own palace; but from none had his escape been so narrow as that of the previous evening. Now, he sat pondering some scheme to gain possession of the daring hunter, for whom all that long summer's day his soldiery's search among the mountains had been fruitless; and he muttered audibly:

"And shall this dog of an Indian escape me?"

Nay, by St. Jago, he dies ere the morrow's sun crosses the meridian!" And, consoling himself with this reflection, the noble threw himself upon his velvet couch and again sought slumber.

And the noble's daughter, Donna Inez de Leon sat alone till the evening had merged into blackest midnight, and the pinions of the storm-angel circled lower and closer over the city.

A silver lamp fed with perfumed oil shed a faint moonlike light throughout the chamber; vases crowded with the richest exotics of Peru, stood upon tables of the azure lapis-lazuli; and tropical birds of gorgeous plumage drooped low their heads and slept. It was a rare and gilded cage against whose bars the heart of the Spanish maiden fluttered; for the girl sat now in tears, unmindful of the storm that shook the city to its foundations, heeding only the distasteful decree which that day she had heard from paternal lips, that in one week the Count de Sylva would claim her as his long-promised bride.

"Nay, the virgin and the saints forbid!" cried the girl, with tearful eyes, slipping the beads of her rosary one after another over her white jewelled fingers. "Wedded to a man old enough to be my sire, a wicked, cruel man, whose nobility lies in his title alone, and whose days and nights are squandered in noisy revels. It is my father's gold he would wed, it is that he loves, not me."

And then the maiden fell to pondering (strange mischance) on the young and handsome hunter whose fresh, manly face had been revealed to her one instant the previous night in the glare cast by the approaching guards' torches.

"Ah, he was so handsome," murmured the Spanish maiden. "But the saints preserve me!"—and she devoutly crossed herself—"he is one of these poor, base Peruvians; and he would have slain my sire! But Jesu Maria, what a storm! I will to rest, and try to sleep." And after again commending herself to the blessed virgin, the girl sought her slumbers.

Fearful, ay, deadly was the affray within Lima's walls that stormy night. The cries of "To arms! death to the Indian dogs!" mingled with "Freedom for Peru! death to the Spaniards!"

The deafening yells of the Peruvians mingling with the roar of musketry, aroused the Alcade from his slumbers, and grasping his carbine he dashed wide the door.

"Ho, guards, without there; to the rescue! The Indians are upon us! This is that cursed hunter's work!" burst from his lips.

Steadily, firmly, the Indians pressed on, through deserted, rain-beaten gardens, trampling rarest plants, over marble walks, through the main entrance of the palace, and along the spacious corridor, even to the Alcade's door, headed by Gabriel. Dashing it from its heavy hinges, they burst like an avalanche upon the Spaniards.

"Strike for Castile!" shouted the noble, as the foe poured upon his men; but a wilder chorus burst from the savages as they saw their youthful leader single out the Alcade, raise aloft his weapon, and bound to his side.

"Ha, this is well!" shouted Gabriel. "Said I not, proud Spaniard, murderer of my sire, that when I met thee next 'twould be where the fight raged fiercest, and the blows fell like rain drops? Pedro shall be revenged!"

No word came from the Alcade's fearfully compressed lips; but silently they closed together for the deadly struggle. Then loudly clashed their weapons, and the ring of steel sounded out high above the din of the terrible elemental strife without. Thrust followed thrust in quick succession; and blow after blow, skilfully parried, showed that the combatants were equally matched. But at length the Alcade stumbled against a marble column and fell prone. Now Gabriel had him at his mercy, and his braves rushed forward to his bidding.

"Nay, back, my brothers!" said the young hunter, as a hundred daggers flashed athwart the gloom. "Back, he is my prize! Mine for Pedro's sake!"

"Mercy!" shrieked the despairing Spaniard, fixing his gaze imploringly on the stern white face gleaming above his own. "Mercy—my life!"

A scornful smile wreathed the hunter's well-cut lips, he essayed to raise his carbine; a hoarse laugh echoed strangely on the hushed air; when, just as his hand sought the dagger's hilt, a tress of midnight hair fell from the loosened folds of his hunter's jacket over his bosom and fluttered softly as down upon the other hand, whose iron gripe was on the prisoner's throat. A dash of red broke through the marble pallor on the hunter's cheek, the iron smile relaxed, the iron grasp was loosened, and lowering his weapon's point to the floor, he hoarsely whispered:

"Live, base Spaniard, coward; live! Away with him to the deepest dungeon cell!"

Away toward his mountain home madly dashed Gabriel, bearing in his arms across his steed, enveloped in the folds of an ample velvet cloak, a precious burden—the senseless, fainting form of the Donna Inez, whom he had rescued from the rude grasp of the mountain soldiery.

Once, only once, did he check his courser's speed, and gaze back on the distant towers of Lima, distinctly thrown in bold relief against the black sky by the glaring torches of the savages and the lurid light of burning palaces; and then he wildly laughed aloud, and shouted to the free winds revelling across the deep pampas:

"Ha! truly said I, that to-night there would be wailing within yon city's walls! Piedro, thou art beginning to be revenged!"

Again morning breaks over Peru, and O, how beautiful! The day-god guides his chariot high above the Andes' snowiest peak, bathes the city spires in golden light, and sheds a flood of burnished gold on lake and water. Clumps of palmetto trees wave lightly in the soft air; clouds of incense fragrance float upward to heaven; birds of crimson and gold flash athwart the sunshine.

But how changed the city! Where now the long columns of soldiery, who but yesternorn paced the square in front of the grand cathedral to the sound of the deep drum and beneath the waving banner of Spain? Alas! they lie low. Their red blood stains the marble floors of the noblest palaces. No longer the roll of the drum calls them forth to their morning parade; the market places are thronged with files of swarthy Indians; the proud banner of Castile has been torn from its standard and trampled beneath their feet; Peru is again free from the rule of the Spaniard!

Beneath the shade of a wide-spreading plantain sat the hunter. Seated in the door of his mountain cabin was an aged woman, Gabriel's mother; her feeble, shrivelled fingers essaying to braid up the fibrous strips of the torn palmetto leaf; and at a little remove, idly toying with the splendid crimson blossoms the hunter had thrown into a heap before her feet, stood the captive Spanish maiden, Inez de Leon.

Captive, I said; and yet there is a more dreaded captivity than that into which Gabriel had brought this child of sunny Spain—that where the heart goes not with the bribed, bought or sold hand—and this mountain retreat was comparative freedom to Inez when compared with the hateful union into which her sire had sought to force her.

Indeed it would have needed no seer to have foretold that the looks which, ever and anon the hunter cast from under his thick lashes upon the beautiful maiden, savored nothing of the revengeful sentiment he had nurtured against her father; nor was it singular that the impassioned child of the sweet southland beyond the blue seas, when, scattering her mountain flowers to the winds and kneeling at Gabriel's feet to implore her father's release in her own soft, flowing Spanish tongue, and with tears gemming her midnight eyes, she gained an affirmative answer from her moody but admiring auditor; it was not strange that her own dark eyes fell beneath the impassioned gaze of that child of nature, and love crept into the heart where gratitude already lived.

Next day, a heavy footfall resounded along the stone corridor leading to the lower dungeon in Lima's strongest prison; the clanging armor was heard; the ponderous door turned slowly on its hinges, and a soldier bearing a blazing torch gave admittance to the Alcade's cell, Gabriel the hunter. But few words passed the young Peruvian's lips.

"Alcade, choose as thou wilt: death ere the morrow's sun goes down behind yon western waters, or freedom in thy Spain alone. Thy daughter weds the hunter; this shall be Gabriel's revenge for the death of his sire. Alcade, which suits ye best?"

How futile the rage of the noble! But the conqueror and the serf had changed places; no hope now, that from the outraged Peruvian could be wrung the slightest concession; the blood of Castilian dukes must henceforth be defiled by contact with the humbler tide caught from the veins of Indian mountaineers. The haughty noble groaned aloud, and tore his gray locks with despair.

But the descendant of the dukes of Castile still clung to life—life at any sacrifice, quite as though he were moulded of commoner clay; and so, with bitterness and concentrated hate, he chose his liberty; and many suns had not set, ere a gallant ship sailed down the blue Pacific bearing away from Peru the liberated Alcade, Gonzalez de Leon.

In after years again the Christian's banner was planted, mid bloodshed and ruin, in the soil of Peru, and again the Spaniard's treacherous foot defiled the sod, and his iron hand clutched grasping at this fair land's golden treasures; again the Aztec's neck bowed to the yoke of slavery, and freedom's flickering torch went out in a long, dark, rayless night; but of this we write not now.

Our chronicle is ended; for, in the brief, golden day when Spain's red ensigns were torn from Lima's towers; when Spain's red blood dyed a defiled land; and when a rare Spanish maiden wound a wreath of orange blossoms amid the tresses of her midnight hair, and joined her hand and heart with the bold, handsome Gabriel, was consummated THE AZTEC'S REVENGE.

EYES TO THE BLIND.

BY MELVILLE A. WALKER.

EMILY BARNARD lost her father and mother when about fifteen years of age. She had not yet left school, and a sister of her mother presided over the household. Mr. Barnard had left a fine property, and Emily was sole heiress.

Twice before she was of age, her hand had been sought under circumstances which displayed to her so fully the fact that her fortune alone was the object, that she felt almost determined never to marry at all. With one of these pretended admirers, her fancy, if not her heart, had been captivated. It is so easy to love beauty! and Fred Harmon was so very handsome. But the spell was soon removed, and Emily had subsided into indifference, and almost despondency, so painfully did the real truth of the case affect her. She found that it was not herself but her broad lands which induced him to seek her; and with a scorching rebuke, which made his ears tingle for months afterwards, when Emily Barnard's name was mentioned, she dismissed him.

He had not believed her so spirited, but he did not know how terrible is the rousing of a mild temper; and he could not help acknowledging that although she was spirited, she was dignified, too. But he did not know, that when he had gone, she ran to her room, locked the door, and fell on her knees by the bedside, in an agony of tears. Relieved by these, she arose, washed away their traces, and joined Aunt Mary in the drawing-room, with her habitual calm and serene countenance, and her soft blue eyes unshadowed in their depths. Years came and went, and Emily's tranquil life was not disturbed again by the shadow of that seeming love which can darken over a woman's heart but once. In quiet intercourse with her aunt, whom she loved almost as a mother, and in deeds of earnest and active benevolence, she passed her days.

The first thing which disturbed her peaceful life was the blindness of her Aunt Mary. It had been gradually increasing for a long time, and had now become entire. With the beautiful self-devotion for which Emily had always been distinguished, she now made her aunt's comfort and happiness her first object.

While she was lying on her sofa one evening, Aunt Mary distinctly heard the wail of an infant, a sound perceptible to no other in the room. To gratify her, Emily arose and went to the door, when a quickly receding footstep was heard in the darkness, and again the low wail was heard. Taking a light, she again sought for the origin of the sound, and discovered a little child, lying, well wrapped in a blanket, on the step. She tenderly took it up and carried it into the warm room; and on unfolding the blanket, the little creature reached out its tiny arms and smiled in her face. One only thought came to Emily's mind, and that was to receive and cherish the forsaken infant. Of all things human, she had ever loved children. Her peculiarly lonely state had often pressed with weight upon her mind. She had never known the ties of brother and sister—of brother's and sister's children—and her heart had often ached with the yearning longing after kindred, which comes to those solitary ones whom God never "setteth in families." So with sweet welcoming of smiles and tears, Emily took the little child to her heart, and inwardly vowed not to forsake it.

Nothing was ever heard of the child's parents, and it became the pet and darling, not only of the household, but of all who came to visit Emily's pleasant home. She grew and flourished fair beneath the shade of the old trees which grew around that home, and at five years old, there was no lovelier child than little Mary. Emily had named her after her aunt, and the poor blind lady rejoiced in the sweet sunbeam which affection had thus brought to shine upon her darkened path. Day after day that little golden head would nestle fondly beneath the eyes which could not see its glorious curls; and hers were the little feet that ran cheerfully to supply every want, hers the hands that brought the goblet of pure water, or the cooling fruit and fragrant flowers.

Emily's heart glowed with genuine delight at every instance of affection between these two. They were all she had to lavish her own love upon; but Emily was drawing near to a new experience, one to which she had long been a stranger, for she was now past thirty, and Emily had heard no sound of love, since Fred Harmon had so rudely dispelled her young day dream.

Among those who were attracted to her house, was a gentleman whose widowed state had caused quite a sensation in the younger circles of his acquaintance. High-born and wealthy, Mr. Blake might have chosen the youngest and fairest, to replace a wife whom he had never loved, and whose loss he did not mourn. Two children, girls of ten and twelve, needed a mother's care; and yet the task seemed to promise little of comfort or pleasure to one who should undertake it. Their mother was a haughty, proud, self-willed woman, who had made life a burden to her husband, and Catherine and Julia inherited their mother's disposition.

Still, Mr. Blake was excessively fond of his daughters, and was perhaps more blind to their faults, than he had been to those of his wife.

Latterly, Mr. Blake had been more than usually attentive to Emily Barnard. Her nice sense of propriety, her native dignity, and her simple, unpretending manners, won his heart. He had married once for beauty, and the price which he paid was too severe; and the butterflies who now surrounded the handsome widower, could not draw his attention except for the passing moment. The simple goodness of Emily, so necessary in guiding and directing his wayward children, were infinitely more attractive to him than all the lures that were spread for him.

It was not altogether unexpected to Emily when Mr. Blake offered her his hand; but the struggle which it caused in her feelings was none the less severe. With everything to make her turn away from the proposal, Emily Barnard did as many others do in her situation, married to have a protector.

It was with no little surprise that Aunt Mary heard her decision. To her it seemed like the death-knell to Emily's happiness, and although she tried to set aside all selfish feelings, she could not help feeling that this marriage would separate her almost effectually from Emily.

It was arranged that her establishment should continue unbroken; and that Aunt Mary and the little girl should not be separated. They were to see her every day and enjoy every comfort which she had shared with them; for Mr. Blake had generously allowed Emily to settle her whole property upon them. It was the only condition which she made to try the strength of his attachment. He should take her without wealth, if he married her at all; and on his part there was no difficulty, for he was able to dispense with it.

Had Miss Ashton and Miss Stanton, two rival beauties, who had aspired to be Mr. Blake's wife, witnessed Emily's doubt and hesitation in accepting him, they would have wondered much; and many were the jeers passed upon her age and want of beauty when it was known that she had accepted him. She married him; and if tears are a bad omen in a wedding, Aunt Mary shed enough to drown Emily's prospects of happiness forever.

Catherine and Julia were on a visit at their mother's home, and their father would not recall them till they were ready to come back willingly. They had been informed of his intentions, and expressed only a sullen acquiescence; which had changed to absolute dislike of his marriage, after talking it over with their mother's relations.

When at length they returned home, they were prepared to meet Emily with a sullen indifference which pained her sensitive heart most deeply. She tried to be kind to them, but her advances were rudely repulsed, and Emily was thrown back upon her own heart for sympathy, for to Aunt Mary she never complained. She had chosen her lot, and she would bear it as patiently as she might. Little Mary was still her solace and comfort, except that she could not be constantly in her presence as before. Even Mr. Blake was a little jealous of the child's claim upon her time, and his daughters lost no opportunity of mortifying and annoying her; especially on the subject of her being a foundling. The child's tender feelings were so often hurt at this, that Emily was at length obliged to content herself without Mary's daily visit.

Catherine Blake noticed this, and angry at being deprived of her usual sport, she one day uttered a hint to her sister, upon the subject of Mary's birth, which Emily accidentally heard when she was entering the room. Pale and faint, she leaned against the door, and a cry of anguish came from her lips. Half-ashamed, Catherine blushed at her own words, but proud and arrogant as she was, she refrained from apology or excuse, and Emily, feeling that her own dignity required one, retired.

Mr. Blake found her in an agony of tears, of which he demanded an explanation, which she unwillingly gave him. Then followed a scene between him and his daughters, and it ended in their attempting to justify themselves by stating that common report authorized them. Mr. Blake was struck dumb at this bare-faced assertion; and again he went to Emily's room. This time he did not try to soothe her as before and Emily, sensitive and delicate as she was, was prostrated before this new blow.

An imperative message from Aunt Mary to come to her immediately, drew her away, and begging her husband to accompany her, she went to the home she could truly wish she had never left.

Arriving at Aunt Mary's room, she saw a lady whose face she did not recognize, sitting by the side of the old lady, holding her withered hand, while tears were dropping fast from the sightless eyes. Little Mary was clinging fast to her old friend, but ran to meet Emily, when she saw her.

"As you have done by my child," said the stranger, "even so may it be returned to you a thousand fold. I am the mother of the infant which you took to your heart six years ago; and her father and my husband is the son of this poor blind lady. He waits for her blessing; if indeed she can overlook these long years of seeming neglect. Sixteen years, a long time indeed, but O, forgive, forgive him!" And the lady wound her arms around her who, for sixteen years, had wept the forgetfulness of her only son. Yes, Aunt Mary had had other trials than blindness; and now—she would never look again upon that face, but she should hear his voice and feel his hand; and this gentle lady would not take away little Mary.

All this she sobbed out at intervals, and then a manly form was seen to go softly up to her chair, and his voice whispered "mother!" But she had known him long before he found utterance, and clasping him to her heart, she murmured, "My son, my son, lost and found! lost and found!"

Sitting afterwards, with his mother's hand holding fast by his own, he recounted his experiences since he had left his home. Mr. Blake and Emily sat by, speechless from emotions of various natures. By their father's express command, Catherine and Julia formed part of the circle, and little Mary pressed close to her grandmother, scarcely willing yet to acknowledge her newly found parents.

Charles Eastford had been somewhat wild in his younger days, and had sent many a pang to the heart of his widowed parent; none perhaps more severe than when he left her without a single farewell, and tried his fortunes upon the ocean. Uncertain of his fate, and not wishing to talk of him to strangers, she had agreed with Emily, when she first came to reside with her, never to mention him, unless some tidings of him should reach them. Thus no one knew that Aunt Mary ever had a son, and the shade of grief that sometimes came over her brow was never attributed to the right cause.

Charles had secretly married a young girl who had escaped from a convent, and as her family were wealthy and powerful, and offered large rewards for her appearance, they were obliged to fly fast and far from their pursuit. Fearing this rapid flight for their child, Charles sent it by one whom he could trust, to take it to his mother, of whose removal to Emily's house he had just heard by accident. That no questions need be asked, he instructed the man who left it at the door not to make anything known, but to watch round for several days, to find if the child was taken care of. He ascertained that this was the case, and Charles was duly informed of the fact. From time to time he heard of little Mary's welfare; but the news of Emily's marriage hastened his determination to visit her, and not daring to trust his own feelings to meet his mother, he had sent the gentle creature he had married to pave the way for his forgiveness and return.—How deeply grateful was Emily's heart at this unlooked-for result. How happy looked her husband, when he turned to his daughters and bade them ask her pardon for their injustice to her, who by the simple act of goodness to the forsaken child had made the happiness of so many. Proud and self-willed as they were, they came nobly forward to acknowledge their fault, and promised future reparation for all they had made Emily suffer.

To install her cousins in her old home, and to make her husband's home happy, was the height of Emily's ambition. Not even the temper of Kate and Julia could long withstand her influence, and the two families lived in peace and love. Never had Mr. Blake seemed so happy as now; and Emily rejoiced that she had so far won upon his children, as to make them love and respect her. When added years and altered circumstances brought them new experiences, they looked back to their old injustice with grief and shame; but their gentle mother-in-law forgave them, and showered kindnesses unnumbered on them and their children.

Four or five years afterwards, Mary Ashton and Lucy Stanton met Emily in the street. Devoted as Emily was to her household, she seldom walked out, lest Aunt Mary should need her in her absence; and now the two families were under one roof, Catherine and Julia being married.

"How well Emily Barnard wears!" exclaimed Miss Seaton. "Do you remember when she was married, what bitter things we both said in regard to her age?"

"I do," said her friend, "and now we look older than she does. I think some of our set did that woman gross injustice; and I know that Fred Harmon was mean enough to circulate one story against her; and I feel condemned for not exposing him for his share in it. And see, Mary, she is going to pass him this moment. Will she notice him, now he degrades himself by drinking and gaming as they say he does?"

Emily did bow to the shabby, miserable-looking man, who looked as if he would sink with shame, at the exposure of his wretchedness. He looked after her with an expression on his face, as if he had suddenly made some great resolve, and three months afterwards, Miss Stanton met him again, so altered in person and demeanor that she hardly knew him. She learned that Emily had induced her husband to attempt his reformation; and that now Fred Harmon had become restored to society. Who can appreciate fully, the influence of a noble, right-minded woman, like Emily Barnard?

Curious Matters.

A diabolical young Scoundrel.

An extraordinary affair is related in a Silesian journal. Five little children belonging to two tradesmen of Bolkenhahn, in that country, went a few weeks ago, to play in a garden, and were joined by a boy of eleven, who has always been noted for perversity of disposition. After a while their parents sought for them, but found that they had disappeared. After looking a long while they found them lying piled one on another in a wooden case in the garden; four were dead, and the fifth, though still breathing, died shortly after. The lad referred to was then questioned, and he calmly related the astounding fact that he had persuaded the children to enter the case in play—had then slammed down the lid, and seated himself on it—remaining there for three-quarters of an hour listening to their cries and groans; he then raised the lid to see if they were dead, and finding that they were not so, had fastened it down by a hasp—after which he had gone away to fly his kite! This little monster has been arrested.

Capture of a Sea Devil.

The Inverness Observer says: Mr. Leask, of Islay, caught a sea monster the other day, which was found to be what ichthyologists describe as the sea devil. Its peculiar formation is anything but captivating. It is flat, four feet eight inches in length, two feet six inches in breadth; its mouth, in which there is a single row of cuneated sharp teeth, measures twelve inches and a half, horizontal, and when the jaws are fully opened, measures betwixt the lower and upper, sixteen and three-quarter inches; on its belly, near the lower part of the head, are two hands, having five fingers on each, distinctly exhibited, and webbed. It has also two anterior fins, and two lateral bags of great capacity, with one of the triangular form on the belly. It weighs about eighty pounds. It is altogether a formidable and strange looking fish, and the name by which it is known is not inappropriate.

Sagacity of a Pony.

A pony, at Penrith Steam Mills, England, was lately seen to perform a most sagacious feat. It happened that a servant went to inspect some sheep in a field adjoining Stockbridge Mill, in which the pony was grazing; he had occasion to secure one, and tie its legs until his return; the pony witnessing this performance, very sensibly waited till the man was gone; when it was seen to march in quick pace to the sheep, walk several times around it indicating much curiosity, and showed its sympathy thus: by scraping the ground with its fore feet, and licking the sheep with its tongue; but "Charlie's" endeavors were not long ineffectual, he got the rope firm in his teeth, shook it, and threw up his head; the sheep soon ran off, and Charlie, in triumphant manner, galloped round the field with the rope in his mouth.

Splendid Specimens of Persian Art.

The present Shah of Persia, who is a great patron of Oriental calligraphy and water colors, is engaged on the execution of a work, unique in its kind. It is a copy of the 'Arabian Nights' Entertainments, written in the most gorgeous style of Oriental calligraphy, to which are added some tales, wanting in the original. A society of native painters have also been engaged on this work, for the last seven years, at Teheran, the cost of which amounts already to 800,000 francs.

Curious Coincidences.

The following are some remarkable chronological coincidences suggested by the tidings of the storming of Delhi, on the 14th of September, and the occupation of the city on the 20th. The landing of the allies in the Crimea took place on the 14th of September, 1854, and the battle of the Alma was fought on the 20th. On the 14th of September, 1812, Napoleon entered Moscow. On the 20th of September, 1792, was fought the battle of Valmy, the first and most important victory of the French Revolution. The battle of Marathon was fought on the 6th of Boedremion, B. C. 490, answering to the 8th of September of the Julian calendar. The day of Alma was, consequently the Julian anniversary of Marathon, the 20th N. S. in this century being the 8th O. S. as still used by the Russians. The battle of Salamis took place, according to the same mode of calculation, 20th of September, B. C. 490.

Potatoes.

Potatoes were first brought to Europe in 1583. After fifty-nine years the potato rot broke out, and after eighty years there was no seed fit for planting to be obtained. In 1796 the Spaniards brought good seed from Peru, which gave healthy tubers for forty-five years. In 1779 the rot so far destroyed the potatoes that no good seed was obtained. In 1797 the English brought new seed to Europe, but it was not until 1802—3 that seed generally spread throughout the continent, and was in general use. Fifty years later the rot again appeared, and decreased in 1856. From this it appears that potatoes are liable to suffer from this disease about every fifty years. If this be so, would it not be important that new seed should be imported from the native soil of the potato?

Treasure Trove.

A workman called in to cure a smoky chimney in an old house in the Rue des Carmes, Paris, had occasion to examine a little closet which had not been opened for years, and he found in a corner nine heavy bags. On examining them, to his astonishment, he found them filled with silver coin with the effigies of Louis XV. and Louis XVI., the value of the contents of each bag being between 7000 and 8000 francs. Two of the bags bore the inscription "The Bishop of Glendev," four that of "M. Ducros, vicar of St. Jacques-du-Haut-Pas," and the others had none. The money will be shared equally between the finder and the party being the owner of the house, namely, the Municipality of Paris.

An Odd Fellow.

A post-horse master died in 1757, and left a closed box, with instructions that a century was to elapse before it was opened. In order to secure compliance with his wishes, he stated expressly in his will that the contents of the box were of no value, but would be regarded as curiosities in a century. A few days back the box was opened, and it was found to contain a lady's bonnet, a purse, some playbills, placards, and engravings, some coins, a tinder-box, and other objects in use a century ago.

Extraordinary Lamb.

There is a man named Joseph Northridge, living at Ordsall, in the possession of a singular species of a lamb, having only one head and two perfect bodies and eight legs. The most singular part of it is that the inner fore-most legs, instead of hanging down, are turned upwards, giving it the appearance of horns.

Liquid Stone.

In the Scientific American, the inventor of the process of preparing liquified quarts, and precipitating any gold which it may contain, has published a correct statement. By this mode of dissolving quarts, he says the solution of one ton of quarts in 800 gallons of water is perfect in one hour. The solvent used is common salt, the chlorine being first set free in a process of treating gold-bearing pyrites, etc. The principle in this particular patent is the introduction of highly-heated steam, through a hollow shaft, to the bottom of the digester, while the escape steam, above a certain pressure, is rapidly condensed. A fifteen-horse power engine carries the shaft to five digesters or boilers, besides the pestle-mill. In this way twenty-five tons of quarts are dissolved daily, making 7500 gallons of liquid stone, besides taking all the gold.

Romantic Streak of Fortune.

The Palmer Journal says that Dea. Joseph Miller of Ludlow has fallen heir to $50,000 by the decease of a distant relative in New Orleans. The grandfather of the testator, George Miller of West Springfield, was taken prisoner by the Indians in 1765, and subsequently became chief of a tribe in Western New York. He afterwards visited Boston with a party of his warriors, for the purpose of showing them the strength of the country, but refused to recognize his brothers and sisters, who met him at West Springfield and Ludlow and attempted to induce him to remain with them. Dea. Miller of Ludlow is a grandson of one of these brothers, and the grandson of the Indian chief has thus recognized him as the inheritor of the old family homestead.

Sad Mistake.

Major Beale, says the Augusta (Ga.) Constitutionalist, has just returned from his European tour, but his fellow townsmen are astonished and horrified at his altered appearance. When in Paris he challenged a French colonel, and the weapons being swords, at the first stroke the major's nose was severed close to his face. Hastily picking up and replacing the organ, he tied his handkerchief over it. After leaving on the bandage for eleven days he removed it, when to his consternation he found that he had placed it wrong side up, and it was now healed. Although it looks ugly, he finds it very convenient for taking snuff.

Antiquarian Treasures.

Vice-Admiral Sir Maurice Berkeley has had a "clearing-out sale" of some of the antiquarian lumber of Berkley Castle, England. The bed on which Edward II. is said to have been murdered fell into the hands of a Wotten-under-Edge broker for 17s. 6d.; an old piano was knocked down for 2s. 3d.; and the stuffed birds, which were ranged in the chapel, and which the late earl spent hundreds in collecting, could hardly be sold at any price.

Curious Calculation.

If we would obtain any idea of the water which the sea contains, let us suppose a common and general depth for the ocean; by computing it at only two hundred fathoms, or the tenth part of a mile, we shall see that there is sufficient water to cover the whole globe to the height of 503 feet; and if we were to reduce this to one mass, we should find that it would form a globe of more than sixty thousand miles in diameter.

The rival Misers.

There died lately at Bruyeres, near Loan (Aisne), France, aged 74, a wealthy old woman who was originally a farm-servant. She married a laborer in the neighborhood. Their joint savings amounted to 3000 francs. They took a small farm, on which they lived for forty-five years, and had the reputation in the country of possessing some money. They both died about the same time, aged 74; and on their decease pieces of gold were found in almost every nook of the house. A nephew of theirs, who inherits their property, and who used sometimes to visit them, states that they were in the habit of robbing each other, and then hiding their money in various parts of the house. In the garret, under the thatch, in corners of cupboards, in every place, in fact, where money could be concealed, sums were found after their death. The nephew found upwards of 40,000 francs in gold and silver, and does not despair of finding still more. How they have amassed so much money with their apparently small means, has excited general surprise.

Nineteen Months without Food.

We learn from the Albany Times that Mrs. Hayes, of the town of Day, Saratoga county, N. Y., who had lived nineteen months without food or drink, died a short time ago. She remained insensible for fifteen months of the period, and up to a few days of her death, when she seemed to revive, and spoke occasionally. After her death, her body was opened and a snake five feet long and half an inch thick was taken from the stomach! It was alive when removed, but died soon after. The case is a very remarkable one, and it is to be regretted that it was not subjected to scientific examination.

Floral Curiosity.

At the recent exhibition of the Cincinnati Horticultural Society, Mr. Harling exhibited from Mr. Longworth's collection a magnificent specimen of the Crinum Amabile in full bloom. It belongs to the family of the Lily; is a native of the intertropical regions of the valley of the Amazon; and the present splendid plant indicates the most judicious care and splendid cultivation on the part of the florist, under whose hands it had come to its present remarkable beauty of bloom and vigor of growth.

The Buskin and Sock.

The word buskin is the translation of the Greek and Latin word Cothurnus, which signifies a high-heeled boot or shoe, used by the Greek and Roman tragic actors to give an appearance of elevation to their stature, in conjunction with the mask and other stage properties. Cothurnus, in Latin, is used in contradistinction to Soccus, the flat-soled shoe, worn by comedians. Hence, in English authors, the words buskin and sock are often used for the tragic and comic drama.

Singular Accident to a Horse.

Two horses belonging to Mr. George Smith, of Whittinsville, were standing together a few days since, and one of them began to lap the other with his tongue, when number two caught his mate's tongue in his mouth, and tore it out by the roots. It of course became necessary to kill the tongueless horse.

Remarkable Dinner.

A curious dinner took place a few days ago at Klean's Hotel, in Finsbury Square, London. Everything on the table, the meat, fish, vegetables, fruits, and edibles of all kinds, had been kept for four years. They had been hermetically sealed under a process.

The Florist.

Who does not love a flower?
Its hues are taken from the light
Which summer suns fling pure and bright,
In scattered and prismatic hues,
That smile and shine in dropping dews;
Its fragrance from the sweetest air,
Its form from all that's light and fair:
Who does not love a flower?

Removing large Trees.

Care should be taken to prepare the roots by cutting a trench around the tree for a year or two before removal, and pruning off the roots which project into it. The removal should be conducted with great care; either a large ball of earth should be removed with the tree, or the roots spread out carefully at full length when the tree is replanted. Some persons, before removing a tree, mark which side stood to the south, in order to replant them with the same side towards the sun; this is sometimes done with young trees from a nursery. Some persons think the change hurtful, others that it is beneficial—which is best is still a disputed question.

Dolichos—Leguminosae.

Climbing annual and perennial plants from the East and West Indies, generally with purple or yellow pea-shaped flowers. The pods and seeds are eatable, and in some cases the roots. Soy is made from the seeds of the East India species. They thrive well in a green-house. The D. Don, Egyptian Bean, has splendid dark purple flowers, and will grow well in the open air.

Xylaphylla.

Very curious shrubs, which produce their flowers on the margin of their leaves. They are mostly natives of Jamaica, and require a stove in England. The flowers are generally greenish, but the X. montana or Seaside Laurel bears bright yellow flowers in great profusion. They are generally grown in sandy peat.

Hibbertia.

Trailing shrubs, with large yellow flowers, natives of New Holland. They require green-house heat. They are very elegant and graceful. They should be grown in a mixture of sandy loam and peat, and they are propagated by cuttings.

Eugenia.

Rose Apple. Handsome shrubs, grown as fruit trees in the East Indies, which produce freely flowers in a green-house. They should be grown in a mixture of two-thirds sandy loam and one-third peat, and are propagated by cuttings from the ripe wood, which strike freely.

Martagon Idly.

Those lilies which have the segments of the perianth so completely turned back. In England, in the midland counties, these flowers are called "Turn-again-gentlemen."

Picotee.

A kind of Carnation, with a narrow, dark-colored margin to the petals, or with the petals covered with small brown or purple dots.

Green-house Plants.

There are two very useful plants, of which a half a dozen each add greatly to the beauty of the green-house all winter, or may be made to do so by a little management. They are the Primula sinensis, or China Primrose, and the Cineraria, both of which may be brought into bloom by the beginning of winter. Also to every lady's collection should be added the beautiful and fragrant Cape Jasmine. The leaves of the Cape Jasmine, Gardenia, are dark green and glossy, and the blossoms large and white, and very fragrant. The soil should be a mixture of peat and loam. It is propagated by cuttings stuck in sand, under glass, with bottom heat.

Lycopodium.

Club-moss. A very curious kind of moss, common in Europe and America, some kinds very ornamental. The L-helicticum is very handsome, and well worth cherishing in green-houses. It should be grown in peat and loam, and allowed an abundance of water and not much sun; that is, not allowed to stand continually in the bright sun.

Stevia.

Mexican perennials, with tufts of very pretty white or pinkish flowers, which should be grown in sandy peat, and require a little protection during the winter. It is a very pretty plant for filling a bed in a geometric flower-garden, from its compact habit of growth, and the abundance of its flowers.

Beaumuria.

A very pretty little shrub, with fleshy leaves and bright purple flowers, very suitable for rock-work. It should be grown in peat and loam, or in heath mould, in rather a dry situation; as it is very liable to damp off if grown in the shade. Flowers abundantly.

Hakea.

Australian shrubs, with flowers somewhat resembling those of the Jarilla, which are frequently very sweet-scented. The plants are generally kept in the green-house; should be grown in sandy loam, and never suffered to be either too wet or too dry.

Baptisia.

Herbaceous pea-flowers plants, of vigorous growth and elegant appearance. They may be grown in the open air in any common garden soil, and propagated by division of the roots.

Koniga—Crucifera.

Sweet Alyssum. A pretty little annual, with white sweet-scented flowers, often used as an edging plant to beds and borders. It only requires sowing in open ground in March.

Conanthera.

Chilian bulbs, requiring the green-house; useful for their small stature, which seldom exceeds six inches, and produces beautiful blue flowers in March.

Platystigma.

A very curious little plant, with petals alternately white and yellow.

Triptillon.

Chilian annuals, which are hardy in Britain, and worth growing for their curious feathery seeds.

Tulips.

The flower of a first rate tulip should be large, and composed of six petals—these proceeding a little horizontally at first, and then turning upward,—forming almost a perfect cup, with a round bottom, rather widest at the top. The three exterior petals should be rather larger than the interior ones, and broader at the base, all of them having perfectly entire edges, free from notch or serrature, and the top of each being broad and well rounded; the ground color of the flower at the bottom of the cup should be clear white or yellow, and the various rich-colored stripes, which are the principal ornament of a fine tulip, should be regular, bold, and distinct on the margin, terminating in fine broken points, elegantly feathered or pencilled. The centre of each petal should contain one or more bold blotches or stripes, intermixed with small portions of the original or breeder color, abruptly broken into many irregular obtuse points.

The Holly-tree.

The American, like the European holly, which it closely resembles, is a handsome, low tree, whose scarlet berries and green leaves, bright throughout the winter, make it a pleasing garden ornament. It is of slow growth, however, and very difficult to transplant. When transplanted, they should be protected for a while from the heat of the sun. The best time for transplanting is early in the spring, before the plant has begun to shoot. The silver and gold-edged varieties are very beautiful.

The Narcissus.

Grown in pots, it well deserves a place in every sun-shiny parlor window. The varieties of this plant, consisting merely of the different shades of two colors only, yellow and white, in single and double central flowers, offer much less diversity than other bulbs of similar rank. Still, they have their steady admirers, attracted by their graceful habit, the ease with which they are brought forward, and even by their powerful odor.

Sutherlandia.

A beautiful pea-flowered shrub, with scarlet flowers, formerly called Colutea frutescens; a native of the Cape of Good Hope, which here is only half-hardy and should be grown in sandy loam. It is a plant well worth the care which it needs, as the blossoms are of a beautiful bright scarlet, and the leaf a handsome dark green.

Potentilla.

The potentillas are of various shades of red, or deep blood red, crimson, rosy crimson, orange, scarlet, salmon color and bluish; they are low plants, and grow like the strawberry, but without runners, producing a profusion of flowers in July, August and September.

Japan Lilies.

These flowers are white, crimson-spotted, or spotted white and red. They are the most beautiful of all lilies, hardy and blooming in the open air, during the months of August and September.

American Cowslips.

These are pretty, small plants, with flower-stems about a foot high, bearing a cluster of very singular and pretty flowers, either purple or white in May and June.

Trifoliata Gillenia.

The three-leaved gillenia is a small plant with red and white flowers, white inside and red without, blossoming in August and September.

Hyacinths.

Hyacinths grown in pots are especial favorites, and are elegant parlor ornaments in winter. In an ordinary garden-pot of sufficient depth—not less than ten or eleven inches—a clump or knot of hyacinths of different colors may be grown. There is a good number to constitute these bouquets, and the permutations and combinations that may be worked out in this way with the different colors of white, bluish, pink, pale-yellow, red, porcelain-blue, deep-blue, violet, and dark purple, afford a varied scope for the exercise of one's taste.

Pelargoniums.

The number of varieties of this plant, considerably exceeds a thousand, though many of these doubtless, so closely resemble each other, as scarcely to be distinguished. The colors are generally brilliant; in some, a single shade predominates, while others are variously blotched, striped and shaded in a unique manner. The whole family are generally kept in pots the year round, but where it can be avoided, this is injudicious.

Strelitzia.

Magnificent plants, with large, long leaves, and very large and singular purple and orange flowers. They will flower in a green-house or room, and require a light sandy loam. They are very difficult to propagate, but sometimes send up suckers and sometimes ripen seeds.

Rasselia.

A very elegant stove plant, with slender, rush-like branches, and scarlet, tube-like flowers. It should be grown in a rich, light soil, and abundantly supplied with water while in a growing state. It is propagated by cuttings, stuck under glass, with bottom heat.

Tournefortia.

Hot-house and green-house shrubs, and hardy and half hardy perennials, natives of South America. The blossoms are very fragrant, but have no great beauty. The half-hardy perennial resembles in its blossom the bellotrope, but has no fragrance.

Etiolated.

This is a term meaning drawn up, with weak and slender stems—a consequence which in hardy plants results from want of thinning out in proper time, and in green-house plants from being kept in too small pots and too far from the light.

Jaquima.

West Indian trees and shrubs, with showy flowers, requiring a stove in this climate. They should be grown in sand and loam, and are propagated by cuttings.

Valeriana.

Perennials plants, mostly natives of Europe, which will grow in any common garden-soil. The blossoms are pinkish and slightly fragrant.

Physostegia.

A beautiful plant, with pale purple flowers, which only requires the usual treatment of hardy perennials. There is one species with pale pink flowers.

Victoria Tricolor Paeony.

The outer petals are pale rose mottled with pink, centre ones yellowish white, with a few red marks, very large and full.

The Housewife.

Mead.

This favorite beverage, that for centuries was the chief libation of northern nations, is made by dissolving one part of honey in three of boiling water, flavoring it with spices, and adding a portion of ground malt, and a piece of toast steeped in yeast, and allowing the whole to ferment. It was sometimes flavored with primrose blossoms, which, by the way, is a little plant that does not grow this side of the Atlantic.

Simple Bread Panada.

Put a quantity of grated stale bread into enough water to form a moderately thick pulp; cover it up and let it soak for an hour, then beat it up with two tablespoonsful of milk, and a small portion of refined sugar, and boil the whole for ten minutes, stirring all the time. This may be eaten by the sick, laboring under any disease in which abstinence is not strictly enjoined.

Delicate Cake.

Stir to a cream, a pound of powdered white sugar, seven ounces of butter; then add the white of sixteen eggs, beaten to a stiff froth, half a nutmeg, or a teaspoonful of rose-water, or lemon; stir in gradually, a pound of sifted flour; bake the cake immediately; the yolks can be used for custards.

To make Sandwiches.

Rub one tablespoonful of mustard flour into half a pound of sweet butter; spread this mixture upon thin slices of bread; from a boiled ham cut very thin slices, and place a thin slice of ham between two slices of the bread as above, cut the sandwiches in a convenient form, and serve.

Chapped Hands.

Take two ounces of glycerine, and one ounce of rose-water, mix, and rub your hands well with it before retiring to rest. It is pleasant, agreeable, and cleanly, and its effects are truly wonderful; indeed, whatever business a party may be engaged in, it will not fail to effect a cure.

Let this simmer slowly for half an hour, then add twenty drops of Ipecacuanha wine, stir it well into the syrup, and when cool bottle it. A teaspoonful may be taken occasionally when the cough is troublesome.

How to keep Eggs fresh.

Be sure to have the eggs fresh; put two or three dozen in a colander, pour boiling water over them, and as soon as they are dry, roll each one in a paper, as lemons are put up, and stand them on the small end. I kept eggs last winter this way, without freezing, in the cellar-way, when everything in the cellar froze solid. I have those now that I put down in July, as fresh as new ones. To be kept in a cool, dry place.

Mucilage of Sago.

To make sago into a proper mucilage for the sick, an ounce or a tablespoonful of it should be steeped in a pint of water, in a pan placed on the hob for two hours, and then boiled for fifteen minutes, stirring assiduously during the boiling. The mucilage may be sweetened with sugar, and flavored with lemon-juice, or milk may be added to it, according to circumstances.

Sago Pudding.

Wash a teaspoonful of sago; put it in your pudding-dish, and pour on a quart of boiling water, stirring all the time; put in a little salt and a tablespoonful of sugar; The longer it stands thus, before baking, the better. Bake slowly an hour. Eaten with sugar and butter stirred together.

Making Vinegar.

Fill a large glass bottle with weak tea, which may be what is left after drinking. Add a small quantity of sugar or molasses, and set them in a warm place, say in a window where the sun shines. In a fortnight it will be fit for use, and is as good as cider vinegar.

To clean Riding-Habits.

Take a piece of woolen cloth, dip it in either spirits of wine or ammonia, and rub the marks, and they will at once disappear. This application will do to remove any grease marks. The spirits of wine are the most agreeable to use.

An excellent Stew.

Slices of cold beef or mutton, or of any other kind of meat, dredged with a little flour, pepper and salt, must be placed in the stewpan, a small onion, some potatoes, carrots and turnips, all previously half boiled and cut in slices, a cup of broth or gravy, and a little water to cover the whole; this must stew gently till the meat is tender. It may be greatly improved by a spoonful of mushroom ketchup or Worcester sauce.

Mutton Ham.

Take a leg of mutton of about seven pounds, shape like a ham, and hang two days. Take six ounces of coarse sugar, an ounce of saltpetre, four ounces of bay, and three ounces of common salt. Mix and rub them well into the ham, lay it in a tub, with the skin downwards, and rub every day for a fortnight; then have it smoked, or hung in wood smoke for a week. It is excellent cut in rashers and broiled.

Fricassee of cold roast Beef.

For a Cough.

An excellent remedy for a cough caused by a common cold, is as follows: take half a pint of sharp vinegar, place in it an egg without being broken, allow it to remain forty-eight hours, when it will be found that the shell has been completely dissolved by the acid; then break up the egg in the vinegar, add half a pint of honey, which being well mixed, will be ready for use. Take a spoonful for a dose several times a day. It is said that it never has failed to produce relief.

Save the Soot.

This, though generally thrown into the street and wasted, is one of the best manures. It is extensively used in England, and when only fifteen or twenty bushels are applied to the acre, it induces the most luxuriant crops of wheat, and other grains. It contains in small compass, almost all the ingredients of the coal or wood used for fuel.

Mucilage of Rice.

Take one ounce of good Carolina rice, and having washed it, steep it for three hours in a quart of tepid soft water in a pan placed upon the hob, then boil the whole slowly for another hour, and strain through a sieve.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

DEATH'S HARVESTINGS.

"Death loves a shining mark," and the grim monster has recently stricken down four persons of the highest distinction in Europe—Gen. Sir Henry Havelock, an English hero, of late renowned, whose laurels reaped in the Indian war were green upon his brow; Radetzky, the Austrian marshal, who was almost a century old, who had fought Napoleon in Italy and Germany, and was the faithful servant of imperial despotism in crushing out continental liberty; Redschid Pacha, the ablest man in the Ottoman empire, the favorite and true friend of the sultan, Abdul Medjid Khan; and last not least, Rachel, the tragic muse of France. The old Austrian field-marshal and the young French actress (for Rachel was only thirty-seven) died on the same day. A few days before her death, the faded, failing woman, caused her jewels, of which she possessed a valuable collection, together with some of her richest dresses, to be brought and spread out before her on the bed. She examined them one by one, and then murmured with a sigh, "Faut-il donc quitter tout (Must I leave them all)?" Yes, all! nothing of the gauds of earth can follow the departing spirit. The wealthy actress in the hour of her death is no better than the ragged ballad singer of the French cafes. Rachel died true to the faith of her fathers—a Jewess—though the church of Rome had long and honorably struggled to bring this lost sheep into the fold of St. Peter.

NEWS FOR TOPERS.—The city of New York alone sells three times as many "pure, imported brandies," and four times as many "pure, imported wines," annually, as all the wine and brandy producing countries export. Somebody, it is clear, drinks a spurious article.

STARTLING.—A correspondent of the New York Courier says the ladies are coming out without hoops, bustle, wadding or anything else!

INUTILITY OF GRIEF.—One hundred hours of vexation, says the Italian proverb, will not pay a farthing of debt.

REAL CAPITAL.—The best capital to begin life on is a capital wife.

SCOTCH SHREWDSNESS.

In the Letters from the Highlands, written about 1720 by one of General Wade's engineers, there occurs a good practical joke with respect to the tailors of Inverness. To prevent cabbaging, an ingenious process was adopted: "I shall give you a notable instance of precaution used by some of the men against the tailor's purloining. This is, to buy everything that goes to the making of a suit of clothes, even to the stay-tape and thread; and when they are to be delivered out, they are altogether weighed before the tailor's face. And when he brings home the suit, it is again put into the scale, with the shreds of every sort, and it is expected that the whole shall answer the original weight."

WORTH THINKING OF.—Many of our readers and subscribers have quite a collection of magazines, sheet music, pamphlets, and the like, lying about their rooms in most unavailable form. Now to double their value, to preserve them, and to make them convenient for use and ornamental to your apartments, you have only to place them together, send to our office by express, or hand them in personally, and they will be bound up in any desired style, at the lowest rates, and returned to you in one week. A valuable collection of books is accumulated in a little while by this means at an extremely trifling cost.

"MA CONSCIENCE!"—The stationery used in the public departments of England, last year, amounted to nearly two millions of dollars. That ought to buy red tape enough to go several times round the world.

INTERESTING QUESTION.—The Evening Gazette suggests a question for a debating society: "If mead was an invention of the Medes, was soda got up by the Persians?"

POSTAGE STAMPS.—The number of postage stamps used last year, was 168,494,540, the value of which was $4,649,975 25.

A LEAGUE.—The entire police corps of Petersburg, Va., have joined the Sons of Temperance.

CHURCH ORGANS.

The organ is of such great antiquity, that neither the time nor place of invention, nor the name of the inventor is identified; but that they were used by the Greeks, and from them borrowed by the Latins, is generally conceded. St. Jerome describes one that could be heard a mile off, and says there was an organ at Jerusalem which could be heard at the Mount of Olives. Organs are affirmed to have been first introduced into France in the reign of Louis I., A. D. 815, and the construction and use of them taught by an Italian priest, who learned the art at Constantinople. By some, however, the introduction into that country is carried as far back as Charlemagne, and by others still further.

The earliest mention of an organ in the northern histories is in the annals of the year 757, when the emperor Constantine, surnamed Copronymus, sent to Pepin of France, among other rich presents, a "musical machine," which the French writers describe to have been composed of "pipes and large tubes of tin," and to have imitated sometimes the "roaring of thunder," and at others the "warbling of a flute."

Bellarmino alleges that organs were first used in churches about 660. According to Bingham, they were not used till after the time of Thomas Aquinas, about A. D. 1250. Gervas, the monk of Canterbury, who flourished about 1200, says they were in use about a hundred years before his time. If his authority be good, it would countenance a general opinion that organs were common in the churches of Italy, Germany and England, about the seventh century.

HIDES AND LEATHER.—There is invested in the hide and leather business in Philadelphia a capital of not less than two millions of dollars; and in the manufacture of morocco and sheep skins at least five hundred thousand dollars. Many a cobbler invests his little and in this material.

A SPLENDID TEMPLE.—The cathedral of Berlin, the construction of which is to be shortly resumed, will cost, it is estimated, at least five millions of thalers. The steeple will be higher than the cupola of St. Peter's, at Rome.

A SWEET ITEM.—It is stated in the New Orleans Crescent that the sugar crop of Louisiana for 1857 was from 225,000 to 250,000 hhd., against about 75,000 hhd. in 1856.

TRUE.—A diligent man always finds leisure to do what he has a mind to—a lazy one, never.

DYING OF FRIGHT.

Brantome relates that the Duchess of Angoulême, in the 16th century, being awakened during the night, she was surprised at an extraordinary brightness which illuminated her chamber. Apprehending it to be the fire, she reprimanded her women for having made so large a one; but they assured her it was caused by the moon. The duchess ordered her curtains to be withdrawn, and discovered this unusual light to proceed from a comet. "Ah!" she exclaimed, "this is a phenomenon which appears not to persons of common condition. Shut the window: it is a comet which announces my departure; I must prepare for death." The following morning she sent for her confessor in the certainty of an approaching dissolution. The physicians assured her the apprehensions were ill-founded and premature. "If I had not," she replied, "seen the signal for death, I could not believe it, for I do not feel myself exhausted or particularly ill." On the third day after this event, she expired, the victim of terror. Long after this period all appearances of the celestial bodies, not perfectly comprehended by the multitude, were supposed to indicate the deaths of sovereigns, or revolutions in their governments.

RICHES NOT HAPPINESS.—The late Mr. Girard, of Philadelphia, when surrounded by immense wealth, and supposed to be taking supreme delight in its accumulation, wrote thus to a friend: "As to myself, I live like a galley slave, constantly occupied, and often passing the night without sleeping. I am wrapped in a labyrinth of affairs, and worn out with care. I do not value fortune. The love of labor is my highest emotion. When I rise in the morning, my only effort is to labor so hard during the day, that when the night comes, I may be enabled to sleep soundly."

DISTILLING SPIRITS FROM BEETROOT.—A company is at present in the course of formation for carrying on operations upon a very large scale in France. The firm in London who have taken the matter in hand is a guarantee that ample capital will be provided.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?—In the year 1862, the thousandth anniversary of the Russian monarchy is to be celebrated with great pomp and national manifestation in Russia.

A WOMAN OF THE WORLD.—The Viscountess de Renneville says that a woman of the world is a first class actress who knows how to play her part to perfection.

THE RAILROAD MIRACLE.

In scanning the physical history of our country for the last twenty-five years, the immense amount and importance of the work which has been accomplished in the establishment of our railway system, appears as though it were the result of miracle. If any one had been bold enough to predict in the year 1833, a half century only after the treaty of peace which confirmed our independence, that in twenty-five years from that date the United States would be covered with a network of railroads extending from one end of the Union to the other, he would have been regarded as a crazy enthusiast. Truly, when we consider the vastness of the work, the immense expenditure of labor and capital which it has required, the complete revolution which it has made in the mode of travel and conveyance, and the trade and intercourse of the country, and then look back upon the few years of our own life within which it has all been accomplished, the American railroad system appears like a stupendous miracle.

In this wonderful achievement of enterprise, skill and capital, the good old State of Massachusetts has borne no small part. A pioneer in this, the most effective form of internal improvements, and numbering among her own works some of the first and most important of early railroads of the country, the genius, skill and enterprise of her sons have stamped themselves upon almost every mile that has been built, whether north, south, east or west. Nor have her coffers been shut against the calls of other States for aid in those great public improvements. The wealth of her moneyed men has been invested in their stocks and bonds with a lavish hand, and whether in all cases productively to the capitalist or not, yet with unquestionable benefit to the growth and prosperity of the country. Perhaps it would have been better for the Old Bay State at this day, if a few millions that have been sent to the West and South to aid unproductive enterprises in those regions, had been devoted to tunnelling the Hoosac mountain range, in the western part of our own State, and thus opened a practicable channel through which a share of the vast products of the western country might have flowed to our seaboard, to the enrichment of our State and the building up of our commerce. But it is too late to repine over this misdirection of capital, and all we can now do is to hope for better things in the future.

The railroad system of our country has done more to consolidate it, and to make us one people, than anything else of a material nature—standing in that regard as far before all other physical agencies as the admirable and soul-stirring farewell address of Washington does before all political documents. This system has been, and in the time to come will still be, of incalculable benefit in promoting trade and commerce between the different sections of the country. It brings together the merchants of all parts of the Union, even the most remote, to buy and sell, and thus facilitates that exchange of the productions of labor upon which the wealth of a country, and the happiness of its people so largely depend. Social intercourse and fraternal feeling are also largely promoted by this means, and true nationality of sentiment thus developed and strengthened. With all the disturbing causes that exist to alienate the attachment of the different sections of the Union from each other, it is hard to tell what would have kept us united, and happy as a nation, to the present hour, but for the free, full and hearty intercourse which railroad communication has established and promoted between those who might otherwise have acted upon erroneous and disparaging ideas of each others' feelings, motives and purposes.

Besides obliterating State and sectional distinctions, this wonderful system of easy and rapid intercommunication has developed and stimulated the arts, sciences and literature of the country. Now a man's readers, auditors and patrons are not confined to his own neighborhood or State; but, thanks to railroads, they are found in every part of our widely extended country. The "Dollar Monthly" is whirled by the locomotive to every locality which is protected by our flag, and read by our fellow-countrymen from the Aroostook in Maine to the Masilla Valley in New Mexico; our "Pictorial" graces every drawing-room table from the city of Brotherly Love to the Golden Gates of the Pacific. Our Boston lecturers flit away for a few days, and are heard by large and delighted audiences on the shores of the great lakes, and the banks of the mighty father of waters. Railroads too have performed wonders in opening the natural resources, powers and capabilities of the newly settled portions of the country. They are moreover effective in concentrating men and materials for purposes of war, and therefore an important guarantee for peace.

The United States are ahead of all other countries in the number and extent of railroads, and a most important item of the wealth of the nation is represented by their stocks and bonds. The actual number of railroads in operation in the United States at the present time, is two hundred and fifty-nine, extending throughout the whole Union in almost every direction. Of these, New York has the largest number, having thirty-eight. Ohio has twenty-seven, Pennsylvania twenty-one, Massachusetts twenty, Indiana eighteen, Virginia thirteen, Georgia nine, South Carolina eight, and Wisconsin seven. Other States have from six to one each. The total length of railroad lines now in operation is nearly twenty-four thousand miles, and their cost is not far from nine hundred and sixty millions of dollars. By this brief and necessarily imperfect synopsis of the extent and cost of our railroad system, our readers can form a pretty good idea of the magnitude of the miracle which twenty-five years have wrought in the land.

THE STATE OF WISCONSIN.

It appears from the Wisconsin State Directory that there are in the State ten railroads in full operation, covering a distance of 1888 miles, the gross receipts of the same being $150,000,000. The merchandise imports reached $28,000,000. There are eighty-six banks in the State, and seventy-four doing business under the general banking law, with an aggregate capital of $6,815,000. The total amount of circulation issued by such banks is $3,133,501, and securities assigned in trust to the State treasurer to the amount of $11,000,638. The aggregate of specie on deposit is $50,488 15. There are 2381 common schools in the State, attended by over 60,000 children. There are twenty colleges. There are one hundred and sixty-five newspapers published, being an increase of over one hundred during the past two years, and a good portion of them are German.

A LARGE FIGURE.—It is stated by a San Francisco paper that the Mormons can bring into the field seventeen thousand troops. This appears to us an over-estimate, but should Brigham's forces be as large Uncle Samuel is abundantly able to take care of them.

A STEAMBOAT.—Brother Jonathan thus describes a steamboat: "It's got a saw mill on one side, and a grist mill on the other, and a blacksmith's shop in the middle."

FINANCIAL DEBATES.—Punch says, dry as the monetary debates may be deemed, they relate to a subject of immense interest.

GOOD DEEDS.—A good action is never thrown away, and perhaps that is the reason why we find so few of them.

THE MUSK DEER.

The animal which furnishes the popular perfume known as musk, is a native of Asia, being found in the cold and mountainous regions of that continent, particularly in the Himalaya range. It is partial to the roots of the pine, cedar, holly and cypress trees, which have a strong aromatic perfume, and this diet probably accounts for the odor of the peculiar musk secretion. This precious substance is contained in a small pouch, suspended from the belly, near the navel. The musk deer is about the height of a goat, has a small head, pointed nose ornamented with long, white mustachios, slender legs, and large, thick haunches. Two long, crooked teeth, protruding from the upper jaw, enable it to tear up the odoriferous roots upon which it feeds. Its hair is from two to three inches long, coarse and bristling; black below, white in the middle, and of a grayish hue on the back. The natives of the country hunt these animals in great numbers, for their perfume bags, and find a very profitable market for them in India and China. It is with this perfume that the cakes of India ink are flavored, which our artists and draughtsmen use.

COMMERCIAL DISHONESTY.—It was formerly the boast of the English mercantile community that their body was entirely free from rogues. But of late years there have been some signal instances of commercial dishonesty in England. However, they punish their rogues always. Lately Henry Smith, formerly a large merchant at Hull, was sentenced to ten years penal servitude for forgery. Not many years since this crime was a hanging matter in England.

LIBERAL PATRONAGE.—It is stated that the subscription to Agassiz's forthcoming scientific work already exceeds a million and a quarter of dollars. This is almost unparalleled in the history of modern literature.

LITTLE THINGS.—A word, a look, a frown, are little things, but they are powerful for good or evil. Remember this.

A HINT TO SLANDERERS.—A good word is an easy obligation; but not to speak ill only requires our silence, which costs us nothing.

THE COST OF VICE.—What maintains one vice, would bring up two children.

WHO THEY ARE.—The three great conquerors of the world are Love, Death and Fashion.

THE ISLAND OF CUBA.

The immediate proximity of Cuba to the United States, its commanding position in the great outlet to our Mississippi valley, the Gulf of Mexico, its control over the pathway to our possessions on the Pacific ocean via the isthmus routes, and its commercial importance to our great productive interests, all combine to render the possession of that great and wealthy offshoot from our continent, a question of the deepest interest to the people of the United States. This is no new, no partisan question; it is eminently an American, and a national question, and one as old as the Independence of the United States. Cuba has now been in the possession of Spain for nearly four hundred years; sometimes as an indifferent dependency of the empire, again as an important rendezvous for Spanish fleets and armies in the subjugation of Spanish America, and within the last century as a prolific source from whence to extort a princely revenue. The first Spanish settlement was made in 1511, by Velasquez, at Baracoa, on the eastern end of the island, at which time it is estimated there were one million of native Indians in Cuba. In the course of an hundred years the Indians had utterly disappeared, owing to the remorseless cruelty of the conquerors. In the course of an hundred and fifty years more, the Spanish population amounted to one hundred thousand, the free blacks to thirty thousand, and the slaves to forty-five thousand—one hundred and seventy-five thousand in all. The total present population is estimated at one million and a half, fifty-four per cent. of which is Spanish and free black, and forty-six per cent. slave.

The area of Cuba and its small dependencies is given by the Spanish authorities at 36,013 square miles, which is nearly five times as large as Massachusetts, and more than one half of the extent of all New England. The extensive shore-line thus presented, is furnished with numerous accessible harbors, some of which are the best in the world for commercial and naval purposes. There are several mountainous ridges, traversing the island in various directions, but the interior is generally gently undulating, like the surface of England, with an average elevation of about three hundred feet above the sea-level. The rivers are abundant for an island, but of course small when compared with those of the continent; they however furnish much available water-power. The supply of fresh water is very abundant, even welling up copiously beneath the sea, in various parts of the coast, and with such force as to preserve it from taint of salt water long enough to be baled up by vessels for use.

The climate, owing to the moderate elevation of the island and its proximity to the gulf, is uncommonly mild for the latitude, and generally healthy, with the exception of the sea-coast in the months of July and August. The mean temperature of those months is 84°, and that of the coldest month is only 18° lower. The mean temperature of the whole year is about 78°. Rain falls frequently during the hot season, but in showers of short duration, while for the greater part of the time the sky is clear. The diary of a year's mean observations show—of clear and partially cloudy days, 286, and of cloudy days 80. The lands are celebrated for their fertility in the production of the usual tropical crops, such as sugar, tobacco and coffee, while cotton and indigo are seen growing in a wild state, and all the esculent roots grow lavishly. The sugar production, even under the enormous burden of Spanish taxation, is a profitable pursuit, and the tobacco of the island, which owes its superiority to the peculiar nature of the soil, may be increased to any extent that the commerce of the world shall require. Probably two-thirds of the territory of Cuba is uninhabited at the present time, so unequally is the population distributed over the island. The average population to the square mile is only forty-two for this rich and fertile island, while that of Massachusetts with its rugged and meagre soil and exacting climate, is one hundred and twenty-seven. Under wise and liberal government, and judicious management, this gem of the Antilles could be made to support a population of at least two hundred and fifty to the square mile, or of twice the density of our own State.

Of the roads in Cuba, it may be said generally, that they are bad, owing to soil, rains and Spanish character. They are worse in the eastern than in the central part of the island, and better in the western. The principal road running east from Havana is the great highway of the island, and the mail road. It extends the whole length of the island, and is 299 leagues in length. There are four short turnpikes radiating from Havana, which are very excellent roads. There are eleven railroads with various branches, amounting in all to nearly four hundred miles. These have cost upwards of fifteen millions of dollars, and pay an average income of five per cent. over and above the cost of running. The island is well adapted for railroads, and the system is as yet but partially developed.

Although the military position of Cuba is one of great importance, yet its military strength is not great, the present sparseness of the population, great extent of coast, and large number of good harbors, rendering its defence impossible. Nothing but a dense population, composed of hardy, prosperous, patriotic citizens, can ever render Cuba secure against foreign invasion. Particular ports and harbors are very strongly fortified and guarded, by the Spanish government, and at great expense to the people of Cuba; but there are several other ports which an enemy might seize upon, and make as formidable as these. Cuba was captured by the British in 1762, and the cities of Havana, Matanzas and Mariel occupied by them. It was, however, restored to Spain in the year following, by the treaty of Paris. The same facilities that encourage foreign invasion also promote smuggling, and to so great an extent is this carried on, that no accurate idea of the imports and exports of this island can be given. The official returns for 1852 showed the amount of imports for that year at about thirty millions of dollars, and the exports at twenty-eight millions. Two-thirds of the amount of imports was in Spanish vessels, while only one quarter of the exports was in those vessels. The Spanish vessels in this commerce were about eight hundred and fifty, while the foreign vessels numbered three times as many. This statement furnishes a key to Spanish Cuban policy, whereby the Cubans are taxed enormously to encourage the vessels and products of Old Spain, while the superannuated old tyrant is unable to take even a moiety of her products in return. Thus by the tariff at Havana, products and manufactures of the United States in American vessels, pay an average duty of 32 1-2 per cent., while the same descriptions of articles from Spain, in Spanish vessels, pay only 9 1-2 per cent.—a tax of almost one quarter the cost of the article, wrung from the Cuban commoner to enrich the Spanish grandee. Again, flour from Spain in Spanish vessels, is taxed only $2 per barrel duty, while that from the United States, in American vessels, is taxed $10 75 per barrel. In the year 1822 there were imported into Cuba from the United States about 145,000 barrels of flour. The duty was then seven dollars per barrel. In 1852 the total importation was 327,950 barrels, of which only 7610 barrels were from the United States.

Besides the tariff duties, Spain also bleeds her victim with various internal taxes, such as the alcabala, or six per cent. tax on the value of real estate sold, a meat tax on all animals killed for consumption, ecclesiastical tithes, stamp tax, lottery tax, etc., so that the actual and acknowledged revenue raised from the people amounts to about sixteen millions of dollars per annum. The amount exacted by the illegal rapacity of officials is probably about as much more, for all offices are sold, and the Spanish courtiers at Madrid receive a handsome per centage for the appointment and continuance of persons in office. These again fleece the people without mercy. So universal is this practice that it was made a topic of remark by Gen. Concha, in his work on Cuba, published at Madrid in 1853. Concha, who was formerly captain-general of the island, gives an instance of "an officer of a special tribunal who made in his office, in the short space of four months, more than forty thousand dollars!" The civil list of Cuba costs about seven, the military about six, and the crown revenues take about three millions, thus using up the sixteen millions of dollars which are raised by public exaction.

From this brief and imperfect sketch of the condition, capabilities and political importance of the island of Cuba, our readers will see that the acquisition of that valuable possession as a part of our Union, in case it should ever pass from the hands of Spain, is a subject of vital interest to the people of this country. Let us hope that wise, just and peaceful counsels will prevail, and that our government, by preserving a liberal and honorable policy, may succeed at no distant day in attaching this invaluable jewel to the diadem of the American Union. That the happiness of the human race, the peace of nations, and the permanent prosperity of Cuba as well as our own country, would be thereby promoted, it seems to us no one can doubt.

OUTRAGEOUS.—A poetical clerk in a Brighton hotel thus parodies the first stanza in Emerson's poem, "Brahma:"

"If the red sleigher thinks he sleighs,
Or if the hostler thinks it's sleighing,
They know not well the muddy ways,
Where all the snows are turned to rain."

THE CATHEDRAL OF MILAN, IN ITALY.

THERE are few cultivated Americans, no matter how much attached to their native land, who have not a strong desire to visit the Old World. This is a natural longing of the heart. The home of our ancestry has a claim on our consideration as the source of our being, of our civilization, of the arts and refinements which grace our western world. Nor is the home feeling weakened, as many imagine, by straying away from the scenes of childhood. On the contrary, as absence is the true test of love, so it is of patriotism, and it is only the frivolous and fickle who think less of their native land after comparing it with other countries. Distance, which lends enchantment to natural scenery, affords the true point of sight from which to contemplate national institutions. Of the thousands of Americans whom the facilities of travel annually carry to the Old World, there is scarcely one who does not come back with a warmer feeling for the land of our birth. In this late day, it is unnecessary to enlarge upon the advantages of travel which is an almost necessary part of education—necessary to enlarge the views, to obliterate prejudices, to cultivate a generous cosmopolitan spirit, and to make us more fully acquainted with art and with man.

But those who are denied the benefit of travel, may, thanks to the pen and pencil, obtain a very adequate idea of the many wonders of the Old World. For such our present article, with its numerous illustrations, is especially designed. And in glancing at some of the striking scenes in Europe, we shall follow no guide-book route, no geographical line, but shall transport the reader from one country and from one city to another, pausing to contemplate whatever we find worthiest of note.

Our first halt will be before the beautiful cathedral of Milan in Italy, a pile of exquisite architecture, unrivalled in the splendor and variety of its ornaments, and its perfect harmony and symmetry. The view we present is a very accurate one. The first stone of the present cathedral was laid in 1386. The building of the same has been often interrupted, and has, when resumed, been often carried on slowly; and it is yet unfinished. The east end, or apsis, which forms five sides of an octagon, is probably the most ancient, or original portion of the structure. It is calculated that the niches and pinnacles of the exterior will require about four thousand five hundred statues; of these about three thousand are executed. A staircase of one hundred and fifty-eight steps, at the west corner of the south transept, leads to the roof. Here steps upon flying buttresses present an ascent to the different levels. Two staircases, winding in a turret of open tracery, bring you to the platform of the octagon; and a similar staircase in the spire conducts to the gallery at the foot of the pyramid which crowns it. From this gallery you have a good view of the city, and the plain of Lombardy, studded with cities and villages, and the whole walled in by the snowy Alps. The ground plan of the cathedral is a Latin cross. The body is divided into a nave and four aisles, by four ranges of colossal clustered pillars, with nine inter-columniations. The length of the cathedral is four hundred and eighty-five feet, and two hundred and fifty-two feet broad. Numerous monuments, tombs, chapels and altars are contained in this church.

Beneath the choir is a lower church, in which service is celebrated during the winter season. From this is the entrance into the chapel of St. Carlo. The walls of this subterranean chapel are covered with eight oval bas-reliefs, in silver gilt, representing the principal events of the life of the saints; among which is St. Carlo's distribution to the poor of the proceeds of the sale of the principality of Orta. He had a life interest in this domain, which he sold for forty thousand crowns; and he ordered his almoner to distribute it among the poor and the hospitals of his diocese. The almoner made out a list of the items, how the donations were to be bestowed, which, when added up, amounted to forty-two thousand crowns. But when he found out the mistake, he began to revise the figures. "Nay," said St. Carlo, "let it remain for their benefit;" and the whole was distributed. Another scene represents the attempt to murder St. Carlo. St. Carlo had labored to introduce salutary reforms into the order of Humiliati, whose scandalous mode of living had given great offence. So prevalent was the practice of assassination, that some members of the order entered into a conspiracy to murder him. A priest named Farina engaged to execute the deed. Farina gained access to the private chapel, and as St. Carlo was kneeling before the altar, he fired at him with an arquebus. At this moment they were singing the verse, "Let not your heart be troubled, neither be ye afraid." The bullet struck St. Carlo on the back, but it did not penetrate his silken cape, and dropped harmless to the ground; and the failure of the attempt was considered as an evident interposition of Providence. St. Carlo continued in prayer, while all around him were in consternation. For a time the assassin escaped, but was ultimately executed, though St. Carlo endeavored to save him. The body of the saint is deposited in a gorgeous shrine of gold and gilded silver. The priest who conducts you thither lights a number of candles and places them in front of the shrine, then by some contrivance lowers the front, which displays the corpse, dressed in full pontificals, reposing in an inner shrine, or coffin, and seen through panes of rock crystal. The brown and shrivelled flesh of the mouldering countenance scarcely covers the bones; the head is all but a skull, and the face, alone uncovered, offers a touching aspect amidst the splendid robes and ornaments in which the figure is shrouded. St. Carlo died in the year 1584.

Milan is one of the cities in Italy most celebrated for its theatres; the principal house is "La Scala." It is the largest theatre in Italy, and will seat four thousand spectators. Each box has a small room attached to it. The form of the house is a semi-circle, with the ends produced and made to approach each other. From the front of the centre box to the curtain is about a hundred feet; the depth of the stage behind the curtain is one hundred and fifty feet.

Milan, in point of splendor, was once the second city of Italy—filled with temples, baths, theatres, and all the structures requisite to the dignity of a great capital; but this glory has departed. Under the rule of the Visconti and Sforza, Milan attained a state of great prosperity, and became celebrated for its manufactures of armor, dress and ornaments. It then set the fashion to the rest of Europe; hence the word milliner. The wall or rampart which encircles Milan, was built by the Spaniards in 1555. Around the outside of this wall runs what is called the Strada di Circonvallazione, a circular street of over seven miles in length, forming a fine drive. The city has ten gates; on the north side is the Porta Comasina, erected by the merchants of Milan, a doric arch surmounted by four large figures representing the four rivers, Po, Ticino, Adda and the Olona.

From Italy, the land of song, let us pass to Scotland, and glance at the city of Edinburgh, which is crowded with objects of interest. The situation of Edinburgh is romantic and striking, being built upon three ridges, and the neighborhood is marked by lofty hills, except towards the north, where the ground gradually sinks away towards the river's course, the Frith of Forth. This is the metropolis of Scotland, and a most ancient, thrifty and populous place it is. Calton Hill, between three and four hundred feet high, affords a most superb bird's eye view of the city. Here may be seen the "Queen's Drive," the "General Post Office," the "Cemetery," where is the tomb of David Hume, "Edinburgh Castle," "Holyrood Palace," the "Scott Monument," and various other notable places. Nearly opposite to the brow of the hill is a monument to the memory of the poet, Robert Burns, on the spot where he is said to have written his fine address, "Edina, Scotia's darling seat!" Poor poet, starved while he lived, but made classic in his grave!

On the brow of this Calton Hill is a fine observatory, affording a most admirable and extended view, embracing some nine or ten counties. To the east, in the direction of the mouth of the Frith of Forth and the German Ocean, are Haddingtonshire, or East Lothian, and the mountain range of the Lammermuir Hill. Below, lies the county of Edinburgh, or Mid-Lothian, and on the west are seen portions of the counties of Linlithgow, Lanark, Stirling and Dunbarton. Northwest are seen the hilly ranges of the counties of Perth and Clackmannan, and the Ochil Mountains; in the background, the counties of Fife and Kinross, with the Lomond Hills. In short, this view from Calton Hill of the old and new city, the Frith of Forth and its numerous bays, the green valleys and hills of the surrounding country, rivals for extent and variety of picturesque grandeur, anything ever witnessed that might be brought within the range of the eye from a single point.

Holyrood Palace is the ancient residence of Scottish royalty, and famed in song and story as such. The building is of a quadrangular form, with a central court. The front is flanked with double castellated towers. The most interesting relic which is to be seen here is the bed of Mary Queen of Scots, which remains in precisely the same condition as when this unhappy woman last occupied it. The closet where the murderers of Rizzio—the queen's favorite—surprised their victim, is also an object of much interest. The largest room in the palace is the picture gallery, some hundred and fifty feet long; and upon the walls are suspended the portraits of a hundred and six kings! On the north side of the palace are the ruins of the Abbey of Holyrood, founded in 1128, by David I. Of this building nothing now remains but the mouldering ruins of the chapel. Here, in 1633, Charles I. was crowned. In the northeast corner are deposited the remains of David II., James II. James V. and Magdalen, his queen. With this chapel, as with almost everything else ancient and notable, there is a legend connected. The purport of it is, that the pious David I., while hunting in the forest of Drumshench, was placed in the utmost peril by the attack of a stag. When defending himself from his assailant, a cross miraculously descended from heaven into his hand, upon seeing which, the stag fled in dismay. Afterwards, in a dream, he was commanded to erect an abbey on the spot of his preservation; and in obedience to the heavenly injunction, he founded the Abbey of Holyrood.

In the streets of the old city the house of John Knox is pointed out to visitors. Over the door is the following inscription:—"Lufe God above all, and your Neighbour as yourself." Close beneath the window from which Knox is said to have preached to the people, there is a rude effigy of the reformer, representing him in the act of holding forth to the multitude. The house of Knox is situated in a wretched portion of the ancient part of the city.

In order to visit the crown room and Edinburgh Castle, it is necessary to obtain an order of the Lord Provost at the council chamber. The insignia of Scottish royalty consists of a crown, a sceptre, and a sword of state; accompanying which, the visitor is also shown the Lord Treasurer's Rod of Office, found deposited in the same strong oaken chest in which the regalia was discovered. Here is also shown the room where Queen Mary gave birth to James VI.; also that gigantic piece of artillery called Mons. Meg, well known in history. The Castle of Edinburgh is fortified and regularly garrisoned. The period of its foundation is not precisely known. There is no doubt, however, that it can boast a greater antiquity than any other portion of the city. It consists of a series of irregular fortifications, and can be approached only upon the eastern side, the other three being so precipitous. The structure stands upon a rock at an elevation of nearly four hundred feet above the sea.

The city of Edinburgh is literally filled with statues and monuments; turn where you may, you will see one or the other. But the one of all the rest which most interests strangers is the Scott Monument, situated at the foot of David Street, which forms the subject of our second engraving. The foundation was laid in 1840, and the monument was completed in 1844. Its height is two hundred feet, and it cost some $80,000. In the centre of the monument is seen a marble statue of Scott, the "Wizard of the North."

From Edinburgh let us hurry across the North Sea and take a peep at Copenhagen. Copenhagen—Kiøbenhavn, merchants' haven—is built principally on the coast of the island of Zealand, but partly also on the contiguous small island of Amak, the channel between them forming the port, and in all respects, it is such a city as the capital of Denmark should be. Copenhagen probably contains about 175,000 inhabitants, and is very strongly fortified. The ramparts for miles in length are flanked by bastions, and surrounded by a deep ditch always flooded. The place is defended by a strong citadel and a heavy battery at the entrance of the port. One of the most striking buildings which meets the eye in rambling about the city is that represented in our third picture, the royal palace of Christiansborg, an object of much interest, being the town residence of the king, and situated on what is called

THE CATHEDRAL OF COLOGNE, IN PRUSSIA.

Castle Isle, occupying the spot where the famous castle built by Bishop Absolou, in 1168, once stood, and which was erected to awe the pirates which infested the waters at that early period. This castle was, on the accession of Christian VI. to the throne, razed to the ground in order that a fitting royal residence might be erected on its site. This palace was destroyed by fire in 1794, and the present palace of white stone was commenced in the reign of Christian VII., and finished during that of Frederic VI., and a noble structure it is.

Over the principal entrance to the palace are two bas-reliefs by Thorwaldsen—Minerva and Prometheus, Hercules and Hebe; Jupiter, Nemesis, Æsculapius and Hygæia; and in niches on each side of the entrance are four colossal figures of the first four named. Entering by the principal door, you ascend the king's staircase, so called, which is of polished mahogany, and the railings of brass. Among the many superb apartments, the most magnificent is the Knights' Hall, called the Riddersal. It is a miracle of splendor. A colonnade is formed by Corinthian columns, which at night are lighted by elegant cut-glass chandeliers suspended from the lofty ceiling. The effect is truly grand. The king's throne-room is adorned with four large paintings representing scenes in Danish history. Near the palace is the famous Thorwaldsen's Museum.

This building contains an immense and beautiful collection of works of art, all the creation of one man, Thorwaldsen, and presented by him with patriotic pride to Denmark. The building is in the Egyptian style of architecture, some two hundred and thirty feet in length, and one hundred and twenty-five in breadth, and is comprised in two stories. In the centre of the building is an open court, where rest the remains of the great artist, whose creative genius has filled the museum. The tomb is simple, and was measured out and selected by himself. In the front hall, corridor and apartments, on the ground or first story, are placed the works of the great sculptor, and on the story above, his collections. On the summit of the front and principal entrance stands the chariot of victory, drawn by four horses. To describe the contents of this noble temple of art would occupy too much space, but what the sculptor himself was best satisfied with, are his group of the Graces, the Shepherd Boy, and the Mercuries.

The Church of Our Lady contains Thorwaldsen's original work of Christ and the Apostles in marble, copies of which in plaster were represented in the New York Crystal Palace. Rosenborg is a place of interest, also, built by Christian VII. in 1694. It is in the Gothic style, and the tower towards the west, and two smaller ones to the east, each with a handsome spire. In its curiosities is a cabinet of coins and medals. One old Swedish coin is shown, of the value of about three dollars, which means three pounds, being square and of the size of this palace are the regalia; and here are also silver and gilt drinking-horn of the king, and the celebrated set of horse furniture, sword and pistols, presented by Christian VII. to his eldest son on the occasion of his marriage, in 1664. The saddle and bridle are of velvet, embroidered heavily with gold and pearls, the buckles set with diamonds, etc. It was made at Paris, and cost the pretty little sum of one million of francs.

The Tivoli Gardens, a summer theatre just outside the western gate, where pantomimes, vaudevilles, etc., are represented, and excellent concerts are given, is a place of great resort. Circus performances are also given here, jugglers' tricks, panoramas exhibited, etc. The place is very lively and attractive, with its admirable refreshment saloons, fireworks and the like. There is a gaiety and abandon about these places of amusement in Europe so unlike those of America, that everything puts on a new color, and facts with which one has long been conversant seem new, and to pass off with additional éclat. The performers, however, are here the very best; and the encouragement offered to this class of artists is so much superior pecuniarily here, that it is hardly for their interests to visit America.

The powerful batteries, Trekroner, Three Crowns, the union of Denmark, Norway and Sweden, and the Sixtus, which command the entrance of the harbor, are objects of great interest. The Trekroner battery, which dealt such havoc among Lord Nelson's fleet at the famous battle of Copenhagen, in 1801, and which was never silenced, was, at that time, although commenced in 1784, in an unfinished state; its bulwarks were then much lower, and of wood, nor did it mount so many guns as at present. The port gives fine anchorage for six or seven hundred ships. Copenhagen is damp and unhealthy, and is often visited by cholera. In 1853, it will be remembered, thousands of its population were swept away by this subtle disease. The city has also at different periods suffered severely from fires, particularly in 1728 and 1794, and again in 1795; but it always rose rapidly again. Copenhagen was founded in 1168.

The Danes are a kind-hearted, happy and contented people—the higher classes, more particularly, are courteous and hospitable in the extreme; the humbler classes are somewhat indolent, but withal quiet and orderly. The ladies there may be found sitting constantly at the windows, outside of which is universally placed a reflecting glass, in which may be seen all that is transpiring in the thoroughfare in either direction; and as knitting-work, which requires but little attention, is the chief occupation of the Danish ladies, they are enabled to amuse themselves by watching the passers-by at their pleasure, and neither pedestrians nor vehicles escape their scrutiny. This is so prominent a feature in their habits, as to strike the traveller from abroad at once; and no one can visit Copenhagen without remarking the practice.

A most immoderate love of finery exists among the women of the middle and lower classes, red being the prevailing color worn. The dresses of the peasants are remarkably picturesque, and precisely as we see them represented in plays on American boards. They wear little caps, extremely pretty, the crowns of which are expensive, varying from three to fifty dollars in cost. The women are physically more robust than handsome, but are nevertheless very interesting; domestic, industrious, and performing more than their share of the common lot of labor. Women throughout Europe labor far more than in America, and their lot is generally much less desirable than in our country.

The song of the watchmen, announcing each succeeding hour of the night, sounds novel to one from distant lands. The following is the English of one of these verses sung by the watch of Copenhagen :

When day departs and darkness reigns on earth,
The scene reminds us of the gloomy grave.
Then let thy light, O Lord, before us shine,
While to the silent tomb our steps we bend,
And grant a blessed immortality.

Our next engraving is an accurate exterior view of the famous, but still unfinished Cathedral of Cologne on the Rhine. This cathedral, which was commenced in 1248, is not yet completed, though the work of late years has gone on quite rapidly. The king of Prussia has given immense sums of money towards its completion. Voluntary subscriptions have also been made all over Germany. So the prospect is that it may be completed in another century—rather a long period to look ahead. The name of the great architect who designed so splendid a structure has been lost. The two principal towers, according to the original plan, were to have been five hundred feet high. That which is most finished at present is not over one-third of the height. On its top still remains the crane employed by the masons to raise the stones for the building, where it has stood for centuries. About five millions of dollars are still required to complete this immense structure. The transepts are now nearly completed. The piers which are to support the real roof are making progress. The late king of Bavaria presented five painted windows, which are placed in the south side of the aisle; five painted windows in the north aisle were executed in 1503. The entire length of the body of the church will be five hundred and eleven feet; the choir is one hundred and fifty-one feet high, and internally, from its size, height and disposition of pillars, arches, chapels and beautiful colored windows, resembles a splendid vision. Round the choir, against the columns, stand fourteen colossal statues of the twelve apostles, the Virgin and Saviour, colored and gilt.

In a small chapel immediately behind the high altar is the celebrated shrine of the three kings of Cologne or Magi, who came from the East with presents for the infant Saviour. The case in which they are deposited is of plates of silver gilt. The skulls of the three kings inscribed with their names—Gasper, Melchior and Balthazer—written in rubies, are exhibited to view through an opening in the shrine, crowned with diadems (a ghastly contrast). Under a slab in the pavement, between the high altar and the shrine of the three kings, the heart of Mary of Medicis is buried.

Prime, in his Travels in Europe and the East, gives us a brief but lively sketch of Cologne and its notabilities. He says:—"This city of 60,000 inhabitants, and diminishing in number by emigration to America, is celebrated for its fine cathedral, its abominable smells, and its manufacture for that liquid for the toilet known the world over by the name of the town. As the city is planted on a hillside, having a steep descent to the river, it is strange indeed that its reputation for filthiness should be so well deserved. Coleridge says that he counted seventy-two distinct smells in his walks about town. Yet nasty as the place is, from defective sewerage, it has some twenty churches and the grandest cathedral out of Italy, sufficient to detain the traveller a day on his journey. The church of St. Peter was thronged by an eager crowd filling all the courts and avenues, and the mighty mass of people were singing in concert when I sought admission. They were kind enough to open a passage for us, and we slowly picked our way onward to the region of the altar, to get sight of the famous Rubens picture of St. Peter suffering crucifixion with his head downward. Painful as the picture must be, its power is such that the beholder feels a sort of pleasure in the work of art, that can hardly be appreciated by a reader who has not studied a martyr-scene. On the back of this picture is a copy, which is exposed to view except on fête-days and Sundays, but the sacristan for a fee will turn it in a moment, and show the original. Churches dedicated to particular saints, and to All Saints we had often seen, but here in Cologne, just inside the wall of the town, stands the church of St. Ursula and of eleven thousand Virgins! The great attraction of the church, which is a remarkably plain building, is in the bones of these young ladies exposed to view within the walls of the holy edifice. * *

"We seemed to be in the way of bones, for, in a few minutes, we found ourselves in St. Gereon's Kirche, where the skeletons of the whole Theban legion of martyrs, who suffered under Diocletian, are preserved. An immense sarcophagus, with a Latin inscription, tells us that the bones of these saints are here. The church is a magnificent building, dating as far back as the tenth century. The Protestants have possession now of the oldest Christian building in Cologne, the church of St. Pantaleon. Duns Scotus has his tomb in the chapel of the Minorites; tradition says that he was buried alive, burst out of his coffin, but could not get out of the vault, where he perished, and was afterwards found, having eaten his fingers for hunger.

"There are other churches of interest which we visited; paused at the house in which Rubens was born, and in which Maria de Medicis died; looked in at the Rath Haus, or Town Hall, a fine old thing, that has stood for centuries; called at the Kaufhaus, where the Diets of the empire have been held, and emperors have feasted; explored the remains of Roman architecture in walls and towers still standing in the strength and grandeur of their early days—memorials of Trajan, who received the imperial purple at Cologne, and of Vitellius and Sylvanus, who were proclaimed emperors of Rome on this very hill, as Clovis was made king of the Franks on the same spot, in 508. Thus renowned in history, Cologne has been no less important in commerce; but the days of its glory, when it had as many steeples as there are days in the year, have passed away, and now it stakes its chief claim to the attention of the traveller on its great cathedral. The Dom—so the cathedral is called in many parts of Europe—the Domus, the House, the Lord's House, the Chief Church, is not yet completed, and probably never will be, though it is believed that four millions of dollars would do it. But if it is so beautiful in its present fragmentary state, with the scaffold and crane still standing, what will it be when the topstone is laid? What a vision of grandeur, beauty and architectural glory burst upon my eyes when I entered the choir, and stood in the midst of this temple, pronounced the finest specimen of a Gothic edifice in the world! I looked up an hundred and sixty feet, through the massive columns and splendid arches; and as the whole scene was tempered by the gentle and variously colored hues that fell through the splendid stained windows, I felt the power of human art, and was glad it was employed for so noble a purpose as the erection of a house for God."

The subject of our next view, the statue of William III., Trinity College, Dublin, compels us to bid "adieu to thee, fair Rhine." So, recrossing the North Sea, hurrying at railway speed through England, we cross the Irish Sea, and find ourselves safely landed at Kingston, in that "emerald set in the ring of the sea," Green Erin. Kingston is a comparatively unimportant place, except that it answers as a packet-station, or deep harbor for Dublin, from which it is distant something less than ten miles. Dublin itself has a poor depth of water for commercial purposes, and all the heavy ships and large packets run between Liverpool and Kingston. We take the cars at Kingston for Dublin with keen anticipations of pleasure, for we have been told of the interesting localities and the fine rural country through which we are to pass, and our expectations will be fully realized. Nearly the whole distance is lined with magnificent country residences, the grounds adjoining which are in the highest state of cultivation, and most picturesquely bestowed and ornamented. Here the nobility and gentry of Dublin reside during the summer months. Let no traveller hurry over this route by night trains, even though he should lose a day at Kingston, for it is a trip to be enjoyed, fully entered into, and remembered.

Dublin is beyond a doubt one of the finest cities of Europe, and is at present most thrifty and prosperous in commercial matters. The most of its streets are straight and very wide—that known as Sackville Street is some one hundred and fifty feet in width, and is the principal thoroughfare of the town. In its centre stands a Doric pillar of cut granite, one hundred and ten feet in height, placed here in honor of Lord Nelson. On each face of the pediment is inscribed the name of the hero's great battles, such as Aboukir, Copenhagen, the Nile and Trafalgar. One of the finest views in all Dublin is obtained from the centre balustrade of Carlisle Bridge—the sight taking in at a comprehensive glance a vast picture of the wealth, extent and architectural beauty of the city. To the north stretches away the noble mall of Sackville Street with the Nelson monument. To the south is seen Westmoreland and D'Olier Streets, beautiful in the stately symmetry of their architecture, and a peep at Trinity's garden and one of the side wings of Trinity College, as well as a part of the colonnade of the Bank of Ireland. Turning to the eastward the eye follows the Liffey in its course to the sea; and between the masts of the vessels rises the solid structure of the Custom House. Westward the eye pursues the river's course where it flows between walls of hewn granite, which form the frontage of the quays.

The "Four Courts," a series of buildings occupying a spot of four hundred and fifty feet, facing towards the river, and crowned with a majestic dome, is one of the first points to attract your attention. The front of the central building has a fine portico of six Corinthian pillars, surmounted with statues representing Justice, Mercy, and other emblematical subjects. On entering the rotunda, you find yourself at once in the midst of a crowd of lawyers and those unfortunate individuals who appeared as plaintiffs and defendants. There are four courts holden here, as the name would indicate—as the place is a sort of lawyers' exchange, where they meet their clients for consultation. There is no mistaking the rest of the throng, as they universally wear a surplice and a white curly wig when in court. When the four courts are in session, and the seats filled by the various judges in their regalia, the lawyers in their powdered wigs and peculiar dress, arranged in rows before the court, the sight is curious enough to an eye accustomed to the sober simplicity of our American form of legal business. The tribunals holden within the "four courts" are the Common Pleas, Chancery, Queen's Bench and Exchequer.

Trinity College buildings, also known as the University of England, are of great extent and much interest. They consist of three spacious quadrangles. Here are shown many portraits of Ireland's most favored sons, past and present. The library is one of the finest rooms in Europe devoted to this purpose, containing some 100,000 volumes, and many valuable manuscripts, some of which date back more than a thousand years! The museum department is also remarkable; among other curiosities are some skeletons of the great fossil deer of Ireland, and an almost countless variety of Irish birds and fishes, the largest collection yet brought together. The buildings partly enclose what is called the College Park, an open spot of some twenty acres. The college was founded in 1592—the present number of students is about fourteen hundred. A statue of William III. is situated in front of the college, as represented in our engraving.

One of the most delightful belongings of Dublin is the Phoenix Park, a noble breathing spot, held sacred, like the Boston Common, or the Battery, New York, containing about one thousand acres, or twenty times as large as our Common! Here are seen hundreds of noble deer, feeding quite unmolested and tame. In this park is the residence of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, through whose grounds sentinels are stationed at all points, and regular military government being observed. In the park is an obelisk in honor of the Duke of Wellington's victories. Here, too, is a fine Zoological Garden. The beauty, nobility and fashion resort here to promenade—the privacy and decorum of the place being preserved by the foot and mounted police. Here you have a fine chance to see the nobility and gentry of Dublin together. Two military bands perform alternately, discoursing sweet music.

At the royal barracks admirable military evolutions and fine drilling of troops may often be witnessed. No holiday soldiers are these, but men who live in the service, and are occupied in handling arms and in the soldier's duty for a lifetime. The precision of their movements, the martial bearing, and the one spirit that seems to pervade the whole body, appear to operate like magic. The English regiments are in a high state of discipline.

The beautiful view we next present, of the Royal Palace of Stockholm, Sweden, takes us back again to the continent of Europe. Stockholm is one of the most celebrated cities of the north of Europe, and its situations and surroundings are remarkable for the beauty of the natural scenery, being situated partly upon several islands at the junction of Lake Mælar and the Baltic, and partly on the main land, upon both sides of the straits, covering an area of four to five square miles. On the three principal islands the houses are of stone, but in other portions the greater part of stuccoed brick, painted white, yellow, or faint blue. Stockholm has few notable public buildings or churches. The palace, however, is an immense and most imposing structure, begun during the reign of Charles XII. The lower part is of polished granite, the upper of brick covered with cement. It contains a museum of antiquities and sculpture, with several good works by Swedish artists, a royal library, etc. The approach to the palace on the north side is adorned by two immense lions, standing on blocks of granite; on the eastern side two wings extend, between which are hedges and beds of flowers. This side looks down upon the harbor, as shown in our picture. The south facade, which is the most beautiful of all, is adorned by several fine trophies. On an open space before this side, stands an obelisk of granite raised by Gustaf IV. Adolf to the burgesses of Stockholm, an acknowledgment of their zeal and fidelity during the war of 1788. The west side of the palace is adorned with some beautiful medallions representing Swedish kings.

Our next engraving represents the old and new Jungferustiegs, in the city of Hamburg, some seventy miles from the mouth of the Elbe. In the centre of the two Jungferustiegs is the Alster Basin, a beautiful enclosure of water in the shape of a square of some thirty acres in extent, actually alive with pleasure boats and graceful, long-necked swans. The city of Hamburg consists of the old and new town, nearly equal in size, containing together some 200,000 inhabitants. It is a "free city," and is governed by a president and senate. The city covers a much larger space of ground than many other European metropolises of the same numerical size, in consequence of its squares, and its many beautiful public and private gardens. After the great fire of 1842—which destroyed sixty-one streets and seventeen hundred and forty-seven houses—the city once more rose in beauty and magnificence from its ashes. The business portions of the place are commercially grand, and indicative of great wealth and prosperity; and throughout the city the style of the buildings resembles that of palaces more than the ordinary dwelling-places of a trading community, the houses being chiefly built of white stone, lofty and imposing in architecture and complete in finish.

The Exchange Building is a great curiosity and an elegant structure. It is "high change" from one to two o'clock, when the place presents a busy scene of Babel-like effect. To hear the hum of some four thousand voices, and to look down upon the throng from the gallery above, one seems to be regarding the combined "brokers' board" of the world, who are engaged in selling the goods and stocks of the entire globe. The tower of the Church of St. Michael is an object of especial interest. It is four hundred and fifty-six feet high, and from its top you enjoy a magnificent view of the whole city and its picturesque and rural suburbs.

Hamburg is the emporium of Germany, and must ever remain so. It trades with the whole world, while vessels from all parts of the world bring various produce to its spacious warehouses, and nearly every modern language is spoken in its fine and attractive harbor. It has ever attracted the European traveller, and must continue to do so, whether he be a pleasure-seeker or a man of business. Every surrounding bespeaks the wealth and liberality of the people, the richness and elegance of the city; elegant villas, beautiful gardens and open squares abound. Private gardens are ever thrown open to the visitor, and "stranger is a holy name." The ramparts which nearly surround the city are one continuous flower-garden, carefully tended and beautifully laid out and designed, and at night are rendered even more attractive by the presence here and there of fine bands of musicians, who play exquisitely.

The noble City Museum of Hamburg is only opened on the Sabbath; it contains a rich collection of natural history and curiosities generally. In the grand square one of the military bands is stationed on this day to play for the gratification of the people. The Tivoli Theatre, just outside the walls, is a summer resort not unlike Niblo's Theatre, New York. Concerts are given here in brilliantly lighted gardens, as summer attractions. Hamburg has a police arrangement which sustains a thousand soldiers at all times under arms, and who are retained at the various guard-houses and gates of the city. Every man is taught the duty of a soldier, and all must serve for a certain length of time. There are also a regular corps of armed watchmen, numbering four hundred men.

We close our series of foreign sketches with two views in London, one representing the splendid Parliament Houses on the Thames, and the other the venerable Westminster Abbey, in which repose the ashes of England's most honored dead. The general outline of the Parliament Houses presents a grand frontage on the river side of about nine hundred feet, bearing a rich display of graceful mouldings, tracery, carvings and decorations. The entrance is by the Peers' Lobby, whence, through elegant brass gilt gates, you enter the House of Lords. The first impression is dazzling to the eyes by its richness and profusion of decoration displayed in all parts of the interior. This fine room is about one hundred feet square, and forty-five feet high. At the south end is the royal throne; at the north end the reporters' gallery, the front richly ornamented with panelling, containing the royal badges, painted in gilt ground. The ceiling is very striking in its appearance, its general ground being of a rich blue, bordered with red and gold, and emblazoned with the royal arms. The railings of the gallery are brass, ornamented at the base with enamelled grounds of red and blue. Below the gallery is inscribed "Fear God—Honor the Queen." The House of Commons is more simply decorated.

London is known to have existed as a town for more than two thousand years. In the year 306, the city was comprised within a wall of only two miles in extent. On the conversion of the Saxons to Christianity, London was formed into a bishop's see; and in 610, a church was erected on the site of the present cathedral of St. Paul. Towards the end of the eighth century, London was four times devastated by fire, whereby many of its inhabitants perished. In 839, the city was destroyed by the Danes. In 886, Alfred gained possession of it, repaired, and laid the foundation of a municipal government. In 961, London was visited by a dreadful pestilence, which swept off vast numbers of its people. In 982, it was again devastated by a conflagration.

In 1050, Edward the Confessor rebuilt Westminster Abbey. After many vicissitudes, owing to the incursions of the Danes, William the First was crowned king of England immediately after the conquest. In 1066, another great fire occurred, in which St. Paul's was burned to the ground. Little alteration occurred subsequently until the reign of Edward IV., when bricks were first made and introduced for building purposes. In 1471, the art of printing was introduced into London. The great plague broke out in 1665, in the reign of Charles II., and lasted one year and one month; families were swept off, whole districts disappeared, rich and poor lay dead together, business was at end, houses were closed, and death reigned through and over the doomed city. Over one hundred thousand persons perished during this awful visitation. In 1666, a great fire broke out, and lasted for four days, consuming thirteen thousand houses and eighty-nine churches, being five-sixths of the whole city. But in a little more than four years the buildings were all replaced. Until this period, the houses had generally been constructed of wood, thatched with straw, each story projecting as it rose, so that the upper stories nearly met at the top. From this time dates the permanent prosperity of the city, which now measures eight miles from east to west, and five miles from north to south, having a circumference of thirty miles, and a population of 2,500,000.

Almost the first place to which the stranger directs his steps is Westminster Abbey, which, as it now stands, was built by Henry III., and Edward I., being enlarged by the abbots of subsequent reigns. On entering the abbey at the Poet's Corner—consecrated ground—you meet a guide, always in attendance, who conducts you through the abbey. The first point of interest is the chapel of St. Benedict, where you see the monument to Langham, Archbishop of Canterbury; that of the Countess of Hertford, and others, are also hard by. Close to the gate of the entrance to the chapel is the ancient monument of Sebeborh, one of the East Saxons, who died in 616, and his queen, Athelgoda. Between this chapel and the next are the remains of a mosaic work, of fine manufacture, erected in memory of the children of Henry III. and Edward I. The next chapel is St. Edmund's. Here, among a large number of other monuments, are those of the Earl of Stafford, the Countess of Stafford, the children of Edward III., Lord Russell, etc. The chapel of St. Nicholas is next; here are monuments to Lady Jane Clifford, the Duchess of Somerset, Lord and Lady Carew, and many others. The magnificent chapel of Henry VII. is still more interesting. Here is an elaborate and splendid monument to Mary, Queen of Scots, erected by James I. The recumbent figure of the queen is a fine work of art.

At the end of the south aisle of this chapel is the royal vault, in which are deposited the remains of Charles II. and William III., Queen Mary, Queen Anne, and her consort, Prince George of Denmark. The entrance gates to the nave are of brass gilt, wrought in various devices. Here are installed the Knights of the Order of Bath. In their stalls are brass plates of their armorial bearings, etc., and over them hang their banners, swords and helmets. Beneath are seats for the esquires—each knight having three; there is a little shelving stool in each stall. Centrally, between the stalls of the knights, is the royal vault, in which lie the remains of King George II., and his queen, Caroline; Frederick, Prince of Wales, and his wife; two Dukes of Cumberland; Prince Frederick William, and the Princesses Amelia, Caroline, Elizabeth, Louise and Anne. In this chapel is also a magnificent monument to Henry VII. and his queen. It stands in the body of the chapel, enclosed in a chantry of brass, of fine workmanship, and ornamented with statues of the saints. Within, on a tomb of black marble, repose the effigies of the royal pair, in their robes of state. Here are also monuments to Queen Elizabeth, Queen Mary, Edward V. and his brother Richard, Duke and Duchess of Richmond, and many others of the nobility and great in English history.

The next chapel is that of St. Edward; here also are many monuments, and two ancient coronation chairs. The most ancient of the two was brought from Scotland, with the regalia of Edward I., in 1297, after he had defeated Baliol, king of Scots, in a succession of battles. It was a royal offering at the shrine of St. Edward; and the stone under the seat is reputed to have been Jacob's Pillar! The other chair was made for Mary, queen of William III. At the coronation of the sovereigns of England, these chairs are covered with gold and placed in front of the altar. There are several other chapels crowded with monuments. This abbey, so famous all over the world, is three hundred and seventy-five feet long, and two hundred feet wide. Divine worship is always performed here twice every day, and the place is held in great veneration by all classes, and very justly, too. "A mighty mausoleum this temple is, and one cannot stand within its walls, without feeling that he is on consecrated ground. Strange, solemn and yet conflicting emotions struggle in his breast as he walks among the monuments and over the ashes of kings and queens and conquerors, statesmen and poets; forgetful of the glorious architecture of the pile that covers the tombs of the great whose names have been household words from childhood to this long-looked for hour."

LITTLE MAY.

BY WILLIE E. PAROR.

Once I heard a mother pray,
At the closing hour of day,
"Father, let thy angels stay,
Ever over little May.

"Now her feet are in the flowers;
Now the sunshine fills her hours;
But her future? Father, say
What hath it for little May?"

And a low still voice replied,
From the azure vast and wide:
"Seek not to unfold the veil,
Ask not what shall win or fall."

And the mother lowlier bent
At reproof so kindly meant;
And her final prayer did say:
"Father, watch o'er little May."

MAUD ATHERTON'S LOVE.

BY MRS. H. MARION STEPHENS.

"Such a homely little toad as it is! I won't believe she is our cousin. There never was an Atherton yet that wasn't good-looking." And my brother cast a saucy, self-satisfied look upon the handsome, manly face smiling back at him from the large oval looking-glass suspended from the wall. "What you'll do with her, I don't know! Don't expect me to chaperone her! I'd as soon trot round with a kangaroo, or a wild-cat, or any other natural curiosity! Such a misfortune! Imagine her at one of Mrs. Merlie's select soirees, sitting in the corner prinked up in one of those outlandish dresses, eyes and mouth open to the widest extent, the laughing-stock of the whole company—pah!"

"Robert—don't!"

"I don't care—it is too bad. Why didn't they send her to school, or to a nunnery, or to Jericho, or somewhere else out of the way?"

"They—who is they?"

"O true; I—forgot!" And a slight shade of compassion settled over the handsome features of the speaker, while his dark eyes thoughtfully sought the floor, instead of their too often resting-place the mirror.

Maud Atherton was an orphan. Only one week before, the stage passing through our village had set down at our door a very little girl, with a very large amount of baggage and a very black West Indian nurse. A bulky letter, given by said nurse in great state to our father, after describing certain amount of lands and moneys, and appointing him guardian over the wild-looking little girl and her immense fortune, ended with these words: "Care for her, love her, treat her as if she were your own; for you are all that is left to her—my darling, my spoiled pet, my poor neglected little orphan!"

It was quite dark when the stage arrived; the journey had been long and tedious, and certainly first appearances had been anything but to the advantage of our new cousin and protegee. Wild and uncouth in manner, shrinking from all approach to welcome or endearment, petulant and cross to the nurse, who treated her with almost idolatrous tenderness, my father found it hard to warm his usually affectionate heart into anything like the sympathy and condolence he should naturally feel for the orphan child of his only brother.

As for my brother and myself, I fear, after the first few impertinent repulses, our feelings were anything but vividly sympathetic or grateful for the addition to our social circle of one so pertinaciously ungracious, and so evidently bent upon refractory measures as far as we were concerned. The poor nurse tried to excuse her shortcomings—pleaded fatigue, anxiety, the novelty of her position, and promised that a good night's rest would reconcile her to her new position among strangers, to all of which she returned only a sulky stare, and expressed a desire to go to bed, "if there was anywhere for her to sleep."

That night my father and mother sat many hours taking counsel, after my brother and myself were in bed; but of the nature of it, we could only guess by the extra kindness of their manner in the morning, and their urgent desires that we should be patient and forbearing with our new cousin whatever her manner might be.

"She is a spoiled girl, evidently," said our father; "but remember she is an orphan."

"And has had no mother's counsels to guide and guard her," broke in our mother, to whom that one melancholy fact pleaded loudly in extenuation for her faults.

Certainly a most unprepossessing child was Maud Atherton. If in the evening's waning light she had seemed to us singularly unlovely and graceless, the brilliancy of the morning did not improve her appearance. Thin and lank almost to attenuation, with large, weird-looking eyes full of repressed craft and fire, and a mass of coarse coal-black hair, which was slovenly wound around a comb at the back of her head, she startled even my gentle mother into a repulsion of feeling which it was difficult quite to conceal from the sharp glance of its object. As for my brother, he did not even attempt to conceal his repugnance. Contempt, dislike and hostility were visible in every glance of his eye and every curl of his lip—sentiments which we were not long in discovering were paid back with interest by Maud. It remained for me, who was the eldest of the family, to reconcile, as far as possible, these open demonstrations of dislike—to stand between the antagonists, and, if practicable, prevent any active demonstrations of hostility. I do not understand how any person, in this enlightened period, could arrive at the age of fourteen so utterly ignorant of the first rudiments of education, so entirely unformed, and lacking even the commonest ideas of what belonged to civilized society, as on acquaintance I found to be the case with our cousin Maud. My father explained it in this wise :

His brother at an early age had married a West Indian heiress, to whom he was most devotedly attached, and who survived the birth of this their only child but a few days. All the intense love springing from the grave of his dead wife had centered in this the living pledge of their mutual affection. Love blinded him to her faults. In her, he saw the development of all that had been good and tender and true in her lost mother. His indulgence knew no bounds. He closed both eyes and ears to her imperfections, and woe betide the servant who dared complain to him of her ungovernable nature. Being largely engaged in foreign trade, he was necessarily much of his time abroad ; and not until the few months preceding his death, did he become aware of the utter state of ignorance in which she had been brought up. Her nurse, the old woman before spoken of, in her fond idolatry had concealed from him her repugnance to any useful knowledge, and with the aid of interested teachers, had succeeded in blinding him to the fact that while he supposed her advancing in the knowledge and studies peculiar to her age, she was developing only the worst feelings of her nature and laying the foundation for after hours of exceeding mortification and misery. It was then too late for amendment. An insidious disease was undermining his life, his hours were numbered, and it only remained for him to give her over to the care of his only brother, with the hopeful prayer that he would superintend her future, and so far as possible, make amends for his own reprehensible negligence. And thus it was that Maud Atherton, the spoiled child, the wealthy heiress and the unprincipled girl, became an inmate of our own happy home.

Time would fail to tell of the annoyances to which we were subjected. It was impossible to place her at school—my father would not thus expose her ignorance. Teachers she had by the dozens, not one of whom could be prevailed upon to remain after the first few weeks. Headstrong, sullen, and when roused, passionate in the extreme, she became a terror to all who attempted to coerce her into obedience. My father was at his wits' end ; and after a long consultation with her teachers, it was proposed for the present to leave her at liberty to occupy herself as she thought best, hoping that as she grew older, her nature would change, and she would see the necessity for acquiring that knowledge without which she could never enter society.

It was a long, bright summer—the one on which she came to our quiet village ; and her whole life, which was not occupied in eating and sleeping, was passed out of doors. The village was hemmed in by wild and magnificent scenery. Great hills loomed up in the distance, and rocks, which only the most daring adventurer would scale, frowned down over the cliffs, and looked upon their shaggy faces as mirrored in the passing river. Among these rocks, would Maud spend her days. Agile, daring, fearless, she would climb the dizzy heights, sending back her ringing laughter in mocking echoes upon the world below. She knew every mountain, lake, pond, brook, meadow, rock or valley, for miles and miles away. She knew where to gather the sweetest flowers and to find the most inaccessible birds' nests—though truth to say she never infringed upon the mother owners of those treasures, however much her uncouth presence might have alarmed them. If she had been born on horseback, she could not have been a more fearless horsewoman ; and as she dashed over the country, her great eyes gathering light from the excitement, her wild voice ringing out in gushing joyousness, you may be sure she did not fail of creating that amount of excitement always in a country village gendered by anything beyond the common routine of every-day life.

But—"there is a tide in the affairs of all men," and I presume women come in for their share of it as well. Before the summer blossoms had drifted away upon the autumn air, the tide had come to Maud. The sun lay goldenly upon the earth, and the forest trees were brilliant with gorgeous tints when our annual picnic came off, in the sumach grove which bounded the northern portion of the village. No one thought of extending an invitation to Maud, or imagined she would accept one, even if it had been tendered. The morning beamed breezy, exhilarating and bright, and early our little band mustered on the selected ground.

A picnic is a picnic the world over, and ours was in no way original or peculiar. A good deal of chattering, a good deal of vociferous mirth, a good deal of mixing up among the young people, and we presume a good deal of love-making, was its sum and substance. Some gathered together in groups to discuss the topics of the day, some wandered away in quest of the lingering wild-flowers, and a few couples sauntered away in exclusive pairs too happy to need other company than their own.

In the centre of the grove, like a king surrounded by his subjects, stood a large oak whose almost impervious branches threw a cooling shade for many feet around. On a natural bank beneath it, an enamored pair were seated in loving juxtaposition, conversing, as lovers are wont to converse, upon subjects intimately connected with their own hopes and fears. Thinking themselves secluded from mortal eyes, they were indulging in sundry tender and affectionate demonstrations, when to their surprise and consternation, a storm of acorns came rattling about their ears. Springing hastily from their seat, and peering up through the leafy branches, a sight met their astonished eyes which, under the circumstances, filled them with consternation and dismay. Seated upon a limb of the oak, the gorgeous leaves enshrining her like a flame, sat the wild, untamable, erratic Maud Templeton. Her great gipsy eyes were full of saucy mirth, her face glowing with malicious triumph, and her whole face quivering with enjoyment over the discomfiture of the lovers, she looked some demon-child bent upon a special mission of mischief. Enraged beyond endurance, the lover sprang to the tree, and would have sent her reeling below; but she was too quick for him. Nimble as a squirrel, she leaped from limb to limb, sending out her mocking laughter the while, and before he could reach her, she had dropped to the ground and started off with the speed of a greyhound.

She was not to escape, however, so easily. The unusual noise had attracted the party on the picnic-ground, and before she could clear the opening, her progress was arrested by a troop of boys just ripe for a frolic. There was scarcely one among them that did not owe her a grudge. Her malicious propensities were never satisfied unless in playing a prank upon some one; and now that the tables were turned, her tormentors were not inclined to let her off without a due retaliation for past offences. They surrounded her on all sides, whirled her about from one to another with epithets anything but complimentary, and one more daring than the rest, was unmanly enough to give her a push, which nearly sent her to the ground.

It was an unlucky feat for him, for my brother, who at that moment arrived at the scene of excitement, sprang into the ring and with one blow sent her tormentor reeling into the crowd.

"Coward!" he muttered between his set teeth. "Don't tremble, my poor girl—I'd like to see the one who would insult you now!" And drawing her into the shelter of his arm, he stood for a moment proudly defiant, casting such contemptuous glances upon her assailants, that they were glad to slink away.

I saw Maud turn her great frightened eyes up to my brother's face with an expression which I had occasion to remember long after the scene which called it forth had been forgotten. Poor girl! it was new enough to her the sensation of protection—new enough to her the idea that she was of consequence to any mortal being—new enough to her the awakening consciousness that she was a responsible girl, a being like other beings, to be cared for, loved and respected. I think in those few moments, while they were standing there facing the amazed crowd, these sentiments for the first time in her life flashed into her soul. A certain peace and quietness, very real and very tender, spread over her turbulent nature, thorough as it was strange; and when my brother turned to take her home, she crept nearer to his side and walked on as one in a dream.

I was more thoroughly surprised than ever when, the next day, she came to me with a sort of bashful awkwardness and begged of me to instruct her. Of course, I was only too glad of the opportunity; and I must say, that for the next two years a better, more tractable, or brighter scholar I should never desire to have. An entire revolution was effected in her habits and temper. She no longer made the rocks and hills her play-ground—no longer gloried in frayed and ragged dresses—no longer rendered herself the bugbear to neighboring children, which had formerly been her delight. Pleasures she still had. I would not listen to her proposal of giving up her horseback exercise, nor did she refer to it again after one bright evening on which my brother had escorted her. After that, she seldom went alone; and as the summer wore away, and the long autumn evenings approached, I was pained to see the growing intimacy between my brother and herself, feeling as I did that only pain at least to one of the parties could be the result.

Before the winter was through, I had occasion to know that his presence alone made up the sun and sum of her happiness; that her whole face would undergo a transition at the very echo of his footstep; that her eyes would radiate joy at the sound of his voice; that her dark cheeks would flush with happiness whenever he sat by her side; that her moods and tempers were but a reflex of his; that unguardedly, rashly, almost without an effort to prevent it, she had allowed her heart to float away upon the waves of passion, to be wrecked as hearts have been before, and as hearts will be again while the world lasts, on the shoals of unrequited love.

I do not think at the first my brother was aware of the nature of her feelings. Her stolen glances, so full of fond, fervent tenderness—her incessant watchfulness over his needs—her thousand ministrations of love, tendered so shyly, yet with so much devotion—her restless nervousness in his absence—and her gentle, caressing manner when he was present, were all in his mind set down to gratitude. It was pleasant to have her by his side, to watch the development of this singular genius, to see the once pallid cheek filling out into the bloom and the plumpness of high health, to note the angular form swelling into the classic contour and grace of perfect womanhood, to watch the large Oriental eyes flashing and lighting up for him alone; to feel that he had wrought the wondrous change, that his influence and his power had turned the wilful, passionate, fiery Creole into an elegant, refined and graceful girl, it was very pleasant—so much so that few men would have found it in their heart to destroy the illusion, even at the risk of their sincerity.

My brother was only mortal—idle, impulsive and handsome. This exclusive devotion flattered his vanity; this unasked-for tenderness and dependence gave food to his self-love. He was proud of her growing beauty—proud of her open and unguarded reverence for him. To other men she was grave, courteous, and always coldly polite; to him tender, reverent and yielding. He was an only son, and had passed most of the time at home; yet he had been in society long enough to know that such exclusive homage was a triumph, coming from what source it might—the more so then, when voluntarily bestowed upon him by the heiress, the belle, the much courted, greatly prized Maud Atherton.

And she was all of that. At seventeen, our intractable cousin was, without exception, the handsomest girl I ever saw. Tall, graceful, with a form rounded into most perfect symmetry, a self-possession most remarkable for one of her years, and a face whose dark, Oriental beauty was as bewitching to contemplate as it was unusual to see, she moved among her associates regally,—a very queen among her willing subjects.

Music was her passion; and at all hours, when not occupied in the one great dream of her life, her nimble fingers were trailing over the harp (her favorite instrument), and teaching it to give vent to those impetuous thoughts and desires which she dared not otherwise indulge, except in the privacy of her own chamber. From under her skilful hand, I have heard such exquisite strains, such soft, tender pleadings, such an outpouring of human love and trust, that the heart must indeed be callous to all human feeling which could refuse to be touched by their strains.

My brother was as great an enthusiast in music as herself; and to his encouragement I always knew she was indebted for her wondrous improvement. I have seen him hang above her chair, his hand resting upon her shoulder, her wondrous eyes turned ever and anon to him for approval, till my heart ached for the pain that must come of this silent idolatry, if not shared by him. My mother became uneasy, my father shook his head in silence, and as usual, it was deputed to me to discover how far my brother shared the exclusive devotion so evidently bestowed by Maud.

Much as I admired my brother, I could not blind myself to the faults of his peculiar temperament. I knew him to be vacillating, undemonstrative, rather inclined to please himself best with that style of amusement which created for him the least exertion. Maud loved him now with all the force and fervor of a heart heated with the fiery sun of the passionate South. He had been the first fancy of her existence; to this first tenderness her whole soul had gone out like a flood. But would it last always? Would the time not come when that deep heart of hers would cry out for more positive food?—when the fervent spirit now pouring out its rich treasures on his shrine, would ask for an equally fervent return? Would she be satisfied always to be the worshipper, instead of the worshiped? Would there not come longings, unsatisfied—yearnings for something more positive, more demonstrative, more in accordance with the outpouring of her own rich affection? And would there not come times when even my brother would become sated and weary of this perpetual idolatry?

I was many years his senior. I had lived in and of the world, and I had learned the nature of his sex well enough to know that no voluntary gift of affection is held in such value as is one which has occasioned the owner some trouble—that only what is hardly earned is dearly prized; and I knew the nature of my brother too well to hope more from him than from any other of his exacting sex.

"You are breaking Maud's heart," I said to him one evening, after an especially ardent display of improvisation over the harp.

I had never seen her so brilliant, or heard her play with such wonderful power and effect; and through it all ran a vein of wild, poetic abandonment, a sort of inspiration, which could not fail of touching the heart it was meant to reach. It did so. I saw my brother bending over her almost spell-bound and entranced; then he stole his arms round her, sinking down, down, down, till his handsome head rested on her bosom. It was the first positive caress he had ever bestowed upon her. I knew it by the half-frightened way in which the color sprang to her cheek and the light to her eyes. She made an effort to rise, but he restrained her; and I could see by the quivering lip, and the tremor of the whole frame, that she had not expected this demonstration. I saw him draw her lips down to his and murmur on them "my darling—my darling!"

I do not know how he thought she would take this sudden wooing; certainly he was not prepared for the great gush of passionate tears which flooded down over her handsome face. He was evidently startled, and sought by every passionate demonstration to soothe and calm her. I stole from the room, not wishing they should either of them know that I was witness of their stormy betrothal. Late in the evening, Maud came to bed.

Her chamber adjoined mine, and I could tell by the midnight stillness that she was making no preparation for rest. The door was ajar, and looking in, I saw her on her knees—her dark cheeks glowing, her lips moist and red, her brilliant eyes upraised with such happy, reverent thankfulness as only a sincere heart could feel. Later in the night I awoke to find her standing by my bedside. She was too happy to rest—and would I let her come in with me? With her arms about me, she told me the story of her love—how she had suffered to know that she had given her love unsought—almost the bitterest knowledge that ever comes to woman's heart—how she had despaired of ever being happy, as other women are happy, in the certainty of being loved.

"To think," she went on, "that only this morning I was so miserable, over my hard fate, and now it is so beautiful! O, you cannot understand it—you who never loved!"

Who never loved? No, never! Be witness the bitter pangs which tortured my heart while listening to that full prayer of happiness which has escaped my lone life! Be witness the memories which daily struggle from their treasure-house, taunting me with a lonely, unblessed future! Be witness the wasted, weary years, the youth withered in its spring, the heart grown old in its prime, the desolate, dreary mockery of peace, where there is no peace! No, I never loved! The heart knoweth its own bitterness; let mine keep its secret even from thee, my beautiful Maud!

In two years they were to be married—Maud and my brother—which years, in accordance with my father's wish, Robert was to spend abroad. Fatal mistake! The love of one, naturally inclined to vacillation, needed the presence of the loved one to keep it burning with a steady flame!

For the first year of his absence, letters long and loving came at regular periods, filling Maud with happy, holy tranquillity. Then there came a change. Letters were received less frequently, and even those unsatisfactory, mysterious, and oftentimes cold. I do not know that Maud felt this change; her eye lost none of its tender purity, her cheek none of its crimson bloom—yet I have seen her sit for hours pondering over one of these missives, her eyes, too earnest for seeing, looking bravely away into the future, as if wishing and daring to penetrate the cloud gathering above her. If she suffered, she suffered in silence—a silence which even I, her more than sister, dared not penetrate.

At length my brother's letters contained frequent references to an American family he had met abroad—a Mr. and Mrs. Angier—whose family seat was very near to our own. As good luck would have it—so he wrote—their term of visiting was up, and they would return in the same steamer with himself. A few other letters followed, most of which were directed to me. I could not comprehend them. Some were gay, reckless, wild and incoherent; others gloomy, sad, and almost despairing. I feared he had fallen into the dissipated habits which are so often the curse of manhood, and that his letters were but the different tones of an excitable nature. I did not keep them from Maud, although it made my heart ache to see the wistful, anxious face which bent so earnestly above them.

It was a lazy, luxurious, dreamy autumn evening when the wheels of a travelling-carriage came toiling up the hill on the top of which our house was situated. We were not expecting Robert until the next steamer; so although a strange carriage was something of a novelty in our neighborhood, it scarcely won a glance from us at the homestead. We were sitting lazily under the maple trees which skirted our garden —Maud dreaming over the last strange letter from her betrothed, I reading, sometimes aloud, from Tennyson's beautiful poems, sometimes stopping to gaze at and pity my companion. I can see her now, reclining there in the shade—the fragrance and the bloom of the garden all around her, the sun flinging down upon her his last rays through the trees, and her large eyes, more than ever prophetic, fixed upon the far-off glory of the sunset clouds! I had reason to remember it, for there was much of tempest and of mental storm to agonize that calm countenance before I was ever to see it again in peaceful happiness.

To our surprise, the carriage stopped at our lawn, and a young man, whom at first we thought to be a stranger, alighted and looked towards the house. With one quick exclamation, Maud started to her feet and almost flew down the gravelled walk. What sudden apparition was it that arrested the speed of that fleet step? What sudden presentiment could have turned that crimson cheek to the hue of marble? What second thought changed the blissful exhilaration of a lovers' meeting into the grave, stately courtesy of a common acquaintance? Framed in the carriage door, poised on one tiny foot, hesitating with a sort of bashful uncertainty of welcome, stood the loveliest, purest vision of girlish beauty that ever greeted the sight of poet or lover. Golden hair hanging in little damp rings about a forehead of polished whiteness—soft blue, frightened eyes gazed deprecatingly from one to the other—a mouth, warm and plump as dew-wreathed cherries, quivered for a moment like that of a grieved child's—and a tiny hand, no bigger than a baby's toy, crept lovingly into that of her companion's, as if to ask for protection and gentleness.

In another moment, I was at the carriage-door and in my brother's arms. Maud stood by me, making no demonstration of welcome, only gazing from one to the other in dreamy bewilderment. Robert, flushed and handsome as ever, tried to make some explanation of his appearance with a lady companion; but his words were incoherent—he was confused and ill at ease, and evidently shrank from the scrutiny of Maud's burning eyes. We made out at last that the young lady was a sister of Mrs. Angier—a stranger in this part of the country—Mr. and Mrs. Angier were detained for a few weeks in New York—wished him to take charge of Lillie till their return—hoped his sister would have no objection to her remaining a few days at the Atherton homestead, etc., etc.

Now all of this was very careless and thoughtless on the part of the Angiers, and very improper in my brother, which I was not backward in making him understand. Courtesy demanded that I should accept the charge—indeed it would have been hard for me to escape it, without being positively rude—but I had the satisfaction of knowing that he was uncomfortable under my studied politeness, and felt the disapproval which I was not slow to evince.

I do not know why, with all her infantile looks and tender, caressing ways, her apparent artlessness of manner and childlike appearance, we could none of us—not even our gentle mother—tolerate the presence of Lillie Lane. Her very caresses had something stealthy and designing in them, and her fawning, childish manner was positively repulsive. Only my brother seemed to feel the charm of her pretty nothingness.

Our coldness seemed to frighten her to him for protection, for she clung around him, sat upon his knee; and seemed to have no more idea than a child that there was anything improper in the act.

A temporary revival of affection seemed to have arisen between my brother and Maud—she, with her deep woman's heart, believing implicitly in his word. Her demonstrations were not open and unreserved, as formerly, but none the less tender and true in their quiet nature. She believed that once Lillie was removed, he would be all her own again. She did not see how he could repulse her—she was such a tender, simple, little child! She believed that from association he had a friendly interest in her welfare—a brotherly feeling for one who evidently clung to him with the regard of a younger sister. And so she trusted on, day after day, happy in the few crumbs which fell to her share from his table of affection.

Robert might deceive her—for we all believe what we wish—but he could not deceive me. His manner had grown as erratic as his letters had been. He was irritable and nervous, now impatient and inconsiderate, then humble and ashamed of his actions. To Lillie alone was he ever the same. No harsh word ever fell from his lips in her presence—no frown ever crossed his face on her account. As the time set for his wedding-day approached, he grew more and more sullen and gloomy—sometimes sitting for hours looking out upon the withering trees, heeding nothing, not even the pretty prattle of his pet Lillie.

A month had passed, and still the Angiers remained in New York with no present prospect of return. I determined that the stay of Lillie should continue no longer in our family. I felt that she, small and tender as she was, was a Jonah amongst us, who, as there was no whale to tend to her case, would, if not removed, swamp the ship and ruin us forever. Full of these thoughts I hurried out to seek my brother, determined to bring matters to a crisis, and a crisis I found it indeed, when I did discover him. They were both in the library, himself and Lillie seated on a lounge, with their backs to the door, Lillie crying as if her heart was broken. I saw him lift her head up to his bosom to kiss the weeping eyes. I saw his hand smooth down the drift of golden curls, lingering over them, as if every silky thread was precious to his heart; then his lips opened, and I held my breath to listen.

"I don't see how I am to prevent it," he said. "It would break up the family, and kill Maud, I believe. O, Lillie, my blessed darling, what shall I do! Tell me—advise me! It will kill me body and soul to give you up."

A fresh burst of tears, and a closer clinging to his neck, was her only answer.

"If I could only have foreseen this—if I could only have known that you were in the world—it is a fatality, a miserable fatality, and one impossible to avoid."

"If you loved me," cooed the soft voice, "you would give up everything for me. What is she, after all? A great, fierce, horrible creature, with eyes that are enough to frighten one into hysterics. I'm sure she will make you miserable, and I hope she will!" Another sob, and another caress. "And as for your sister, old maid like, she hates me, and I can tell you I don't like her any of the best."

This was the tender, simple, gentle little girl, whose arts had power to win a heart from my good, noble, womanly Maud. O, man, man! it would take more of a philosopher than I am to solve your caprices. Not receiving any answer, Lillie raised her head, and glancing into the mirror saw who was standing in the door. With one spring she fled past me, leaving me alone face to face with my brother. And such a face as it was; so full of shame, passion, humiliation and anger.

"Spy," he hissed, through his clenched teeth, "I hope you are satisfied now."

"Yes, Robert," I answered, seating myself by his side, "I am satisfied. Satisfied that we have all been the dupe of an artful girl; satisfied that my brother has acted a very dishonorable part towards one whose little finger is worth more than Lillie Lane's whole body. I'm surprised at you, Robert. I can't comprehend you at all.

You surely have no intention of proving false to Maud, of bringing that—that girl home as your wife?"

"And if I have, what's to hinder me? Am I responsible to you for my actions? Maud, too, betrothed to a boy that did not know his own mind, and expect him to keep to his word! I liked her well enough then. I had seen no one else, knew nothing of the world; and now if I had never met—" My brother stopped and blushed.

"Well," I went on. "If you had never met. I don't blame you for being ashamed of yourself; you must have been wilfully blind, to let an artful, calculating, unscrupulous flirt like Lillie Lane gain such a mastery over you. Why, you would tire of her in a month, while she—pah, I have no patience to talk of her. And Maud, so good and unsuspecting. Why is it that men like you have the power of crushing hearts so far above your comprehension? Send that girl home at once; it shows her lack of delicacy being here at all. I tell you, Robert, she wouldn't have cared a pin's head for you if she hadn't known you belonged to some one else. O, you will give her up; you won't estrange yourself from those who have loved you all the years of their life, for one so unworthy of the sacrifice. If I didn't know it was a momentary caprice, if I didn't know you would blush for your folly, if I thought your heart or your peace of mind was at stake, I would not plead with you, even to spare Maud."

I heard the rustling skirts of a woman's dress, and turned just in time to save Maud from falling. It was only for a moment, though, that she had need of my support. My brother sprang to her side, forgetting in that anguished face, that wild gaze, that hopeless, hapless expression, that any other person ever lived on earth, dearer to him than his beautiful Maud. All the passionate, endearing words which spring to the lips in such cases of emergency, were poured out to her in frantic impetuosity. She listened calmly for a moment, and then lifting her arm in a grave, stately way, waved him to a seat.

"I heard your conversation," she said, in a dry, husky voice. "I did not mean to, but I did. I do not blame you, Robert—we are not responsible for our own affections. I loved you always; I do not think it shame to say so now it is past. I was very young, and my life had been very desolate before I knew you. You taught me the secret of woman's life; you seemed to understand me, to appreciate qualities in me which no one else discovered; to recognize in me a capacity for higher aims and deeper purposes than had ever governed my impulses. Whatever I effected, or was, or became, you were responsible for it. I strained every effort to improve both mind and person, because you would be gratified with it. It may have been very foolish—I think it was, but I gave you all without reserve, my tenderness, my worship, my trust. I do not complain, it is better as it is, O, far, far better than if the knowledge had come to me too late. Think what it would have been to have laid my head on your bosom as your wife, and then to have found out that another face than mine was mirrored there! No, thank God! it has not come to that. You will understand why I speak so fully of this now. The subject of love must never be resumed." Robert started towards her, but she again waved her hand in a manner not to be mistaken. "You don't love Miss Lane—you never will love her; but neither have you loved me—"

"O, I have, Maud, Heaven be my witness I have and do."

The great gipsy eyes, once so reverent and tender, glittered upon him like diamonds.

"You think you do now; you will think so till another fresh fancy strikes your sight. If I were not too agonized for triumph, I might perhaps rejoice to know that I shall not suffer alone. I do not. If it will be any satisfaction for you to know how fearful is the wreck you have made, I do not mind owning that I have lost within the past few minutes, what a whole lifetime will not recall; not only my love for you, but my faith in your sex. You have taken from me all this earth had of brightness; you have rifled my young heart of all its trust, and hope and love. You have robbed me of my girlhood's birthright, its fresh, unsullied confidence. I do not reproach you; I tell you of it only that you may be sure how impossible it is to bridge over the past. I shall go out into the world with a smiling face and a marble heart. Women, happy in the possession of home-feelings, and home-affections, will envy me the icy brilliancy of my life. We shall meet in society with the coldly clasping hand, and the lying, smiling lip, and we shall laugh to think that out of the whole crowd, only you and I know aught of the dead love whose grave lies hidden at the bottom of a reckless heart. I shall live, for hearts like mine are too stubborn to break, but life will be a living lie. My joys will not be womanly joys, my pleasures not womanly pleasures. There will be a heart's hunger to appease in some way; ambition's triumphs—"

I saw her prophetic eyes widening and brightening under the excitement of the time. I saw her face growing darker and paler, and her lips whiter than even her cheeks. I could no longer contain my calmness.

"This passion, intensity, or whatever it may be, is killing you, Maud," I said, springing to her side, and winding my arms about her.

"I am trying my strength; it is my first lesson; don't you think I'll pass?"

O, the fearful attempt at merriment, the mocking scorn on that pale face, the horrible, grating laugh which distended her rigid lips! I believed she had gone mad. Robert had been gazing at her wildly, silently, as if he had turned to stone.

"Leave me," she murmured, and you, too, Robert. I have not got quite used to my new existence. I shall do better alone. Such funerals as this should have but few spectators. It is all for the best! remember we are to be friends, Robert; I am to come to your wedding and—"

She started towards the door, walking as if suddenly struck blind. Perhaps, I thought, it will be better for her to struggle alone with her great sorrow. I went towards her with a caressing gesture, intending to kiss her before parting with her. She repulsed me, and I saw her handkerchief to her lips. A cry so wild and passionate that I involuntarily turned to my brother, burst upon the silence. The next moment he held Maud in his arms, the blood falling from her pale lips, staining his white shirt bosom with crimson drops. He laid her tenderly upon the sofa, and tried to staunch the blood. He hung over her in frenzied agony, calling upon her by every endearing tie to open her eyes and say she forgave him. He accused himself of being her murderer, lamented that he had ever done her such injustice as to think of another. Alas, he might have spared his words, Maud was beyond the power of hearing or answering.

What weeks of torture followed this one unfortunate night. A quiet, gentle insanity seemed to have settled upon Maud. She was once more the loving, trusting girl, clinging to Robert reverently, and toiling away at her books that he might approve. Then the scene would change; the realities which had tortured her to insanity, would return to her in all their vividness: At such times it would take all my brother's strength to manage her. It was pitiful to see her—the foam-flecked lips, the burning eyes, the cheeks vivid with the fever of heart and brain. In her worst raving one thing was always apparent, that her love for Robert was as strong and as worshipful as ever. That seemed to be her great grief, that struggle as she would, it still held possession of her heart. The physician decided that her mind never would be restored. She was still weak from the rupture of the blood-vessel, and that with the occasional struggles she underwent, kept her from regaining the strength she otherwise would have done. My brother sat, by her side night and day. If ever atonement could be made for the wrong which wrought this suffering, he certainly effected it. He grew pale and thin, almost as the poor maniac over whom he exercised a brother's tenderness and a husband's love. One day, after an especially severe paroxysm, she went to sleep in my brother's arms. It was late in the summer, and the garden was golden with blossoms. A soft, invigorating air came through the vines shading the window at which he sat, and just lifting the loosened hair from her uncovered brow. I don't know how it happened, but for the first time since it occurred, we were talking—my brother and myself—of the singular circumstances that led to her illness.

As usual he had been dealing very harshly with himself, blaming himself even quite as much as the circumstances warranted; said he never had loved any one but Maud, that it was a singular infatuation which possessed him, and if he could only once more see her restored to reason, he would willingly exile himself from her sight forever. We were talking so earnestly that we had not noticed Maud for some time. When we did so, to our surprise we found her eyes wide open, looking up into Robert's face with a questioning stare.

"It was true, then; I've not been dreaming. O, Robert, how could you, and I loving you so dearly?" And bursting into tears, she laid her head upon his shoulder like a grieved child. Her return to reason was as permanent as it was sudden. I think there is a fate which ordains all these incidents of our lives. All her pride, her scorn, and her anger had fled with the ravages of the fever. She seemed always to have a consciousness of my brother's devotion to her during her illness; be that as it may, his tender care, his deep humiliation, his watchfulness over her convalescence all had a most beneficial effect. If she did not quite forget his temporary estrangement, she forgave it most heartily. It was more than a year before she was well enough to join again in society, where she was looked upon as a lost star, restored to renewed brilliancy. It is ten years since they were married, my brother Robert and his beautiful Maud. They live very quietly in a sweet cottage that looks at itself all day long in the beautiful Hudson River. Five olive branches already gather around their table, and on this, the anniversary of their wedding, I, their old maid sister, take this occasion to remark that a man—a very young one, mind—might do a better thing than be dazzled by stray lights, and a woman a worse one than to forgive him. Lillie Lane married a man four times her own age, for the sake of his money, and ran away with a younger one for the sake of his person. All the Lillie Lanes are not dead yet, so I advise true-hearted men to beware of them.

"By Jove, Maud," I heard my brother say the other day, "you have no idea how fascinating for a little while those soft-purring, pussy-cat women can be. I was really taken in; didn't know my head from my heels; and if had married her, O-h-h! there isn't words enough in the world to tell what a fool I'd been!"

Then Maud looked serious for a few moments, perhaps she was thinking that even now it wasn't a pleasant subject to discuss; but as she only said, "Thank God that you didn't," I trust that all uncomfortable feeling has long ago evaporated, and can only respond, "Thank God that he didn't."

A NEW REMEDY.

The Cineinnati Commercial says, a German who resides in Mill Creek township while recently suffering from a pulmonary attack, sent for a physician who resides on College Hill. In a short time the doctor called on him, prescribed two bottles of cod liver oil, and receiving his fee of eight dollars, was told by the German, who disliked the size of the bill, that he need not come again. The German, who, by-the-by had not heard the doctor's prescription very well, supposed he could get the oil and treat himself. The doctor saw no more of his patient for some time, but one day passing by the residence of the German, he was pleased to see him out in the garden digging lustily. The case seemed such a proof of the virtues of cod liver oil that he stopped to make more particular inquiries about it.

"You seem to be getting very well," said he, addressing the German.

"Yaw, I ish well," responded the formerly sick man.

"You took as much oil as I told you?" queried the doctor.

"O, yaw, I have used more as four gallons of de dog liver oil."

"The what?" said the astonished doctor.

"De dog liver oil dat you say I shall take. I have killed most every fat little dog I could catch, and de dog liver oil have cure. It is great medicine dat dog liver oil."

The doctor had nothing to say, but rode quickly away, and noticed in his memorandum book that consumption might be as readily cured with dog liver oil as cod liver oil.

Enjoy the blessings of this day, if God sends them, and the evils of it bear patiently and sweetly; for this day is only ours, we are dead to yesterday, and we are not born to the morrow.

SEÑORITA.

BY M. POTTER, JR.

"I cannot love thee"—ah! the words were coldly spoken,
 Calmly the accents floated forth upon the air,
 Crushing a manly love—a heart nigh broken—
 Bringing a mighty woe—bordering on despair.
 A heart nigh broken! nay, a true heart never falters,
 Bending to sorrow oft—its strength seems overthrown;
 Prostrate it seems—yet in its truth it never alters,
 Though every joy and pleasant hope be flown.

Coquette! ah no, a cruel name I cannot call thee;
 My heart may bitter feel—my lips shall never wrong;
 Not thine the fault—I cannot disenthral me;
 'Tis mine—'tis that my love is deathless—strong.
 Why do I cling to thee? thou art unbending;
 Until thou pitiest the patient sadness of my men;
 And then to cheer me thou art condescending,
 Alternately the subject and the queen.

Am I so low become, that I should gladly cherish
 One smile of thine to all the proffers of high fame?
 Am I so reckless, as to deem it would be joy to perish
 Listening to thee—whispering thy dear name?
 O, dearest, lift me from this depth to thy affection;
 Give me the wealth of love I feel thou hast to give;
 Let me no longer linger 'neath this deep dejection;
 Bid me to love thee—whisper me to live.

RAILROAD ROCKET:

— OR, —

HOW TO GET CUSTOMERS.

BY WILLIAM O. EATON.

As many of my readers may not have had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the hero of this sketch, I will give him the advantage of a general introduction to them, by the following premises.

The father of Mr. Railroad Rocket was the late Nabob Rocket. He was an ambitious farmer and belonged to an ambitious race of Rockets, who believed in the prestige of a good name, and being a go-ahead sort of people, adopted progressive and top-lofty names at all their christenings. Hence, Nabob Rocket—his father being desirous that he should become one of the nabobs of his country, in point of wealth—which at one time he was—though he bobbed down again at the close of his life; and hence, Railroad Rocket—his father, animated by the Rocket progressiveness, being anxious that the Rocket of his manufacture should put himself through the world with railroad speed.

Nabob died poor; and Railroad came to town without a second shirt to his back and only thirty-four cents when he left the cars. Only thirty-four cents! and he a young man of nineteen years old. This was a hard case, but his name was Railroad Rocket, and the old blood of the family fired him up; and said he to himself, as he boldly entered a saloon and audaciously called for an oyster stew, "I am determined to go up like a rocket, if I do come down like a stick!"

Cæsar could not have said more.

Having finished his oysters, Railroad Rocket found that he had just twenty-one cents left, which he in a kingly way dropped back into his trousers pocket, and buttoning his coat over his breast, as great men do, he marched out, whistling to the tune of Yankee Doodle Dandy.

There is a green spot to be found in the wildest desert, and in the wisest of men. Railroad Rocket had a very green spot in him, and it was so large it covered the principal part of him. He was green in his look, green in his notions, green in his emotions, and we regret to say that he was very green, sappy green in his head. Not an uncommon case with young bull-calves, who come in from the country, only nineteen years old.

But green as he was, he was not fool enough to think he could live in the city without money; and he set about earning some, that he might touch himself off, before the rocket that was in him should be spoilt, by famine or the vagabond act.

So at first he managed to do a little business in the peddling way, and thus paid his board regularly at Mrs. Crocus's, for nine months; and then being acquainted with various tradesmen, whose articles he had frequently sold on commission, he contrived to get a moderate salary in a dry goods store; then he informed his mind in the monkey tricks of trade; and then slid himself into the "furnishing goods" business, as a silent partner; and then, as luck would have it, soft though he still was—his partner retired with consumption and a competence; leaving Railroad master of a snug shop and stock, before he had walked the wicked ways of the city a complete five years.

Some might consider this fine success for a saphead; and in the blindness of their envy wish that they were born fools. But Railroad Rocket became sole lord of the furnishing goods shop at a time when business generally was at a stand still; when times were hard, money scarce, and customers few and nipping; and when his partner went off with money enough to smooth him into the grave, Railroad began to apprehend that he might have soon to go off in another way; and abdicate control of stocks, socks, gloves, suspenders, cravats and collars, that he might save his bacon; for it appeared that his barren custom would not.

One evening he was toasting his early shins at Mrs. Crocus's boarding-house parlor grate hard coal fire, the centre of a semi-circle of seven fellow-boarders, when he quiddled his toes nervously in his slippers, and heaved a sigh that seemed deep enough to come from them.

"What's the matter, Rocket?" asked Ben Dowly, winking slyly at the others. "Tew-cent-piece to a dollar, you're in love."

"No I haint," replied Railroad. "I'm sighing to think I have to shut up store so early. Former times, people used to keep open sometimes till 'leven o'clock. Times aint been so tight afore since the rebelutionary war."

"How many customers have you taken in to-day?" asked Bob Splitters.

"I didn't count; but the money wasn't much to brag on, I snummy! I shall certainly fail myself, if I don't git up some good dodge to git customers in to see me. Come, boys, talk up. I guess some on ye's got some bright ideas. What shall I do to git up a sensation at my shop? How can I contrive to make folks think I've got better goods and can sell cheaper in my line than anybody else this side of sundown?"

This direct appeal to their ingenuity at once animated the six fellow-boarders into a variety of suggestions. And so then and there, Bob Dowly, Ben Splitters, Sam Bigleg, Tom Gogmouth, Job Jagbag and Timothy Tinfint smirked and winked and leaned their cheeks towards the fire, as if imagination lay on the top of the head, and they were thus warming it up to the required productiveness.

"Selling off at cost is too common-place," suggested Bigleg. "You want something original."

"Something to make 'em squirm," added Gogmouth.

"To make 'em squeal right out," continued Jagbag, "and say they never saw anything like it."

"Something that they will remember and repeat when they get home to their wives and children," said Tinfint.

"That's it, that's it, that's what I want!" cried Railroad, slapping his thighs delightedly. "Now, what do you propose? Say something, somebody."

"In my opinion, Railroad," said Ben Dowly, in a confidential tone, "you ought to give the public the reason why you can sell cheap. If you put it to them in an argumentative form, you will remove the usual doubts which prevent many from entering a shop, which is barricaded with big letters and loud lies. You want to hinge yourself on to their confidence as it were."

"I s'pose that's about it. But-how am I a-going to do it?" impatiently replied Rocket. "I know you tell me what I ought to do, but then you don't tell me what I ought to do."

"Not to be personal," said Bigleg, with an enormous wink, "I will suppose a case; and substitute a Mr. Frogborn for you; not to take your name in vain too many times. I should get 20,000 handbills printed, headed 'Frogborn's Last Appeal!' A solemn circular, containing the real reasons why he sells cheaper than anybody else in his line; and I should then append the reasons, true or false, something in this style. Frogborn's went so low, little or nothing, because he hires of his Uncle Joe, with whom he is a favorite. Frogborn buys of dealers who have family reasons for selling him at as small a figure as possible—for instance, two of them are his own cousins; one married his sister, and three have sisters, two of whom are already married to two of his brothers, and the other expects to do the similar thing soon."

"But this wouldn't be true," said Rocket, staring and watching his great toes.

"I told you I was only supposing the case, and want you to select what ideas you please," said Bigleg. "And now then, let some other gentleman proceed with the plan and add his suggestions."

"I should think," added Gogmouth, with an ill-concealed grin, "that he might say he bought his stock on condition that he would sell the whole out within a certain time, as many of the goods were stolen, and should be got out of the way speedily!"

"That might be an inducement, that's a fact," observed Rocket, innocently.

Ben Dowly pulled up his shirt-collar and remarked:

"Put in this—Frogborn wishes it distinctly understood that he never tasted a glass of liquor in his life—in fact, is so averse to liquids of any kind, that he did not take the ordinary share of maternal milk, having been weaned before he was six months old; consequently he never goes on sprees, covering the expense by overcharging for his goods."

"I did once take a glass of cider," muttered Rocket; "but it made my head hum like a hornet's nest, and I never did such a thing again."

"Put in this," said Bob Splitters. "Reduction of private expenses is a leading idea with Frogborn. He wears coarse clothes and wears them till they almost drop off of him. He is very careful of them and sometimes buys them at second-hand."

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed the boarders, glancing mischievously at Rocket's costume, which indeed was seldom little better than shabby. "Put in that, by all means."

Rocket looked sheepish and muttered something about "fifty-dollar suit, up-stairs," but nothing more.

"Put in," now proposed Tom Tinfint, "Frog-born boards at a cheap boarding-house. Style of meals can be told if necessary. Bought large proportion of stock of men in desperate circumstances. Pays very small salaries—one clerk being a blind widow's son, glad enough to get anything to support his mother; the other willing to take a trifling compensation for the privilege of learning the business. Has no expensive friends, never goes to places of amusement, nor out to ride. Never lends to anybody, and has no charity for beggars. Never gets into lawsuits nor any other foolish trouble, though has great respect for law—yet shirks taxes if possible. Pays no poll-tax, cause never votes. No water tax. Borrows water from kind neighbors. Shovels off his own sidewalk."

"All that is very good," said Railroad, with mouth wide open, listening to the ideas in their brilliant flow; "but I want something more—something in the lottery style. Can't you think of something original in that line?"

"I have it!" at last exclaimed Bob Splitters. "This manoeuvre will bring customers, if all else should fail. Pledges himself in addition, that the 101st customer after such an hour, shall receive a loaf of bread and a pair of mittens. 33d lady with blue eyes, who buys something, gets a whole piece of cloth sheeting. 33d lady with dark eyes, gets four yards of fine linen and a pair of merino hose. John, the widow's son, to keep the account. John never lies—you can tell by looking at him. Pledges to be paid at the time of purchase. And to wind up, it might be added—P. S.—This bill printed by printer who owes Frogborn a large bill—on which he never expects to get a cent in any other way."

"Capital! Capital!" now exclaimed Railroad Rocket, in ecstasy jumping up, and shaking hands with Tinfint, and then with each of the other boarders. "I'll follow your suggestions, gentlemen, and make each of you a liberal present out of the stock, if it amounts to anything. Good-night, I'm going to put down the plan before I forget it."

And the progressive Railroad withdrew, leaving the rest in the deepest amazement.

"Poor fellow! He is stark mad!" said one. "It is too bad to play upon him with such notions. He will soon be in the lunatic asylum."

"What!" said another. "You don't believe he really means to act upon our advice. He can't be so very idiotic as that."

"He will, you may depend upon it, and make himself a laughing-stock, and be hooted out of town."

And the boarders in doubt, separated for the night, confident that all the fools were not dead.

When I said Railroad Rocket came to town very sappy green, I didn't say he was a born fool. He had trade in him. He was hard there, even if he was "soft" in his way; and though he had never read the maxim of William Shakespeare, nature had imbued him with the spirit of it.

He cogitated with himself over night, and on the following day he proceeded to act upon the plan proposed to him. As is said of that cunning little animal, the pig, he "could see what was in the wind;" and he determined to raise it. It is better to make money in a foolish way, than to spend it so. Railroad Rocket thought so and acted up to the style of his instructions, if not to the very letter. As may be imagined, he created a sensation immediately.

This odd manifesto flamed throughout the city, on large and small bills, and made many thousands merry over "the crack-brained tradesman." The circular announced that sales upon the new plan would commence upon the second day after its date; and thus the name and number became the objects of general and peculiar notoriety. The whole city was agog to see what manner of a man this Railroad Rocket was; reporters, alive for fun, made mention of the expected elephant; in all public places the "new crazy man" was spoken of; and as the accustomed crowds passed by the locality, their significant looks and actions gave promise of sport to come. The shrugs and titterings and nudges and pointings, and numberless other signs which were made by the public, were not unnoticed by our hero, and he said little, but prepared for the to-morrow's rush.

And rush it was! Mindless of the jokes poked at him by the boarders, Railroad rose early next morning, and put on the "fifty dollar suit," and taking a pile of provender with him, hurried to the shop, having previously hired two extra salesmen—and thus all was ready for the onset directly after breakfast.

And never before into one man's store poured such a living human tide, as that day streamed into Railroad Rocket's place of business, all for fun and curiosity, and not a small proportion to make purchases, that they might carry away some memento of the odd man's store on that exciting day.

Both proprietor and clerks found their hands full; and the crowd without gradually became so immense, owing to the laughter of those who were there before them, and the rude jostling of incomers and outgoers, that policemen were obliged to hurry to the spot to endeavor to clear a passage.

Some of the spectators objected to their intervention, high words ensued, seizures were made, and blows followed, ultimating all in a general melee, in which "bloody noses and cracked crowns," oaths, menaces, skittish horses and scampering women, children and dogs formed prominent characters.

For several hours, in consequence of all this, the vicinity was the scene of great excitement, and the newspaper reporters, delighted with the unexampled occurrence, gathered to the harvest in interesting force, and "items" were found plentiful for long accounts in next day's papers—cause and consequences being given in full.

Railroad Rocket woke up next morning "and found himself famous," as suddenly and as wildly as many another child of celebrity has made himself, through more conventional means. He had suffered nothing and gained much, from that extraordinary pressure of business; and the end was not yet. The ball, once set to rolling, he found impossible to stop, nor was it at all his desire. If the first day was a successful one, the second was doubly, trebly so. Fame had come to Railroad Rocket's door, and less disturbance and increase of custom signified his continued enterprise—so much so that nearly all his stock was swept away by sales effected almost wholly through the notoriety of the establishment.

The third day convinced him that he must replenish at once, or shut up shop—for the tide knew no abatement—and he did so; taking care, from week to week that followed, that he gave a fair equivalent for the "curiosity" money received at his counter, he shrewdly fastened upon their future patronage.

And thus it was that Railroad Rocket got a fair start at last. Through the green mist which seemed to have hung over his mind, he had penetrated, characteristically, to the right point of fortune's circling compass, and he attained his end. True, it was ludicrously attained; but though the number can be told by thousands, who had rather waded though poverty forever than to violate their sense of propriety by taking such a way to riches, is it not to be regretted that there are many more than these, who daily and readily violate the rules of integrity, for but paltry profits, so long as they can observe the outward forms of decorum?

SONG OF THE ABSENT.

BY MARTIN LINCOLN.

Look at the light, revealing,
Far away in distant lands,
The joys that once came softly stealing
O'er my heart, in golden bands.

Spirit! turn—the gloom dispelling
From the lowering sky of now;
Wander lightly back—unveiling
On thy journey youth's fair brow.

Scatter from each hill and mountain
All the mists that gathered there,
While the restless years were counting—
Years of sadness and of care.

Mark the loveliness, sweet clinging
To the hill-side tree and vine;
And the bright bird, joyous singing
Songs of hope for future time.

Hovering there, fond, smiling faces
Scattered then their sunny rays
Upon the dim and lonely places
Of those rarely clouded days.

Dear Memory! in thy blest revealing
Stores of life-gems still appear,
Backward through the storm, are stealing
Visions, once to youth so dear.

Thus the weary exile, dreaming,
Gathers in the olden scenes;
Scenes, when life with flowers was teeming,
Filled with hope's transcendent beams.

FIRST AND THIRD MARRIAGES.

BY WILLIAM H. SHERMAN.

"Thus you see, my own Hortense, that I must leave you. I shall provide an income of a hundred louis for your expenses. Look forward constantly to my return; and when fortune again smiles upon me, I shall come back, never again to be separated until death."

The weeping wife could not be comforted. It was hard, that, so soon after her marriage; when the world seemed so bright and gay, and when wealth and fortune smiled so serenely upon her, all should be swept away, and she left, like a lone widow, to protect herself. The husband was almost distracted with the thought of leaving her. His heart had been bound up in his beautiful Hortense. She had been his idol from boyhood, the bright dream of his existence; and when he had attained the distinction of one of the merchant princes of Montreal, he married her and placed her in the very heart of luxury.

Misfortunes came on swift wings to the happy pair. One by one his possessions left him, and worse than that, others were involved in his affairs, who were less able to lose than himself.

He could not look upon the ruin of those around him ; for he had a kind heart, and would not wrong any one for the world. They that lost by his ill fortune, admitted that M. Valentin was a strictly honest man ; and that is great praise from those who are injured by a man's ill luck. People are but too apt to call it dishonesty.

There was but a single bright spot before M. Valentin. Australia gleamed up warm and golden, and with a desperation born of love to his wife, and justice to his creditors, he secretly embarked for the land of promise. There was a nine days' wonder as to where he was gone, and to what purpose ; and then he died out of the thoughts of the community, as thoroughly as if he had been buried in the cathedral burying place.

The weeping Hortense removed to another locality ; the fashionables who had strained every nerve to get invited to the house of the rich merchant, never paused to ask after his wife, and lonely and miserable, without friends or relatives, Hortense drooped and pined, until the beauty which her husband so praised, was changed into dimness. She never heard from M. Valentin. No single word had ever cheered her solitude since he left her. As month after month dragged its slow weight along, and no tidings reached her, her heart utterly sunk within her, and she believed him dead. What indeed could she think ? It was better to think so than to believe him unmindful of her, and day after day she watered his memory with the tears of genuine sorrow, as one sorrows for the beloved dead.

She put on the deepest mourning, kept her room for months, and when she finally went out again, and that only to church, her sorrow was written plainly in the face, which, if it had lost some of its beauty, was yet most deeply interesting. So at least thought the young Eugene Stanbury, an Englishman of unblemished character and prosperous business. He saw her at church, devised some ingenious experiment to be introduced, and begged the privilege of waiting upon her. The lady pleaded her inability to entertain company, the impropriety of her receiving gentlemen, and a thousand reasons why he should not visit her.

He overruled them all, besought her to waive all ceremony with him, to consider him as a deeply attached friend, a brother, anything in short, if he might be permitted to see her sometimes ; and Hortense, weary of her monotonous and dreary life, at last consented.

Once having renewed the delicious consciousness of a protecting presence, she found it hard to give it up for the mere punctilious fear of what the world would say of her. Indeed she had long since shaken hands with the world, and parted from it. She owed it no favor. It had no right to criticise her conduct. Thus she reasoned, while listening to Eugene's impassioned entreaties that she would lay aside her sorrow for the dead, and become his wife.

Still she hesitated. She truly believed in her husband's death, for would he not have written had he been living ? Of the many letters she had written him, the many inquiries she had instituted, no answer could be obtained. No one knew anything of M. Valentin.

In an hour of more than usual loneliness and trouble, she whispered to herself, that should Eugene press his suit anew, she would consent to marry him. She liked him, she was weary of her own life, caged and cribbed as she was ; she longed for freedom from the restraint that poverty and widowhood were constantly imposing upon her, and all these combined, operated wonderfully in Eugene's favor. The marriage was strictly private ; and half Mr. Stanbury's friends had no suspicion that she had ever married at all until she became his wife.

He took her to a pleasant home, as comfortable, if not quite as luxurious as the one she had shared with M. Valentin ; and all that she could ask for was showered upon her with generous profusion. Their dwelling, two or three miles from the heart of Montreal, was surrounded with trees and flowering shrubs of every description. Inside, there was every comfort that a loving heart could suggest. The heart of Hortense awoke to life, to love, to happiness, and to see her thus rejoiced that of her husband.

Two years of almost unmingled bliss went by ; but the third year commenced with some alarm for the health of Eugene. Twice had Hortense seen him draw a handkerchief from his lips, which was steeped in blood ; and often his nights were passed in coughing, until nature was exhausted, and the morning sleep found him drenched in the terrible sweats which so surely portend consumption. Hortense struggled against this new and terrible sorrow. It was the first time that she had watched over one dear to her. It was the first time that she had seen the effects of this insidious disease ; and hope and fear alternated in her breast, until at length she hoped against all hope, and the blow came down upon her, all the harder that she had not schooled herself to feel its approach.

It was hard to see him parting with the mute evidences of his brief happiness. Every window where he had sat with her, every arbor where they had rested, every tree under whose shades they had walked, or whose trunk he had carved with her name, all received a farewell look.

"How can I part with you, dearest?" he asked, after his painful journey round the rooms and the garden.

"Eugene! do not name it—you will break my heart."

"But you must hear it, Hortense. I cannot stay with you long. Thank Heaven that I leave you above want. Promise me, dear, that you will never leave this home. Trust me, I will be with you in spirit, when the form is laid in the earth; watching, guarding, if possible speaking to you."

It was his last night on earth. When the morning broke, his eyes were closed in slumber.

Hortense wandered for months about her beautiful home, like a perturbed spirit. There was nothing that had been touched by Eugene, that had not a solemn and sacred value in her eyes. The trees he had planted, the bowers he had formed, all had a meaning to her that no one else could understand; and yet upon each one of these, and upon her whole heart and life seemed written, "the glory has departed."

It is time to go back to the days of M. Valentin, and see what became of the fond husband, the courageous adventurer. At first he was almost distracted at the thought of parting with Hortense; but once the Rubicon passed, he became more calm. A few years he thought would find them together, never to part; and perhaps they would be all the happier for the separation.

Full of hope he went to the mines of Australia. Day by day he wrought there, enduring hardships unheard-of before, but bearing them with the courage and fortitude of a hero. Ever before him was the word Hortense. It nerved his arm in the rough mines, when he struck his iron into the gold-giving soil; it soothed him when he lay burning with fever, in a rude shanty in the mountains; his thought by day and his dream by night was still his own Hortense. Not a word, however, ever reached him from her; and often he shuddered at the fearful probabilities that arose to his mind. Hortense might be sick, suffering; might deem him dead or unfaithful; no, that could never be—she would have faith in him as in the sun. Come what would, she would not be shaken in her trust. But as he lay in the miserable shed which held his sick bed, he would have given worlds for one glance from her eye, one pressure of her hand to show that he was not forgotten, and as he watched the stars overhead, shining through the crevices of the low roof, he thought that if Hortense were dead, she would appear to him then in his need.

The rude miners were too intent on gain to watch beside his bed, and many were the long days and nights in which he lay untended. Aid came at last in the shape of a child—a young boy whose father was at work in the mines, and whose mother supported herself and child by washing. Hours did little Ben Cole sit beside him, watching every movement, and trying to give him ease; or bringing water from the spring, he would bathe his fevered forehead with his little hands. A tender nurse indeed was little Ben, and on his recovery, M. Valentin made the old washerwoman happy by providing for the boy.

M. Valentin had been richly rewarded for his enterprise. Gold had showered upon him in almost fabulous profusion; and now he seriously thought of returning home. Somewhat enfeebled by his late illness, he was struck with dismay at being again prostrated, and to find that his disorder was the dreaded small pox. That he lived through this, was only because his constitution was so excellent, that even this enemy could not vanquish it. He did live, but his own mother could not have known him, so deeply scarred and disfigured had he become. With his first returning strength, he set out for home. Hortense! Montreal! were now the beginning and end of his aspirations. One only thing marred his joy on the homeward route. Would Hortense love the scarred and disfigured face that looked at him from the little glass in his cabin? Would she endure the long, shaggy beard by which he was enabled to cover a part of the deep scar?

He had taken passage in an American vessel bound for New York. He arrived safely, and the next hour saw him on his way to Montreal. He found his course to the neighborhood where Hortense had proposed going after his departure. He inquired everywhere for Madame Valentin. No one knew her. His own person was not recognized, even when he haunted the old places of business. Another name, of course, was upon the familiar door; and hither he turned his steps, to see if haply some old friend of former days might have heard of her. Even the name was unremembered, or pretended to be; and yet the person he asked was one whom he remembered as plotting zealously to be invited to his dinner parties.

"They will remember me when they find I am rich again," said Valentin to himself, bitterly.

He turned into a by-street, and saw a beggar sitting in the sunshine. It was the most cordial and happy face that had met his gaze since he came back. The man did not ask for anything either, nor show him the withered arm that hung loosely under his coat; and hopeless as the question seemed, he thought he would ask it.

As he dropped money into the ragged hat that lay on the ground beside the beggar, he said carelessly. "Can you tell me where Madame Valentin lives now, my man?"

"I used to know her when she lived in Queen Street. Was that the one?"

It was the street where M. Valentin's grand house stood.

"She has gone from that house, but she did not forget old Jack, and many's the penny she has given me since. Glad enough was I when I heard she was married again."

"Married!"

"Bless you, sir, yes; married to Mr. Stanbury, but poor man, he died a year ago."

"Do you know where she lives now?"

"Somewhere out of town. I don't go so far now I am so old. I think it is in Bloomsbury Place, West Terrace."

To paint M. Valentin's feelings would be a hopeless task. Hortense married, but still free! A painful revulsion took place in his mind, and he resolved, as all seemed to forget him, that he would not yet discover himself. That night he visited the neighborhood of Hortense, read "Stanbury" on the door, and managed to secure the next house, which happened to be quite empty, and having its garden adjoining hers. The next day he furnished it richly, brought a number of servants, bought a fine carriage and horses, and, under the name of Richie, he settled down to watch at his leisure the movements of his neighbor. He chose all his private rooms on that side of the house that overlooked hers.

The first time that he saw her, was in the garden. She looked still handsome, but very sad and pensive. He wondered if it was for his loss or her late husband's! He soon became satisfied that she lived a very retired and quiet life; that she had little company and kept early hours. It was early spring, but he had plenty of flowers and fruit in the green-house, and he sent some for her acceptance with Mr. Richie's compliment. Again and again he repeated the gifts, and each time with a selection that marked a delicate taste. Hortense was charmed with her new neighbor whom she had not seen.

The flowers had been sent several times, when he added to them a request that he might call on the lady. She returned a favorable answer, and under cover of the twilight hour, he found himself in the room with Hortense. The sound of his voice filled her with indescribable emotion, because it resembled that of her first husband; but she persuaded herself that it must be fancy. She found her neighbor agreeable and attentive. He did not neglect any opportunity of being with her. They rode together, sung together, and often his voice would thrill through the soul of Hortense, like a remembered lay from some far-off land.

Insensibly she was becoming interested in him. He had told her much that was true of his past life, and openly mourned some being whom he said was lost to him—he did not say by death—but Hortense saw it in that light. More and more tender grew their intercourse, for the lady seemed utterly to disregard his scars, until she was scarcely surprised, and certainly not offended, at receiving an offer of his hand.

She was alone in the world; she had no one to consult, no one who had any right to blame her for trusting to one of whom she knew so little. It was her own risk, and she accepted him; frankly telling him how well she had loved him who had gone from her sight, and promising that she would try to love him as well.

M. Valentin exulted greatly in this answer, and came near discovering himself; but he had desired to delay it to a certain time, and he checked himself in time. The wedding day was appointed and everything was in readiness for the occasion. In exchanging rings, Hortense looked fixedly at the one which the bridegroom gave her. It was the very ring which M. Valentin had given her at their first wedding! She fainted on the spot, and he began to think that he had carried matters too far. He hung over her with an anxiety such as he never knew before. If she died now by his own folly, what would become of him? He execrated his scheme and repented even with tears that he had been led to pursue it.

But Hortense awoke to life, awoke to the new joy of his presence, to ask his forgiveness for the past, and inspire new hope for the future. There had ever been an inexplicable attraction towards him on her part, from their first interview; and as she confessed this, her husband was quite inclined to be satisfied, and to forgive the apparent disrespect which he fancied she had paid his memory.

As M. Valentin predicted, the inhabitants of Montreal, as soon as they found out his wealth, were happy to make his acquaintance, and remembered him as an old friend. With the true spirit of an honest man, he has liquidated his debts to the last farthing; and now, with his still beautiful wife, is travelling through Europe, happy as any couple can possibly be of their bridal tour.

THE MOON'S MISSION.

BY M. LOUGHTON.

The moon looked down on the quiet earth,
One beautiful starry night;
But a cloud passed over its silvery face,
As it gazed on scenes of blight.

Then a low sweet voice in reproach thus spoke:
"O shine on those scenes so dear,
And gladden the lonely hearts of men;
'Twas for that God placed you here."

Then it shed a beam on the wrinkled brow
Of a weary man of care,
And smoothing the lines of trouble away,
Placed a ray of gladness there.

It peeped in the room of the dreaming youth,
And gleamed like a taper dim,
And he blessed the rays of the quiet moon,
That gave angel forms to him.

It haloed the head of the dying one,
As he gasped his feeble breath,
And formed a beautiful golden path
Through the shadowy vale of death.

O'er many a scene of sorrow and woe
It shed a pitying beam,
And many a burdened heart grew light,
As it blessed the silvery gleam.

Then it flickered feebly, as it sank to rest,
On the top of the western hill,
And it seemed to say with its last faint light,
"I have done my Maker's will."

THE COUNTRY AUNT.

BY MRS. S. E. DAWES.

"THERE, Arabella, you look superbly now; that rose-colored satin dress proves quite as becoming to your complexion as I fancied it would when I was examining it at Stewart's."

"Yes, ma, I am more than satisfied with it. But how provoking papa was not to bring me those diamonds. I had set my heart on wearing them on the evening of my entree into society. I wonder papa was so unwilling to get them."

"He has been talking a great deal of late about hard times, perhaps he will feel more liberal by-and-by. Your jewelry will do this evening, then on some great occasion you can appear in your diamonds; for I have no doubt we can coax your papa to buy them for you yet."

The above conversation was held between Mrs. Lester and her eldest daughter, Arabella, on the occasion of her making her debut in fashionable society. Mr. Lester had begun life as a common mason, and worked by the day for many years after his marriage. At length, accumulating sufficient funds, he commenced business for himself as a master-mason, and being very successful in two or three of his first contracts for building, he soon found himself at the head of his trade, and in a few years acquired a fortune. Retiring from business, he built a splendid mansion in one of the aristocratic streets of New York; furnished it in magnificent style; established a carriage; and began to be somebody.

His wife was a farmer's daughter, brought up in the good old-fashioned country style; was a perfectly thorough housekeeper, but knew very little about books; and nothing at all about the forms of genteel society. But when Miss Arabella, who had been indulged in every whim since her infancy, insisted on moving from their comfortable home into a more genteel neighborhood, the fond parents could not deny her; and so by degrees, they had arrived, by the potent power of money, to quite an exalted position in society. Mrs. Lester learned to talk pompously about her servants, and had actually forgotten that the hands she was so afraid of soiling now, had once done the household work for her family.

Arabella, fresh from boarding school, and highly accomplished in the fashionable acceptation of the term, was to come out on the evening our story opens; and no expense had been spared to have her make a sensation on the occasion.

"I wonder the company don't begin to arrive," said Mrs. Lester, consulting her mirror for the hundredth time.

"Why, ma, you know it isn't fashionable to come till quite late. But there's the bell, some one has arrived, I must go directly down to the drawing-room and be there to receive them. I hope papa won't keep telling everybody to-night what happened the season he was building such an one's house. I declare, his allusions to the time when he was a mason do mortify me terribly."

An hour elapsed, and Arabella Lester, in her rose-colored satin, and blazing with jewels, was the centre of a brilliant assembly of the ton.

"I think you must be mistaken, madam," said the servant, as he answered an unceremoniously loud ring at the door.

"Why, doesn't John Lester live here—he that married my sister, Polly Jenkins, and used to be a mason?"

"Mr. John Lester lives here, but I should hardly think he was a relative of yours."

"And why not, pray? At any rate I'll soon find out."

Suiting the action to the word, the strange visitor advanced to the open doors of the drawing-room, closely followed by the horror-stricken servant, who besought her to remain in the hall; until he had called his master. But the resolute lady kept boldly on, and the fashionable guests in the drawing-room were startled by the sudden apparition of a closely muffled figure, with a long, capacious cloak, and old-fashioned bow, and a huge pumpkin head, carrying in one hand a bundle tied in a bandanna handkerchief; and in the other a venerable blue cotton umbrella.

"Well, I never—" she exclaimed, as her eye rested on Mrs. Lester, "if I didn't come near not knowing my own sister. Why, Polly, how do you do? You're fixed up so mighty fine it alters you amazingly. Ah, brother John, how do you do? You see I got awful lonesome on the old homestead this winter, and I thought I'd make you a little visit, and it seems I'm just in time, for you seem to be having a powerful sight of company here to-night. I should have got here three hours ago, but we come across a snowdrift and got stuck fast for an hour or two."

At the conclusion of this speech, Mrs. Lester, with crimson face, spoke a few words to her guest in a very low tone, and amid a suppressed titter of the young ladies, the two made their exit.

"You may depend upon it, these Lesters are a vulgar, low-born set, that have managed to get a little money together to make a show with," said Miss Angella Lofly to the friend at her side.

"Of course they are. I had some misgivings about accepting their invitation, but thought on the whole I would. But now I'm convinced they are nobody. This ridiculous woman is evidently Mrs. Lester's sister. Did you ever see such a fright? I declare, I thought I should burst with suppressed laughter."

"Why, Betsy, I wonder you didn't let me know when you were coming; I declare, I never was so surprised in my life."

"That's just what I wanted to give you, an agreeable surprise. But what sort of a party are you having down stairs? I must get out my best cap from my band-box, and go down and see the folks."

"Pray, don't think of doing so; you must be very tired, and as the company are to have supper by-and-by, I will have some of the same served for you immediately."

"I wouldn't give you so much trouble, Polly, for the world. I can just as well go down and eat with the rest of the folks. Besides, I heard you had got up in the world considerable, and I thought like enough I might see some of the quality, so I brought my brown satin gown. I don't believe I shall see more folks than you've got here to-night, so I mean to wear it. Just see, Polly, what a gloss it's got on it now. I declare, I never saw anything wear like it in my life. Why I had it as long ago as when your Arabella was a baby."

While Aunt Betsy was talking, she had changed her dress, and adjusting her best cap, and taking her work bag upon her arm, announced that she was ready to descend to the drawing-room.

Mrs. Lester, with a countenance expressive of the greatest consternation, made an excuse into another room for a moment, where she encountered Arabella.

"It is of no use," said Mrs. Lester, in a despairing tone, "she will go down, and what will people say?"

"I declare, to think that fright of an Aunt Betsy should take it into her head to visit us now—I could cry with vexation. I mean to tell her flatly that she shall not go down."

"You mustn't do that, Arabella, for you know she's immensely rich, and has hinted about making you her heir. We must pass her off as well as we can for an eccentric old lady."

"Eccentric enough, I should think. I wish she were a thousand miles away from here. But dear me, I must hurry down, or I shall be missed from the company."

Not a word of the above conversation escaped the quick ear of Betsy.

"So they are going to do that, and wish me a thousand miles away; I suppose they are ashamed of such an old-fashioned body. Pretty treatment this from Polly Lester, who was glad enough once to take my cast-off gowns to make up for that piece of loftiness, Miss Arabella. Well, I'll stay and make my visit out."

Aunt Betsy had just finished these reflections, when Mrs. Lester appeared, to conduct her down stairs. Without waiting for a formal introduction, she said, while making one of her most approved courtesies:

"Good evening, ladies and gentlemen; I declare this is an unexpected pleasure, seeing so many pleasant folks together. Now down in Hopville, where I come from, I don't see anybody once a month."

"I shouldn't think she ever saw anybody," said Mr. Augustine de Grunde, to a friend at his side, in a low tone, but sufficiently loud for Arabella to hear. To entrap this exquisite specimen of humanity had been a darling wish of the young lady in question, who now felt ready to die with mortification.

"Do see now, she has got out her knitting-work—as I live it is a horrid blue stocking. And then she has got out her snuff-box, and is passing it to Mrs. Finton. Dear me if I ever survive this wretched evening."

Mrs. Lester made her way to Aunt Betsy's side, in the hope of drawing her attention away from the fashionable Mrs. Fincton, who was simpering every now and then behind her fan.

"It's kind of funny, isn't it, that Polly should have had her party the very night I got here?"

"It is singular; but this is the evening that Mrs. Lester had appointed for Arabella to come out," replied the lady addressed.

"To come out of what?" said Aunt Betsy, dropping her knitting work.

"Out of her former seclusion into society."

"Bless my soul, has the girl growed up without seeing any company before? Seems to me she don't look nor act very shy."

The company soon adjourned to the supper-room, and Aunt Betsey, who had lingered to knit into the middle of the seam needle, with a smiling face brought up the rear. Making her way to the side of Mrs. Lester, she exclaimed, loud enough for all to hear:

"Polly, what in the name of wonder are them great tall white things standing like monuments in the middle of the table?"

"Hush, Betsy, don't talk so loud, they are ice creams."

"Ice creams! Well, if they're anything to eat I mean to have some. They are curious built things, anyway. That middle one there looks more like the steeple to our meeting-house, only it isn't quite so peaked."

"Where did that queer specimen of woman-kind come from?" said Mr. De Grunde, levelling his jewelled eye glass at Aunt Betsy, and addressing his conversation to Arabella.

"O, just step one side, Mr. De Grunde, and I'll tell you all about her. It is the funniest thing in the world. She's a wonderful rich aunt of mine, who means to make me her heiress; but she's the queerest, oddest mortal you ever saw. She always thought everything of me, and I suppose will tell of it with pleasure all her life, that she was present at my first party."

"She is quite distinguished looking, after all, Miss Lester; I admire that antique, superb satin dress of hers; there is an air of queenly dignity too, about her—I must make her acquaintance after supper."

But the owner of the eye glass was disappointed in making the acquaintance of Aunt Betsy that evening, for the venerable lady retired immediately after supper, persisting to all the company that she never sat up so late before in her life. The party at length had an end, like all other affairs of the kind, and Arabella Lester sought her pillow, with a lighter heart than she possessed in the first of the evening, and thought that the advent of Aunt Betsy wasn't so terrible a thing after all, as long as Mr. De Grunde thought her so distinguished looking.

It was a matter of great perplexity to Mrs. Lester and her daughter, how to dispose of Aunt Betsy, without actually giving her offence. The twenty thousand dollars in perspective, entitled her to a certain amount of attention; but to keep her concealed from the gaze of their fashionable acquaintances required all their tact.

"Well, ma," said Arabella, two or three days after the party, "I suppose that odious Aunt Betsy will be coming down stairs to day, surely, for we cannot urge the plea any longer, that the parlors are being put in order after the party. Do, ma, invent some excuse for keeping her up there to-day, for I expect callers, and I can't bear the idea of having her here, with that everlasting stocking."

"I'll try what I can do, dear. What did possess the woman to visit New York this winter I cannot conceive. She never made a visit before in cold weather in her life."

"I remember, mother, one visit she made us in the winter, when I was a little boy, and all of us children had the measles. She nursed us night and day, and you seemed glad enough to see her then. She seems to me like the same Aunt Betsy she did then, only grown older."

"I declare, Edward, you are enough to provoke a saint. You are always talking about old times—how we lived when you were a little boy. Just like pa, for all the world, eternally telling about the houses he has built. You gave a fine description of our old house to Mr. De Grunde the other evening; I know my face must have been crimson."

"And what of it, wasn't it the truth? Besides, I question if Mr. De Grunde ever lived in a better house himself when he was a boy. Once more, Arabella, I feel it my duty to caution you against trusting too much to the professions of one whom I cannot but consider a brainless fop, or at best, an angler after a fortune."

"I think myself quite competent to judge of my own acquaintances, and if you are going to keep continually lecturing me, I'm sure I don't care how soon the time comes for you to enter college."

"No more of this Arabella," said Mrs. Lester, "I do not wish to hear you speak so to your brother. There, I hear Aunt Betsy coming, true enough."

"So you are all here, I've been hunting everywhere after you. I blundered into the kitchen in my travels, and I tell you what, if I had such a good-for-nothing cross cook as you've got, Polly, I'd send her off mighty quick. I asked her about something she was stirring up in a pan, and la! she snapped me up enough to take my head off."

"O, that's her way; she don't like to be questioned about her cooking."

"Well, she might be civil, for that doesn't cost anything. Well, they were monstrous slow in getting cleaned up here, three whole days, but however it looks pretty fine here now. See here, Arabella, I want to buy me a new silk gown before I go home; now it's a pleasant day, suppose you go out with me and help me pick it out. And I want to see some of the sights here."

"O, dear, Aunt Betsy, I've got a terrible headache, I couldn't possibly go this morning. I should like very much to go, but really, you must excuse me now."

"Massy sake, you have the headache by spells every day. You are getting into a bad way, I'm afraid, and you must certainly take something for it. Now if I only had my box of pills here, they'd cure you right off. I'm sorry you can't go out, for I'd set my mind on going to-day."

"Wont I do instead?" said Edward. "I am called quite a judge of dress by the ladies, and as to showing you about the city, I think I could do quite as well, if not better, than Arabella."

"O, I should be pleased enough to have you go, Edward, but I didn't think you would want to be beau to such an old lady as I when there are plenty of young ones."

"Well, aunty, as you've accepted my company, I think we had better start right away. I shall be ready to do escort duty as soon as you are dressed."

"Who would have thought, ma, that Edward would have volunteered his services? There they go around the corner, and do see, she has actually taken his arm. What a figure they cut, and how ridiculous that old bonnet looks! Dear me, if he likes her so well, I hope he will keep her out all day."

"He is a strange fellow, Arabella. He hasn't a particle of pride. I declare, I'm tired to death with your pa and him. I do wish they would think more of appearances."

"Here's a note for you, Miss Arabella," said the servant, thrusting his ebony face into the door.

"O, ma, it's an invitation from Mr. De Grunde to go to the opera this evening. Isn't it fortunate that my new opera cloak was sent home this morning? I will go directly and write a note of acceptance."

"So I would, dear, and I will coax your pa to take me too, I haven't been to the opera for a long time."

"Here's our house, Aunt Betsy," said Edward, as the two reached home about the middle of the afternoon.

"I declare, so it is; I was going on further. The houses folks live in here are all as near alike as the peas in a pod—I don't see how folks ever know when they get home."

"O, that's easy enough, aunty, you would soon get used to the monotony of so many blocks of houses."

"Well, Polly, I've got my gown, and seen all creation besides. It seems to me, we've walked and rode nigh fifty miles in all."

"Yes, mother, we've had a grand tramp about the city, and I guess Aunt Betsy will have enough to think about for months to come."

"That's a fact. And Edward was so kind to show me everything and tell me all about the things I saw. He'll make just the right sort of a husband for somebody one of these days. He's got a little sense, and don't go peeping round through a kind of one-eyed pair of spectacles, like that Grunde chap the other night. If he can't see like other folks, why don't he wear specs? I'm sure it would be enough sight handier."

"I do like your dress very much," said Mrs. Lester, examining the silk that Aunt Betsy held up for inspection. As for Arabella, she was so indignant at the old lady's last remark, that she hardly deigned a glance at it.

"I'm glad it suits you, Polly; there was such heaps and heaps on 'em, I never should have picked one out if it hadn't been for Edward. I declare, if there isn't the tea bell, where upon earth has this day gone to?"

"You have been so pleasantly employed that the time has passed swiftly," said Edward, handing his aunt to her seat.

"Yes, and that makes me think that I must be thinking about finding brother Simon's folks, for the time has most gone that I calculated to stay in the city. By the way, Polly, how do they all do? I haven't heard you say a word about 'em since I've been here."

"I really don't know, I haven't seen them for a great while," said Mrs. Lester, slightly coloring.

"How's that, you and Simon's wife used to be mighty thick together once?"

"Well, I don't know, we never had any difficulty; but we sort of left off visiting so often. Simon lives in altogether different style from what we do, you know."

"So that's it. Folks have strange ideas now-days. For my part I can't see as the house, and style, as you call it, make folks any better or worse. I must find out where they live, and visit them by all means before I leave the city."

"I can find out their residence for you, Aunt Betsy," said Edward, "and when you get ready to visit them, I will accompany you; for I think the families have been estranged long enough."

"Well, I don't see but what I'm nicely off for company now, so I guess I'll start to-morrow."

"It is too bad, Aunt Betsy, that we are engaged to go to the opera this evening, as you say it is the last evening you will be here."

"O, never mind me. Doubtless the reflection that I am left at home wont spoil your pleasure entirely. 'That odious Aunt Betsy,' you know, is 'such a fright.'"

Arabella happened to think, just then, that she wanted an article in her chamber, and left the room with crimson face. The next day, a huge trunk, two hand-boxes, and a carpet-bag were deposited upon the outside of a carriage, and Aunt Betsy, with her bundle and umbrella, was assisted inside by Edward Lester, who had so generously offered to accompany her. They were left at a good substantial-looking brick house, and a rosy-cheeked matron answered their ring at the door.

"Why, Aunt Betsy Mason, how do you do? I was telling Simon yesterday that I wished you would make us a visit this winter. He's gone from home a great deal, and I am lonesome sometimes. And this is Edward Lester, I believe, I haven't seen you for a great while."

"Well, to tell the truth I was lonesome myself up in the country, so I thought I'd come where there were more folks. I've been staying with Polly a while, and Edward offered to come with me, and find where you lived."

Aunt Betsy was soon seated by a cheerful fire, and as she never allowed herself to be idle, the blue stocking was soon produced, and the needles flew fast while she chatted about old times with Simon's wife. There was another inmate of Mr. Jenkins's family, to whom our visitors were duly introduced. She was a young and beautiful girl, dressed in deep black for the loss of her only remaining parent; and in the capacity of dressmaker, she earned a comfortable living, and boarded in the family we have been speaking of. She was busily occupied upon a dress she was hurrying to get done, and scarcely raised her eyes from her work, but when she did lift them to answer some question, or make a remark, their dark, expressive beauty, and the sweet tones of her voice, made sad havoc with the heart of Edward Lester.

"Have you finished your work, Amelia?" said Mrs. Jenkins, as the former was rolling it up.

"Yes, I think I shall be just in time. I was ordered to have it done by seven, for it is to wear to a party this evening. I must go and carry it home immediately."

"I am sorry you have to go so far in the evening, I shall really be worried about you until I see you safe home again."

"If Miss Morton will accept of my company, I shall be most happy to serve her as an escort," said Edward, rising and taking his hat.

"I should like your company very much, but I feel unwilling to trouble you to go so far."

"No trouble I assure you, it will afford me great pleasure."

Soon the eldest son of the fashionable Mrs. John Lester was walking down Broadway with a poor sewing girl; poor in everything but radiant beauty and a glorious intellect.

"I hope, Miss Morton, you don't have to take so long a walk as this very often after dark, without some protector."

"I am obliged to quite often; but when my poor brother Henry was alive, he used to always accompany me."

"Was your brother a pale-looking young man, formerly a clerk at Simpson & Co.'s, on Broadway?"

"He was; were you acquainted with him?"

"Yes, he was my dearest playmate when a boy; can it be that the poor fellow is dead?"

"Yes, he left us, we trust, for a brighter world, more than a year ago; his intense study when out of the store injured his health, and he sunk into a decline. My mother soon followed him, so I am now left entirely alone. I said alone, but there is one above, 'the Father of the fatherless,' in whom I trust."

"I dearly loved your brother, Miss Morton, and called at the store one day to see him, as I was in the habit of doing; they told me he was sick, but could not tell me where he lived then, as they heard the family had moved since he left the store. You must allow me to visit you often, for your brother's sake. I would like to know all about his last hours."

"I should be most happy to receive you at any time, and give you any information that you may desire; you know it is pleasant to talk of those we love."

Having seen his charge safely home, Edward wended his way to the splendid mansion of his father.

"Where have you been all this while, Edward?" said Arabella, affecting great joy at his return.

"I have passed a very pleasant day at Aunt Mary's."

"Dear me, Edward, you don't say you have been scraping acquaintance with those vulgar, common people again?"

"I have, and find them very agreeable."

"There is no accounting for tastes. But I can forgive you, as long as you took Aunt Betsy out of the way. I can't conceive why I was not invited to Angelia Lofty's party this evening; I am half afraid she thought by the appearance of our eccentric relative, that we couldn't be very genteel people."

"If you have lost the acquaintance of Miss Lofty, your loss is not irreparable."

"So you think, but I am of a different opinion. I am so vexed, I expected to go, and wear my new brocade. I was in to Carrie Winter's this evening when her dressmaker, Miss Morton, brought her dress home. It looked superbly. But such a dignified piece as the dressmaker was I never saw in my life—she had the air of a duchess."

Edward started; but asked, quietly, "Did you ever see a duchess, Arabella?"

"No, but I've read about them, and that is quite as well as seeing them. You are such a provoking, matter-of-fact sort of person, one has to choose words when in conversation with you."

Aunt Betsy's visit of a few days at her brother Simon's was extended to weeks; for whenever she spoke of going home there was always some excuse urged by the family to detain her. And when at length she did go, she left behind her sorrowful faces. As for the Lesters, they neither knew nor cared when she took her departure.

Three years have now elapsed since Aunt Betsy's visit, and we will glance once more at our old friends. Mr. Lester, not content with living upon his honorably acquired wealth, embarked in speculation, and soon found himself some thousands worse off than when he commenced this ruinous experiment. Mrs. Lester, however, still continued in her extravagance, and strove hard to maintain her position in genteel society. Arabella had recently become Mrs. De Grunde, and was boarding at home with her husband, awaiting the arrival of a remittance from Europe, to enable him to build a house, which he boasted should rival all others. At this juncture of affairs there came one day a letter sealed in black, and directed to Mrs. John Lester.

"Your Aunt Betsy is dead," said Mrs. Lester, after perusing the missive, "and you must put on your things immediately, and go and order our mourning, for we are invited to the funeral."

"O, dear, ma, the idea of hurrying to get off my bridal costume for mourning, and on her account too, is very provoking."

"But, child, you must, for you have expectations there, you know, and besides, you needn't wear it after the funeral."

Very different was the news received at the Jenkinsses; for Aunt Betsy, with all her oddities, was dearly loved there, and many tears of sincere sorrow were shed at their loss. Mrs. Lester and Arabella, in deep black, and Mr. Lester and his distinguished son-in-law, started the next morning for the secluded village of Hopville. The Jenkinsses also went decently attired for the occasion, but their outward show of mourning bore no comparison to that of their more wealthy relatives. After the funeral, the will was read, according to the directions of the deceased, and Arabella ceased to apply her mourning pocket-handkerchief long enough to hear its contents. To Mr. Simon Jenkins was left the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, to Mrs. Polly Lester, a ring that belonged to her mother, and to Mr. Edward Lester, in consideration of his kind attentions to the deceased on her last visit to the city, the sum of five thousand dollars, and the old homestead. Both families were astonished at this document, and the Lesters, with ill concealed anger, instantly took their departure.

"I thought you told me, Arabella this Aunt Betsy was going to make you her heir?" said De Grunde, in bitter tones.

"I thought she was—she told me so once—but you know, Augustine, you said you had wealth enough of your own, so we needn't mind it, although I think the old thing was awfully mean."

"Humph," growled the amiable Augustine; and this was all he deigned to utter the rest of the journey home.

It may be as well to state here that the remittance from Europe never came, and De Grunde, after living as long as he could upon his wife's family, very unceremoniously left her one day, and was never heard from after.

Mr. Jenkins, with his unexpected legacy, paid off the small mortgage upon the house he lived in, and by his prudent investment of the remainder, was placed for life above want. Edward Lester, having finished his studies at college, much to the dissatisfaction of his father's family, chose the profession of the ministry, and ere long received a call to settle over a flourishing society in the city of his residence, and soon after was married to Amelia Morton.

THE COQUETTE OF FORT HAMILTON.

A FRONTIER STORY OF VIRGINIA.

BY GIDDINGS H. BALLOU.

IN 179—, there stood, in what is now the north-western part of Virginia, the post of Fort Hamilton. The position was one of great importance, and had already been of more than ten years' standing. Well garrisoned, and tolerably well appointed, it maintained something of the social advantages of an old garrisoned town; and it numbered among its tenants not a few of the brave and fair of the land. The presence of cool-headed and skilful men was particularly required; for, as one of the main frontier defences against the inroads of the wild and treacherous Indians, Fort Hamilton was exposed to daily danger of sudden assault.

Of such a staunch and wary character was Henry Westover, by descent Lord Rockingham. His experience and skill would have entitled him, above any other, to the office of commander of the fort; but a certain carelessness of social honors, a sort of cynical avoidance of those things which other men eagerly sought after, drew him aloof from the responsibility which would otherwise have been readily imposed upon him. Yet there was little real indolence and less selfishness, in this aristocratic Westover. He was beloved by the whole garrison. He had a good heart, a helping hand for every one that needed it, a spirit exalted above all semblance of meanness or dissimulation.

In the little scandals of the garrison he scorned to take a part—rarely even acknowledged their existence. Every care and every trouble of life was met by him with the same ever-present strain of easy, half-genial, half-stoic philosophy, which readily, almost cheerily, encountered the ills of this world without the least affectation of undervaluing their power. Such was Henry Westover, at this time a bachelor of nearly forty-five years. It was well understood that there was a history connected with his youth, of somewhat mournful interest, which might, if known, clearly account for his obduracy to the snares which so many of the fair sex would gladly have thrown around him. Nevertheless, Westover was ever attentive and gallant in his demeanor towards the ladies—more particularly so, it was commonly said, to the niece and ward of his friend Captain Barton. But Westover's well-known character was such, that no occasion was taken for the usual chit-chat with regard to special attentions and the et ceteras of garrison gossip. There was a grave and gentle tenderness in his demeanor towards the beautiful Louisa, a fatherly indulgence for her childlike volatility, which served to form between him and the maiden a bond not exactly lover-like, but yet no less firm and scarcely less enduring.

Louisa Barton was, by general report, a coquette. I cannot say that she deserved the appellation, which in its received signification is understood to mean a heartless trifler. Such was not her character. But, at seventeen years of age, she was too full of the joys of youthful existence to think of aught else except the passing hour, how to live free and happy with the friends she esteemed, like the flower of the field, taking no thought of the morrow, or of the storms which lay hidden in the future. Her admirers she deemed as heart-whole as herself; and without an endeavor or a wish to inspire pain, she laid herself open to the accusations which were levelled at her more especially by less favored individuals of her own sex. But to George Wytherly's ears, all fault-finding criticisms came in vain. True, he could not but be hurt, at times, by the light-hearted aptness with which the belle of the garrison was wont to ward off his more serious approaches. Still he hoped on, and trusted to time, which should sober her native exuberance of spirits, and bring her to a truer appreciation of the realities of life.

"I know," he would say to himself, "that in spite of all her girlish gaiety, she is pure and innocent as the light which shines on all the world with the same impartial smile. Let me not then be censorious in my thoughts; rather let me patiently wait on my destiny."

This philosophic determination, however, was soon put to the proof—for one afternoon he hastened from the house of Captain Barton in no very enviable state of mind.

"What a fool am I," he ejaculated, "to pin my happiness on the caprices of a woman! Here is this girl, whom I had deemed the very personification of all that is pure and noble, throwing away my offering of an honest and manly devotion, and taking up with the frippery of this jingling Merrison! What under the sun could have so infatuated her, I know not—unless it be his trick of stringing together rhymes. If I had thought this the road to her heart, I might have bought me an old song-book and transmuted it into doggerels much worse than his own, which are bad enough to suit any crack-brain in Christendom. But there! I pity the poor girl, after all—and wish no more revenge for her treatment of me than the lot which she herself seems to have chosen."

On that very eve following close on the rejection of the ill-fated Wytherly, there took place a gathering of the beaux and belles of the garrison, whose number, however, was so limited, as to require the aid of a pretty tolerable sprinkling of the elders in order to make the company of sufficient dimensions. The assembly was held in the upper part of the block house which was to the inhabitants of Fort Hamilton the time-honored "Concert Hall" of their miniature city; and it may be said with truth, that few were the halls, however pretentious, which could surpass in attraction that rude frontier apartment—for are not beauty and bright eyes the chiefest ornaments the world over? and who does not know that nature's wild surroundings, and the spice of neighboring danger, lend a vividness to these attractions beyond the power of other circumstances to afford? Certainly, those present seemed to enjoy themselves fully—or, we might better say, all save one.

"My dear Em," said one laughing sylph to another, between the pauses of the dance, "prithce tell me what it is that makes our staid George so unusually gloomy to-night! I fancy, if there be any secret about the matter, that you stand a better chance for information than any other, save one."

"Ah, I can readily inform you! Know, then, that the admired Miss Barton, after having, as usual, kept the gentleman as long as possible on the hook of suspense, has at last given him his sentence and handed him over to never-ending despair."

"I had guessed as much. The heartless flirt! I wonder what it is that the men admire so much in Louisa Barton! There she goes with her new victim! I hope, I do hope, Anne, that he will have wit enough to return upon her the treatment which she has given others. Isn't he a love of a man, though? So slim and elegant, and writes such poetry, as I have heard! And then he talks so beautifully—you ought to hear him!—about the battles that he has been in, and the dangers that he has had to fight through, single-handed—it is positively terrifying! But any one can see that she is mightily taken up with him just now." And so these two dear friends of Louisa passed on.

"A good even to you, Master George!" said Westever, shortly after, accosting the young lieutenant; "I see you are looking pale, of late. This being penned up within four walls agrees not well with either you or myself. I challenge you to an excursion, to-morrow morn; I long to stretch my limbs once more outside the gate."

"I am off duty at ten," replied Wytherly. "I can be with you then, if in season for you."

"The thing is settled," rejoined Westever. "And now I must leave you; for yonder is a certain young damsel whose eyes remind me that I have not as yet paid to her the homage which is her rightful perquisite. Adieu, then, till to-morrow!"

On the next morning, at the appointed hour, the two friends, musket on shoulder, issued from the fort gate; and not a dozen minutes had passed, before Wytherly had acquainted his senior with the result of his unfortunate suit to the mistress of his affections.

"I should not feel the matter as I do," he said, "were it not for her preference of that empty jackanapes, Merritson."

"These women, my dear boy," replied Westover, pausing under the shade of a huge beech, and resting his broad shoulders against its trunk, "these women, I say, move in a sphere concerning which we must be very careful in making our calculations. The very best and truest of them have their little eccentricities, their vagaries, for which, poor souls, we ought not to be too ready to blame them, seeing that we ourselves are not altogether immaculate. But, as for this same Merritson, whom I fancy little better than you do, I am in hope that something will arise in due season which may serve to bring him out in his proper colors. When a young girl has dressed up a man in the garb of her own imagination, it needs something pretty palpable to dispel the enchantment. When, however, the disenchantment happens at the proper time, it gives her a most valuable lesson, often well worth the price paid. But, I am sorry to say it, this fortune does not always happen."

The speaker's cheek flushed, and he was silent. Wytherly knew that some painful chord had been struck, and waited patiently for the continuance which he expected. He was not so engaged, however, but that the senses were on the alert, ready (as usual with the trained frontier's-man) to be impressed with the slightest sound or appearance by which his attention ought to be attracted. Thus, at the sound of a slight rustle in the underbrush near, his eyes were instantly fixed on the spot from whence presently issued the tufted head of an Indian, his face tattooed and besmeared with grotesque painting. Raising his finger with a meaning air, he arrested the hostile attitude which they were about to assume. Then, pointing to the fort, he glanced behind and around him, and with one hand stirred lightly the heaps of leaves on the ground beneath. The manner, the look, and the action told at once the story which he wished to convey; and, perceiving this conviction in the countenances of the two whites, the savage disappeared as quickly as he came. The woods around were filled with ambushed enemies. Even now, before they could gain the fort, the two friends knew that they were in the utmost peril of their lives. Nevertheless they preserved the utmost equanimity, and moving slowly on, with a gradual approach towards the gate, chattered gayly concerning the hunting-party which they affected to undertake for the afternoon. In this way, they entered the fort. The gate was doubly barred, the alarm was cautiously given, and every necessary preparation commenced.

Merritson, who held a similar rank in the garrison with Wytherly, pretended to regard the affair very lightly. Although prudent enough to restrain his comments within due bounds when in the hearing of his brother soldiers, he professed, in the ears of his fair admirers, a sage contempt for such timid alarms, such unmeasured precautions.

"When I was in Germany," said he, "we waited till some one had seen the faces of our enemies, or at least till we had got some definite information concerning them, before we made such a stir about fighting them. For my part, I am no advocate for these skulking battles, where neither party can see his opponent."

His gentle hearers were awe-struck by his daring tone, and more than ever envied the capricious Louisa, who held by a silken chain this redoubted warrior. His braggadocio ways, however, did not escape the eyes of his fellows, some of whom inwardly resolved that he should be put to the test whenever the time of action should arrive. Their desires seemed to stand some chance of realization, as evening approached, when, after a careful inspection by glass of the neighboring forest, the commandant issued orders for a company of scouts to hold themselves in readiness for service. Under cover of the darkness, they were to effect a lodgment in the forest, and by early dawn to spread themselves out, as far as safety would allow, in order, if possible, to procure some reliable information with regard to the numbers and position of the enemy. It was a volunteer service, although none but men well tried in the warfare of the woods were allowed to attempt an undertaking where so much depended on each individual effort. However much or little Merritson might have been influenced by a knowledge of this last point, he hesitated not to offer his services, which were immediately declined. Merritson appeared to be much chagrined at the disappointment, and by some mysterious means the intelligence soon reached Louisa, who, despite her sympathy with his feelings, could not resist a complacent glow at the spirit which her lover had manifested.

"These poets," she exclaimed to herself, "are always so ardent in their impulses!"

The night passed, the dawn came, the sun rose up above the tree-tops, and yet no sign of life appeared without the fort. At last a shot was heard; then a quick dropping fire, and the scouting-party, breaking from cover, made for the gates—followed close by a crowd of yelling and whooping savages. A timely volley from the walls arrested the pursuers, and the flying whites soon found themselves safe within the fort. But not all had escaped the perils adventured; Lieutenant Wytherly and a hunter named Dixon were missing. There were few of the subordinates whose loss would have been more felt than that of young Wytherly. A universal gloom fell upon all. Louisa, light-hearted as she naturally was, was by no means less feeling than the rest of her sex, and experienced a remorse in a great measure undeserved. "If I could but have treated him a little more kindly!" she was continually repeating to herself.

But she was in some measure re-assured by Merritson, who informed her that it was most probable that Wytherly and Dixon were merely hovering on the outskirts of the foe, endeavoring to make further espial before quitting the forest.

"In Germany," he said, "I have often been employed on similar service, and at one time lay three days among the rocks and woods watching the movements of the enemy—feeding only on some strips of dried beef and such few berries as I could find. You may depend upon it, they are quite safe."

The very next day gave the lie to his confident assertion; for, at early dawn, just within the boundaries of the forest, a space was seen to be cleared, a stake erected, and heaps of fagot brush piled around. A few Indians entered the area, and with them a prisoner, whom they bound securely to the stake. Richard Pearson, the oldest hunter and the most sullen-tempered man in the garrison, seized a glass and directed it towards the scene. After holding it for an instant with a steady, unwavering arm, he let it fall from his hand with a violence which came near destroying the instrument.

"It is Bob Dixon!" he said, the tears falling down his furrowed cheeks; "one of the best shots that ever lived. And to see him roasted before my eyes by these heathen devils!"

The flames had already begun to ascend, and the red men were already gambolling in frantic ecstacy around their victim, when it was made evident that another sacrifice was intended, for a second upright was planted side by side with the first; and as its destined occupant was bound to the fatal post, the yells and exultations of the savages rent the very skies. A groan of horror burst from every heart within the fort. There could be no doubt now as to the fate of their favorite Wytherly; for, before the white smoke whirled upward, his face could be clearly seen, ghastly pale, but composed and calm as of old. The soldiers of the garrison were almost wild with excitement. Even the iron habits of discipline scarce controlled their fury.

"Let us go—let us go!" they cried, as with one voice. "We will teach these fiends to feel the torments that they inflict!"

"Hold, my lads!" said the commandant, with a moistened eye and a quivering lip. "Let us recollect the dictates of duty before all else. That duty bids you remain at your post."

"Comrades," said Westover, in a voice whose lowest intonation vibrated within each auditor's bosom, "had George Wytherly been my own son, I could not have loved him better, nor have been more anxious to save him. To save him is impossible; but we may live to revenge him."

"And Bob Dixon!" growled Pearson, glaring fiercely at the speaker.

"And Bob Dixon also," rejoined Westover, kindly, extending a hand to his rude companion.

The latter stepped hastily forward and grasped the white hand with a pressure like that of a vice, while every feature quivered with the earnestness of his emotion. While the attention of the soldiers was for a moment distracted from the scene without by their astonishment at the agitation of the hunter, who, from his usual impassibility, might have been deemed case-hardened against any outward sign of sympathy, Louisa Barton rushed into their midst and threw herself at the feet of Westover.

"Save him—save him!" she cried. "It is I who am his murderess—it was I who drove him to danger and death!"

Westover raised her gently, and with a few soothing words, bore her away in his arms as he would have done a frenzied child. It was but a few moments before he returned.

"Poor girl!" he said to one of his brother officers; "I am not sure that she is very much in error in what she says. George was strongly attached to her; and since she has become so much taken with that miserable fop Merritson, he has not seemed the same person. To deal with these red demons, one must have a cool head, as well as a ready wit; and I suspect that George was rather more reckless of his own safety than he would have been in common. But it's human nature, Ritson. Woman has been at the bottom of almost every difficulty from the ruin of Troy down to the present time."

The inmates of the fort, burning as they were for opportunity of reprisal, were obliged to remain inactive; for the numbers of the enemy were, by sure signs, ascertained to be overwhelming. Nor was it long before the fact was shown that an unwonted persistence governed the savage besiegers. Day after day passed, and still no relaxation of vigilance was observed. It was certain that some superior mind directed their conduct. Starvation began to assail the garrison. The watchfulness of the Indians forbade all hope of getting intelligence to the nearest posts—an undertaking of doubtful use even if accomplished, since sufficient assistance could scarce be collected to prove available in season.

As their fate drew near, the characters of the besieged appeared to display themselves more clearly. Merritson forgot his vaporing, and grew pale and anxious—entreating every one whom he met to suggest some new plan of escape from the destiny which threatened himself and the rest of his companions.

The unlucky gallant sought to continue himself in the graces of Louisa; but, having once received him with cutting coldness, she afterwards would not so much as admit him to her presence. But to Merritson, this seemed a trifle in comparison. Haggard and famine-struck, other considerations absorbed his mind. His own safety, above all, concerned his thoughts. What, then, was his consternation when one afternoon, more than six weeks after the commencement of the siege, he received a note from the commandant couched in the following words?

In our now imminent peril, I am forced to say, that, if you desire it, permission will be given you to undertake the enterprise.

"Yours truly, HUGH VILLIERS."

"What have I done?" exclaimed Merritson, on reading this. "Would to Heaven that I had bitten off my tongue, sooner than I had uttered such balderdash! But it is all pure malice. No-
